So far the outbreak, caused by a virulent strain of E. coli bacteria, has sickened at least 187 people in 26 states, causing one confirmed death, 29 cases of kidney failure and 97 hospitalizations. The worrisome trend is that while illness caused by E. coli in meat has been declining, bacterial contamination of fresh produce is proportionately rising. Some 20 outbreaks of illness caused by E. coli contamination of leafy greens — 18 in lettuce, 2 in spinach — have been reported over the past decade, with no clear cause identified for most of them.

Investigators don't know yet whether the current problem arose primarily in the growing fields or at the bagging facility. Given that E. coli typically lives and multiplies in the intestines of ruminant animals, like cattle, sheep and deer, one possible source is the manure on nearby cattle farms. The bacteria can be carried into streams or tracked into the fields by wild animals and can infiltrate water used for irrigation or washing the spinach.

Roughly half of the 20 outbreaks have been traced to central California, suggesting something amiss in the environment or processes used there. Regulators are leaning on the food industry to clean up its act, and the industry is scrambling to comply.

But the safest route is to give the Food and Drug Administration greater authority and more personnel to inspect and regulate food growers and processors. Produce farms may need greater separation from cattle, and cattle-raising practices may need to be changed to decrease the production of bacteria. We would be appalled to find human waste on our produce. We should be equally appalled to find animal manure, if that is what happened.

Bright Idea Of Tire Reef Now Simply A Blight (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- Now the idea seems daft. But in the spring of 1972, the dumping of a million or so tires offshore here looked like ecological enlightenment.

From the scrap tires, artificial reefs would grow and fish would throng, or so it was thought. A flotilla of more than 100 private boats with volunteers turned out to help. A Goodyear blimp christened the site by dropping a gold-painted tire.

"A potential grouper haven," a county report opined. Artificial reefs made from tires "appear to be the next best thing to recycling."

What happened instead is a vast underwater dump -- a spectacular disaster spawned from good intentions. Today there are no reefs, no fishy throngs, just a lifeless underwater gloom of haphazardly dropped tires stretching across 35 acres of ocean bottom.

It's not just a matter of botched scenery. Because they can roll around, the tires are pounding against natural reefs nearby.

"It's depressing as hell," said Ken Banks, a reef specialist for Broward County, who recently explored the site. "We dove in and swam for what seemed like an hour and never came to the end of it. It just went on and on."

Robin Sherman, a professor at Nova Southeastern University, led a project a few years ago to retrieve some of the tires most directly damaging Fort Lauderdale's natural reefs.

Two months later, she dived in the area again.

"It was completely recovered with tires -- it was even hard to find where we had worked," she said. "That's when I realized we have to clean up the whole thing."

So, after years in which the site was studied and then neglected, officials here are planning to clean up the environmental experiment gone awry.

Coastal America, a partnership of federal agencies, state and local governments and private groups, is trying to organize a cleanup using military salvage teams that would use the tire retrieval as a training exercise. Once the divers pulled the tires up, they would be disposed of by the state at a cost of about $3 million to $5 million.

The scale of the project -- some say there are as many as 2 million tires below -- and the number of different specialties required had prevented previous bureaucratic efforts from going forward.

Will Nuckols, project coordinator for Coastal America, called the rolling tires a "coastal coral destruction machine."

"For the past several decades, people have looked at this task and then at each other and said, 'Well I can't do that,' " he said.

With each dive team retrieving about 700 tires a week, officials estimate that the effort would take three years. They plan to begin in 2008.

"It's easy to throw something into the water," said Keith Mille of the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission. "What we're finding is it's extremely expensive to remove something from the water."

The first documented artificial reef in the United States was created off South Carolina in the 1830s. Over time, people have sunk rocks, trees, concrete, ships and barges to create reefs. When successful, they were -- and continue to be -- popular attractions with anglers and divers alike.

Artificial reefs made from scrap tires began in the United States in the late 1950s or early '60s, when the country was facing the monumental task of disposing of millions of automobile tires. At the time, stockpiled tires were creating fire hazards, fostering mosquito breeding and blighting the landscape.

Reefs made from tires seemed like an easy solution.

While coastal communities around the country -- in Texas, California, Florida, North Carolina and elsewhere -- embraced the idea, few projects, if any, were conceived on the grand scale as the one off Fort Lauderdale. Proponents touted it as the largest scrap tire reef in the world.

A 1974 Goodyear pamphlet boasted, "Worn out tires may be the best things that have happened to fishing since Izaak Walton," the author of the classic The Compleat Angler .

"There was a lot of local enthusiasm," said Ray McAllister, one of the founders of a local group that pushed for the tire reef and now professor emeritus of ocean engineering at Florida Atlantic University. "We all thought we were doing a good job for the environment."

A tire reef had seemed to work in New England, he said, and organizers figured it would work here.

The project had received a permit from the Army Corps of Engineers and had active support from Broward County, officials said.

While there were initial hopeful reports, it was clear after a decade that the idea wasn't working. Sea creatures didn't grow on the tires. Today, the tires look the same as they did they day they were dropped.

Tires that had been lashed together for stability broke loose, making it easier for them to roll around. With the tires mobile, it was difficult for sea life to make a home there.

Today, most states have restricted or banned tires in artificial reefs, according to a 2004 joint publication of the Gulf and Atlantic States Marine Fisheries Commission.

In retrospect, McAllister said, "it was a terrible mistake and I hate to admit it. . . . The conventional wisdom, or whatever you want to call it, was not such a bright idea."

Waterfront Development Tests New Jersey's Handling Of Toxic Dumps (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WEEHAWKEN, N.J., Sept. 26 — Handsome new town houses selling for more than $2 million hug the waterfront here, and more are on the way. On a curve in the river that offers spectacular views of Manhattan and New York Harbor, earthmovers are at work on a public park.

DOJ_NMG_0072783

But in the view of some environmentalists, the development on this immensely valuable sliver of shoreline is an experiment of sorts because of what lies underneath it: dirt spotted with hexavalent chromium, a manufacturing component that has been identified as a cause of lung cancer, liver and kidney damage and mutations to human DNA.

Hudson County is the nation's chromium-waste center, with almost 200 sites where it was dumped decades ago.

Of all those sites, this slice of Weehawken is the first to be reclaimed for residential development, and the reborn riverfront here — representing an investment of hundreds of millions of dollars — depends on the remedy that the state has chosen for sites polluted by chromium.

The worst spots of contamination have been removed, and most of the 96-acre property has been covered with synthetic sheeting and at least 18 inches of clean soil, called a cap. The mayor said that in the park, the soil cap would be six to eight feet deep in places.

The state and local authorities have approved everything the developer, Roseland Properties, has done, and they say the cleanup has far exceeded their standards.

But the state's policies are not settled at the moment. Rather, they are caught up in a politically charged discussion about how the state has handled the rush to turn urban wastelands into sought-after real estate.

In 2004, the state Department of Environmental Protection issued a moratorium on final approvals of chromium cleanups, and promised stricter standards and less reliance on capping.

The new rules have not yet been issued. In the meantime, the agency allowed the waterfront project to proceed even though various environmental groups and some scientists in the state agency contend that in residential areas, a cap can never be protective enough.

"We want an outside audit and review of the entire hazardous site remediation program, with this fiasco in Weehawken being Exhibit A," said Joe Morris, of the Interfaith Community Organization, which won a landmark court decision last year ordering the excavation of waste where a cap failed at a former chromium dump site in Jersey City.

A federal appeals court, upholding the order last year, scorched the Department of Environmental Protection, citing "a substantial breakdown in the agency process that has resulted in 20 years of permanent cleanup inaction."

The state's environmental commissioner, Lisa P. Jackson, said that Mr. Morris's "idea that this is Exhibit A is more than puzzling to me."

Ms. Jackson said that the agency would soon revamp its handling of toxic sites, and that the Weehawken development complied with all current regulations.

The disclosure of the Hudson chromium sites in the 1980's generated national attention, fed by gruesome recollections of workers at processing plants whose skin and nasal septums had been eaten away by the poison.

To be sure, the one in Weehawken was hardly the worst of the Hudson sites. Some of the fill used decades ago to build up the riverfront was contaminated, but chromium was never processed there.

Still, Michael S. Friedman, the environmental consultant who manages the project for Roseland, said: "Everything we do is under a microscope. This is a high-powered lens."

Mayor Richard F. Turner said that Weehawken "has brought in outside experts, outside consultants — we don't even rely on D.E.P. consultants."

Michael Campion, the township's environmental consultant, said, "When I look at the numbers in Weehawken, and it's been tested like crazy, a cap is a reasonable remedy." He recommended approving Roseland's plan, but he acknowledged in his review that nearly all caps eventually suffer erosion.

Caps are often used on closed landfills, but much less frequently, and only recently on sites where people will live and buildings and traffic will bear down on the soil.

The chromium issue caused unusually public recriminations within the environmental agency. After a group convened to reconsider the cleanup standards recommended leaving them unchanged, one member, Zoe Kelman, a chemical engineer, wrote a 50-page dissent.

Several other agency scientists, speaking on condition of anonymity because they feared retribution, said that the Department of Environmental Protection had bent to political pressure to speed cleanups.

Ms. Kelman accused the agency of disregarding tests at one capped site, in Kearny, that found hexavalent chromium levels thousands of times higher than the agency plan had expected.

She also noted that while New Jersey sets the allowable level of hexavalent chromium in soil at 240 parts per million, Maryland's standard is 30 parts per million, and Oregon's is 23.

"I always feel the public believes we err on the side of protection, and it's obvious now that we don't," Ms. Kelman said.

The agency's critics were supported by a soil scientist at Cornell University, Murray McBride, who submitted an opinion in June 2005 that the current reliance on capping "seems to me to be a stopgap, short-term approach" that fails to account for the way chromium moves in the soil and may migrate to basements and other exposed areas.

In Weehawken, questions remain about the last known remaining concentration of chromium waste, a one-acre lot near the town houses where some of the more contaminated dirt was dumped, covered with sheeting and then paved for parking.

Mr. Morris and Jeff Tittel, the director of the state chapter of the Sierra Club, met with Commissioner Jackson this summer to argue that the mound under the parking lot should be classified as a hazardous waste dump and removed or encapsulated. They said the commissioner resisted, although Ms. Jackson said in an interview that she had never ruled out revisiting the site.

Mr. Tittel has a larger quarrel with the state's redevelopment policies, which were loosened in the 1990's — and which he said "changed from cleaning up sites to making them land banks for development."

"We have finally created social equity in New Jersey," Mr. Tittel said, "because we have people in $3 million condos living on top of toxic sites, not just working and poor people."

Property values have soared since the last of the 42 town houses was built in 2004. A house that sold less than two years ago for $1.5 million was put up for sale in September for $2.7 million, while several others are on the market for $2.4 million to $4 million. Among the residents is a principal of Roseland, Marshall Tycher.

In the old Weehawken, on the cliffs above the waterfront, a vocal minority opposed to the Roseland development is worried about the park.

"I don't know why people down there aren't screaming their heads off," said Mary Ciuffitelli, a 26-year resident of the town. "I grew up in New Jersey, so I want to know what's under my feet."

Poisoned On Eno Road (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Dickson, Tenn.

If you stand outside the Holt family home late at night, after everyone has gone to sleep, with the sound of a soft wind drifting through the trees and the damp sweet smell of abundant grass heavy in the humid air, you can easily imagine what this area was like in the days of slavery.

And then the quiet is broken by the sudden eruption of dogs barking and howling on nearby property, and you're reminded that the tiny population of blacks in Dickson County, even after all these years, is still frequently treated — literally — like garbage.

The property adjacent to the Holt family home is a government-owned landfill. The howling dogs are housed in a pound right next to the landfill. The noise is a nuisance, but it's the least of the family's problems.

Toxic chemicals from the landfill have polluted the pristine water that was once drawn from the Holt family well. Unaware that the water was contaminated, the family drank it for years. Now the Holts are convinced that the poisons that seeped for so long from the landfill into the groundwater are responsible for the potentially deadly diseases that have struck several members of the family.

The Holts were not just unaware that their water was contaminated; they had been assured by federal environmental officials way back in 1991 that the water had been tested and was safe to drink.

"They told us," said Sheila Holt-Orsted, who grew up on the property, "that the water wouldn't hurt us, and that we shouldn't worry about it."

In fact, government records show that dangerous levels of trichloroethylene (TCE), a suspected carcinogen, had been found in the water as early as 1988. The family drank the poisoned water for more than a dozen years after that.

During that time, the government warned white families that the water had been contaminated and provided them with an alternate source of drinking water. The Holts, who are black, were left oblivious to the danger. Welcome to the world of environmental racism, a subject that doesn't get nearly enough attention.

The Holts' property is on Eno Road, a quiet rustic area with an interesting history. Hundreds of acres of land along the road were acquired by blacks in the post-slavery period. Only recently freed, they were proud of being landowners. The Holts have lived in the community for many decades.

Blacks make up just 4.5 percent of the Dickson County population, and they have always been clustered in the vicinity of Eno Road. This has been a great convenience for the whites, who have run the local governments. For six decades, the Eno Road community has been designated as the place for whites to dump their garbage.

"The city and county fathers singled out this small, rural and mostly black Eno Road community to locate their garbage dumps, landfills, transfer stations, toxic waste sites — you name it," said Dr. Robert Bullard, director of the Environmental Justice Resource Center at Clark Atlanta University. "These waste sites are all located on Eno Road."

When I asked the mayor of Dickson County, Robert Stone, why that particular community had been chosen to absorb so much of the county's garbage, he said he couldn't respond because the Holts had filed a lawsuit against the county. He referred me to a lawyer, Eric Thornton, who asked why anyone would think it was peculiar to dump the garbage there.

"It has to be at some location," he said. He denied that race had anything to do with the selection process, noting that there were also whites who lived nearby.

The ingestion of TCE, commonly used as a metal degreaser, has been associated with a variety of cancers, heart disease, impairment of the nervous system, stroke, liver disease, kidney disease, diabetes and other extremely serious disorders.

At various times, the concentration of TCE in the well water of the Holt family was 24 and 29 times as high as the maximum level of five parts per billion set by the federal Environmental Protection Agency.

Sheila Holt-Orsted has undergone six surgeries and chemotherapy for breast cancer. Her father was stricken with prostate cancer. During a conversation in her front yard, less than 50 feet from the landfill, she told me: "My aunt, who lives next door, she had cancer. And then there was another neighbor who had cancer. I said, you know, 'Something is not right here.' "

Joint Chicago-DEA Drug Operations Net 16 Arrests (CST)

Chicago Sun-Times, September 29, 2006

Nine members of an international drug-trafficking ring that supplied heroin from Ghana to Chicago and other Midwest cities were charged Friday as apart of a joint investigation by Chicago Police and the U.S. DEA, according to police.

Seven of the nine were in custody as of Friday afternoon, according to a release from Chicago Police, including Moshoodi E. Ajijola, 38, of the 6600 block of North Damen Avenue. Authorities identified Ajijola as the head of the operation and charged him and eight others with federal drug conspiracy, the release said.

After a six-month undercover investigation by police and DEA agents dubbed "Operation Saheroin," authorities learned the organization imported pure heroin from Africa through Indian to America and finally to Chicago, where it was sold to customers for redistribution around the Midwest, including Rockford, St. Louis and Minneapolis, the release said.

Ajijola and six others were arrested last week, while a seventh suspect was arrested Friday, all on federal warrants. Police and federal agents used an undercover officer and wiretaps in the investigation, the release said.

In a separate drug investigation also announced Friday, federal charges were filed against nine alleged drug dealers who operated an open-air drug market in the 8800 block of South Lowe Avenue, the release said. The investigation led to the recovery of about 760 grams of crack cocaine valued at more than $93,600, the release said.

All nine of the defendants in "Operation C-Charlie" were arrested Wednesday, the release said. In addition to the cocaine, police seized small amounts of heroin and ecstasy, two semi-automatic handguns, five vehicles and $15,529, the release said.

Court information on the suspects was not immediately available.

Heroin Ring Busted In City Hid Drugs In Suitcase Linings, Say Cops, Feds (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, September 30, 2006

Local and federal police joined forces to nab international heroin dealers who were smuggling dope from Ghana and Nigeria to Chicago in the lining of suitcases and by using human mules.

Federal charges against nine members of the international trafficking organization were announced Friday by Chicago Police and federal law enforcement authorities.

Moshoodi E. Ajijola, 38, allegedly the head of the organization, is among seven already in custody. Ajijola is suspected of importing pure heroin, which was then sold to local street gangs and customers as far away as Rockford, Minneapolis and St. Louis. The drugs also were turning up all over the city -- from the far South Chicago Police District to the far north Rogers Park Police District.

The heroin was coming to Chicago and New York through India.

Police said Ajijola, who lived in the 6600 block of North Damen, and his associates were selling out of a building in the 800 block of Eastwood in the Uptown neighborhood.

The charges came after a six-month-long investigation, based largely on a Chicago Police officer's ability to infiltrate the group, authorities said.

Agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration's Chicago field office also were involved in the case -- which one Chicago Police official said involved some of the best local/federal cooperation ever. Because the defendants spoke four different languages, the case required a lot of translation work.

"It was a team effort -- probably the best I have seen in 10 years of chasing dope," said Chicago Police Lt. John Rowton.

All of the nine defendants face federal charges, which increase the penalties and is a tactic Chicago Police are employing more and more. Of the nine, two remained at large as of Friday.

Police Bust International Heroin Connection (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Report

Chicago Tribune, September 29, 2006

Federal and local authorities said Friday that charges have been filed against nine suspects accused of belonging to an international drug-trafficking group that supplied heroin from Ghana to Chicago and other Midwest cities.

Authorities said they identified Moshoodi E. Ajijola of the 6600 block of North Damen Avenue as the head of the group. He and eight co-defendants face federal drug-conspiracy charges, with a sentence of 20 years to life if convicted, police said. Two suspects remain at large.

The undercover operation involved cooperation between the U.S. attorney's office, Cook County sheriff's office and Chicago police, said Gary Olenkiewicz, the Drug Enforcement Administration's Chicago special agent in charge.

A second drug bust on the South Side seized more than $15,500, 760 grams of crack cocaine and five vehicles, police said. Six suspects face federal drug-trafficking charges, police said.

Four Sentenced In Drug Smuggling Conspiracy (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

MONTPELIER — Four northern Vermont men were sentenced in federal court Thursday and Friday in what authorities described as a large conspiracy to smuggle millions of dollars worth of Canadian marijuana into the United States.

The four were among 12 people who have been sentenced or have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing in connection with a ring that smuggled loads of as much as 1,000 pounds of pot at a time in grain trucks entering Vermont from Quebec, the U.S. attorney's office said.

It said the "marijuana would be paid for by cash drug proceeds — commonly in amounts of a half- to three-quarters of a million dollars — concealed in tires mounted on vehicles traveling into Canada from the United States."

In hearings Thursday and Friday, Judge William Sessions III issued sentences to:

Roland Paul Lahue, 50, of East Berkshire, who was given seven years in prison, followed by five years of supervised release.

DOJ_NMG_0072787

Jeffrey Tessier, 40, of Richford, who got 21 months followed by four years of supervised release.

Robert Patterson, 47, of Richford, who got time served while awaiting trial.

Mark Willey, 43, of Barton, who was sentenced to time served.

Authorities identified the leaders of the ring as Lahue and Ronald "Ronnie Cash" Aldrich of Richford. A news release from the federal prosecutor said Aldrich had previously pleaded guilty.

The investigation was said to have involved the Drug Enforcement Administration, Vermont State Police, Internal Revenue Service and Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

During the investigation numerous assets were seized from Aldrich, Lahue and their associates, authorities said. Included were more than $930,000 in cash, more than $1.5 million worth of real estate and numerous cars, trucks, motorcycles, boats and other vehicles.

Four Vt. Men Sentenced For Smuggling Marijuana (BFP)

Burlington Free Press, September 30, 2006

Four Vermont men who authorities said arranged for large amounts of marijuana to be smuggled into the United States from Canada by foot or concealed in grain trucks were sentenced in federal court Thursday and Friday, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Burlington said Friday.

Roland Paul Lahue, 50, of East Berkshire; Jeffrery Tessier, 40, and Robert Patterson, 47, both of Richford; and Mark Willey, 43, of Barton received sentences ranging from seven years in the case of Lahue to time served for Patterson and Willey.

Court documents indicate Lahue and his partner Ronald Aldrich led the U.S. portion of the smuggling ring. Sometimes, 1,000 pounds of marijuana worth $1.5 million would pass across the border in grain trucks, prosecutors said.

Authorities said the smuggling was lucrative for Lahue and Aldrich. U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency officials said they seized $930,000 in cash and $1.5 million in cars, trucks, motorcycles, boats and other vehicles.

The smuggling operation unraveled Oct. 25, 2003 when investigators seized about 135 pounds of marijuana belonging to Aldrich that was in a storage shed on Patterson's property.

Aldrich was sentenced earlier this year. Prosecutors said Tessier, Patterson and Willey played comparatively small roles in the smuggling operations, so their sentences were lighter. Seven other people from Vermont, New Hampshire and Oregon previously pleaded guilty or were sentenced for their role in the smuggling.

In deciding the case, Judge William K. Sessions III reduced the sentences of the four men who appeared in court Thursday and Friday because prosecutors said they helped in the government's investigation into the case.

Federal Indictments Handed Down In Marijuna House Raids (KCRA)

KCRA-TV, September 29, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- Federal indictments were handed down Friday afternoon related to homes recently raided in Stockton and believe to be connection to a massive drug ring.

Investigators seized thousands of marijuana plants that being grown inside the homes.

A federal grand jury has now handed down a total of nine indictments related to the case and a joint task force has been formed that includes the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Internal Revenue Service, the U.S. Attorney General and local law enforcement.

Investigators said the homes raided in Stockton and a group of homes raided in Elk Grove are connected and that they suspect ties to organized crime in San Francisco.

Authorities have already seized millions of dollars of marijuana and large amounts of cash from the more than 50 homes they've raided in the last two months.

The operations are elaborate, the equipment inside the homes are identical and KCRA 3 Investigates has uncovered several trends.

In Stockton and Elk Grove, two real estate agents handled the overwhelming majority of homes. They represented the buyer in the transactions, which involved millions of dollars in real estate.

The joint task force is investigating everything about theses homes -- the purchase, the financing and the people buying the homes.

By tracking property records and deed, KCRA 3 Investigates has also learned that one title agent with the initials "N.C." handled 15 of the 20 homes in Stockton.

Marijuana Houses To Be Part Of Federal Probe (SR)

Stockton Record, September 30, 2006

STOCKTON - A score of indoor marijuana-growing operations uncovered this month in successive raids in several typically peaceful residential areas will become part of a larger federal probe in the region.

A federal grand jury in Sacramento on Thursday handed down indictments on four San Francisco men arrested Sept. 13 in the first of the raids in Stockton, said Gordon Taylor, U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency assistant special agent in charge.

Federal prosecution is already under way in what investigators say is a related operation involving 21 houses in Sacramento and Elk Grove that also led to four arrests. Thursday's indictments formalize the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency's role in Stockton. Agents have been assisting Stockton police for two weeks, Taylor said.

"This is without a doubt the most sophisticated criminal syndicate that we have ever investigated in this region," Taylor said, referring to the DEA's Eastern California District, extending from Bakersfield to the state's northern border, excluding counties along the coast. "This is going to take months to wrap our arms around."

If convicted on federal charges of growing more than 1,000 marijuana plants, the four men arrested in Stockton could face 10 years to life in prison, Taylor said.

Terry Lee Tong, 24, Zhi Huo Xue, 25, Jiapei Zhou, 21, and Hong Bi Zeng, 21, were scheduled to be arraigned in San Joaquin County Superior Court this week, each on 21 counts of felony marijuana cultivation and utility theft. A conviction on those charges would have carried a sentence of up to 10 years in prison. That hearing was continued to next week before the U.S. Attorney's Office decided to prosecute the case.

Jiapei Zhou, 21 "We're moving forward under the concept that all 41 indoor groves are tied to the same organization with perhaps several different operating cells," Taylor said.

Licensed medical marijuana dispensaries in San Francisco were one likely market for the marijuana grown in the area, Taylor said.

At least 6,000 plants were seized in Stockton, along with 200 pounds of dried marijuana. A similar number of plants were found in Elk Grove and Sacramento in raids that began last month.

Stockton police Officer Pete Smith said the so-called pot houses set a record for large busts after the first night, when two homes were raided. Over two weeks, neighbors' tips and investigative leads led to 18 more.

Terry Lee Tong, 24 Past large drug stings in recent years have netted as much as 22 pounds of cocaine and 27 pounds of methamphetamine.

Tom Emery, 50, lives down the block from one raided Spanos Park West home.

He said this week he's not surprised that most residents knew nothing of what was going on inside the homes.

"Everyone's too busy," he said of his neighbors, many of whom are commuters. "I guess that's why they picked these types of neighborhoods."

The Sacramento Bee, September 30, 2006

Four Bay Area residents, indicted this week after a series of raids at homes in Stockton where marijuana was being grown, are part of the same organized crime syndicate behind a pot-growing network in the Sacramento area, authorities said Friday.

Described by agents as a Bay Area-based Asian organized crime network, the group is "without a doubt the most sophisticated crime syndicate we have ever investigated in this region," said Gordon Taylor, assistant special agent in charge of the Sacramento office of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

A task force consisting of the DEA, Internal Revenue Service, the U.S. Attorney's Office and the police departments of Sacramento, Elk Grove and Stockton has been formed to tackle the syndicate, Taylor said.

Authorities said they have raided 21 homes in the Sacramento area and 20 in Stockton since August, seizing at least $70 million worth of marijuana. Seven men and one woman, all Bay Area residents, have been charged in connection with the network.

Investigators "expect to find people much higher on the chain" of the network, Taylor said.

Local authorities are working with Bay Area agencies as they look into the syndicate, he said.

The IRS is helping track the home purchases. Many of the homes were purchased with 100 percent financing and the homes raided so far have all been worth at least $400,000, records show.

Investigators also are looking into where the marijuana was moved after it was grown, Taylor said. According to documents filed in federal court, agents have followed suspects from homes in the Sacramento region to San Francisco's Chinatown.

Taylor said the indoor marijuana farms have brought a dangerous criminal element into the suburbs.

"It's not just marijuana," he said. "It's organized crime now, moving into our neighborhoods."

Buyers Must Sign Log To Get Medicine; Law Aimed At Drug Dealers (DRE)

Daily Record, September 30, 2006

Beginning today, cold and allergy sufferers will have to log their name and address to purchase some of their favorite over-the-counter remedies -- thanks to new federal regulations designed to keep certain cold medicines out of the hands of drug dealers.

The regulations were included in the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act of 2005, which ordered pharmacies nationwide to move all over-the-counter cold and allergy medicines with the decongestants pseudoephedrine, ephedrine and phenylpropanolamine to a secured area and limited the amount that a consumer could purchase at one time.

The goal, according to the law, is to reduce the amount of pseudoephedrine that can be purchased at one time to limit its availability to drug dealers who use it to make methamphetamine.

In the past year, authorities broke up "meth" labs operating in Sussex County.

As of today, consumers must show an ID and sign a logbook for each purchase. Buyers must log their name, address, date and time of sale, name and quantity of the product sold, and the signature of the customer.

Retailers and pharmacies also will be required to complete a self-certification process that includes training their employees on the new regulations and procedures.

Joseph V. Roney, chief executive of the New Jersey Pharmacists Association, said on Friday that the new rules are unnecessary and outdated.

"They are turning cold-sufferers into criminals," Roney said.

The new regulations will be enforced by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency.

Roney said the federal rules are more strict than those put into New Jersey law last year. That law, with the same aim as federal regulations, limited the purchase of cold remedies with pseudoephedrine to three packages per sale.

The federal law will not hamper the makers of methamphetamine, because high-level dealers smuggle bags of pseudoephedrine into the country from laboratories in Mexico, Roney said.

Roney said he was concerned that consumers will face a confusing scenario as they try to purchase the cold remedies they need. He said his association has made materials available to its members to help smooth the transition.

Monica Contessa, pharmacist at the Madison Pharmacy, said she is not expecting any problems with the new law. She expects to have to answer some questions from customers who might not find their favorite cold remedy on the shelf.

But that has been happening since last year, she said, after the state law took effect.

Contessa said customers most likely will not be too concerned with the log-in procedures because they already have to sign forms for their insurance coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0072790

Pharmacist Sri Aju at Molnar Pharmacy in Morristown also said he did not expect problems, in part because of the established nature of his business. The shop is located in a settled part of Morristown and has many regulars, he said.

He also expects to answer some questions and provide a little more explanation.

Contessa said removing cold products with pseudoephedrine from the shelves did not hamper sales because "the customers tend to know what works for them."

Janet Engle, an associate professor at the University of Illinois and a former president of the American Pharmacists Association, said that, besides the new regulations that could cause confusion, the decongestant used to replace pseudoephedrine is not as potent and, in some cases, does not work as well.

Roney said the decongestant used most often to replace pseudoephedrine is phenylephrine, and it does not work on allergy or cold symptoms as well as its predecessor.

Both Roney and Engle said Schering-Plough chose not to reformulate Claritin-D, its top-selling over-the-counter allergy medicine, and are running a series of ads touting that fact.

In the first quarter of this year, Schering-Plough's consumer health care sales decreased 6 percent to $311 million, largely due to lower sales of Claritin-D and other products containing pseudoephedrine, according to the company's annual statement.

Government Aims To Curb Meth Makers (IVDB)

Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, September 30, 2006

Customers looking for Sudafed, Claritin D and other cold medicines this weekend will likely find a bare shelf at their local pharmacy. A federal law that goes into effect today requires cold medications with pseudoephedrine to be kept behind counters or in locked cabinets wherever sold. Buyers also must show a photo ID and sign a logbook. "The additional control on pseudoephedrine will help law enforcement help target the meth problem," said Capt.

Bill Ryan of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Narcotics Bureau. The Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act of 2005 is the latest move by the government to hinder methamphetamine manufacturers by cutting off one of their sources of pseudoephedrine - one of the key ingredients in making the drug. Many cold medicines such as Sudafed contain pseudoephedrine. The law also requires that any employee selling these cold medicines must receive training on the law and its requirements.

The process for doing that was put in place a week ago, said John Cronin, pharmacist and legal consultant to the California Pharmacists Association. The law is patterned after a 2004 Oklahoma law that officials there credit with reducing meth labs by 80 percent. Medicines containing ephedrine and phenylpropanolamine also are subject to the law. An earlier portion of the law, which went into effect six months ago, limited customers to 3.6 grams a day or 9 grams in a 30-day period.

A gram equals 1,000 milligrams, and one Sudafed pill is 30 milligrams. According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, meth is the primary drug threat in California. Also known as crank, ice, speed or crystal, meth can be inhaled, smoked or injected. The quality of the drug - as well as supply and demand -determine its price.

The current wholesale price of meth in L.A. County is $5,000 to $6,000 a pound, according to Ryan. Ice, a more purer form of the drug, goes for a wholesale price of $8,000 to $11,000 a pound. Ryan said the number of meth labs have been decreasing in the state in the past couple of years due to enforcement and to controlling the ingredients used in making meth.

There were 673 labs seized in the state in 2004 compared to 2,579 in 1999, according to the DEA. Agency officials said that the number of meth labs in Mexico has increased, however. The newly required logbooks - which could be in electronic form - will list a customer's name, address, time and date of sale, the name of the product and how much of it was sold.

Pharmacists need to keep this information for two years. The only part of the Combat Meth Act that's new for Rite Aid is the requirement for customers to sign a logbook, according to company spokeswoman Jody Cook. She said Rite Aid voluntarily started putting cold medicines containing pseudoephedrine behind pharmacy counters last year. They also already ask for driver's licenses and keep the number of the license in their computer system for 30 days, she said.

Some drug companies have unveiled products without pseudoephedrine or ephedrine. Pfizer, which makes Sudafed, came out with SudafedPE in February 2005. It doesn't contain pseudoephedrine but phenylephrine. Days before the law took effect, some local pharmacies were still not familiar with all of its provisions. On Wednesday, a lone box of Sudafed remained on the shelf at Nogales Pharmacy in Rowland Heights.

Pharmacist Par-lin Hsu said he had planned to move the box and other cold medicine behind the counter later in the week. Hsu said he hasn't received any official notice about the law. Cronin said there were still questions on how pharmacists would comply. "That guidance would come out in a federal rule. It wasn't published until Sept. 26," he said.

Some customers were unaware of what they would need to do now when buying cold and allergy medications or appear to mind the new restrictions. Outside a Wal-Mart in Industry, Carlos Orozco said he and his children use Sudafed pills to treat their colds. The Whittier man said it wouldn't bother him to show an ID and sign a logbook to get the pills.

Orozco added that people already get carded when they buy liquor and cigarettes. "Everybody just needs one box, I think," Orozco said.

Under the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act:

• Cold medicine containing pseudoephedrine will now be kept behind counters at pharmacies or in locked cabinets.

• Requires buyers to present a photo ID and sign a logbook. The logbook will contain a buyer's name and address, name of the product, amount bought plus date and time of the sale.

• Limits the amount of cold medicine one can buy to 3.6 grams a day or 9 grams in a 30-day period.

• Requires pharmacists to keep the information about the sale for two years.

• Provides an additional $99 million per year for the next five years under the Meth Hot Spots program to train state and local law enforcement to investigate and lock-up meth offenders and expand funding available for personnel and equipment for enforcement, prosecution and environmental clean-up.

• Enhances criminal penalties for meth production and trafficking.

• Requires new reporting and certification procedures of the largest exporting and importing countries of pseudoephedrine and ephedrine.

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 30, 2006

Sudafed and its chemical cousins officially abandon the shelves and take their places behind pharmacy counters Sunday, the result of federal legislation aimed at slowing the spread of methamphetamine.

With the new restrictions, which follow state regulations put in place in mid-2005, lawmakers have succeeded in making pseudoephedrine and two similar chemicals a lot harder to come by for home-and-garage labs brewing the illicit street drug.

They've also made getting a cure for the sniffles more time-consuming for the everyday consumer, since the ingredient is used in virtually all decongestants.

The tougher rules require the items be sold from behind pharmacy shelves or from a locked case. Buyers must provide a state or federal identification and log their name, address, date of purchase and how much of the drug was purchased. Logbooks are kept two years by the store and are open for examination by the Drug Enforcement Administration, as well as other state and federal law enforcement authorities.

The pharmaceutical industry has tried to adapt to the changes by reconstituting many of the products and eliminating the offending ingredient. But while the new products can be sold over the counter, there is some question about whether they work.

Brace yourself: Federal authorities may have another cluster of drugs in their sights, a list that includes such humble bromides as Alka-Seltzer Plus and Vicks 44 Cough Relief.

As the popularity of methamphetamine has grown, so have the sales, and theft, of cold and allergy drugs from store shelves containing the restricted ingredients. Cooking up a batch is dangerous, too: Toxic chemicals drench the premises from roof to root, rendering it fit only for a hazmat team. Sometimes, even surrounding soil has to be removed.

Drugstore crackdowns do seem to curb the number of homegrown meth labs. But another source has popped up to meet demand.

In Texas, for instance, kitchen-brewed meth began drying up just months after that state passed its own laws on drugstore sales. But that led to more meth being smuggled in from Mexico, and in an especially pure form: Mexican Ice. That was also the case with Oklahoma, one of the first states to experiment with drugstore sales.

The Florida Department of Law Enforcement acknowledges much of this state's meth comes from out-of-state labs, not suburban kitchens. However, eliminating the local labs — and their publicly funded cleanup — is a step forward, said FDLE Special Agent Rick Zenuch in an earlier interview.

Make that a hesitant step. Rules for how pharmacies handle sales came out only 10 days ago. Kevin Nicholson, vice president of pharmacy regulatory affairs for the association of drugstores, says at least some retailers won't get their DEA paperwork approved by today, "and until they get that certification, they can't sell the products."

Still unresolved are questions of whether the personal information in logs conflicts with stringent federal rules on a person's right to medical privacy.

Other ingredients in off-the-shelf drugs are also attracting attention. In August, the Partnership for a Drug-Free America reported its survey of more than 7,300 teens found one in 10 had used cough medicine to get high. Federal lawmakers this summer proposed restricting bulk sales of dextromethorpham, or DXM, the active ingredient in a broad array of cough medicines, including Alka-Seltzer Plus Cold & Cough, Tylenol Cold products and Vicks 44 Cough Relief products.

The federal proposal would have affected those pharmacists who buy ingredients, then mix and measure them. States, though, have also shown interest in restricting sales, says Nicholson. And last year, Walgreen Co. — which sells more than 200 products containing DXM — programmed its cash registers to bar sales of all products containing the cough ingredient to anyone younger than 18.

U.S. Stores Race To Meet Law Aimed At Meth (OREG)

The Oregonian, September 30, 2006

Consumers nationwide will have to show identification and sign a log book when buying cold remedies that contain pseudoephedrine starting today, under a new law aimed at depriving methamphetamine cooks of their essential ingredients.

Americans will be limited to daily purchases of pseudoephedrine totaling 3.6 grams and monthly purchases of 9 grams. At a typical dosage, that's 120 tablets a day and 300 a month.

Oregon consumers will be unaffected by the new rules under the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act, which President Bush signed in March. Oregon is exempt because the state imposed a far tougher pseudoephedrine restriction starting in July: a prescription.

Retailers in the other 49 states were scrambling this week to file paperwork with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, certifying that they had trained employees to follow the sales restrictions. The DEA estimated 89,000 businesses would be affected, and the deadline was midnight Friday.

Rusty Payne, a DEA spokesman, said stores that sell pseudoephedrine without a certification "run the risk of DEA action, such as an inspection or audit."

He declined to say how many businesses had completed the process, which the DEA announced on its Web site 11 days ago.

"There are a number of retailers out there who won't be able to complete the process by (Saturday)," said Kevin Nicholson of the National Association of Chain Drug Stores. "So technically, they won't be able to sell the product."

Nicholson, vice president of pharmacy regulatory affairs for the trade group, said many chains waited until Friday to fill out the DEA forms online and experienced delays.

Jan Gee, president and CEO of the Washington Food Industry, said grocery stores in Washington state are doing the best they can to meet the deadline. But she called the DEA's timeframe "unrealistic."

"When you're making your best effort to achieve a new regulation or law, they're fairly flexible with you," said Gee, whose group represents 550 stores in Washington. "That's my hope."

Michael Polzin, a spokesman for Walgreens stores, said the company rushed its paperwork to the DEA within the past two days and had not received a response from the agency by Friday.

"We believe we're in compliance by having submitted that to the DEA," Polzin said.

The federal meth law follows two years of action by states to crack down on the sale of ephedrine and pseudoephedrine, interchangeable ingredients in manufacturing methamphetamine.

As of last week, 42 states had enacted some sort of retail sales restriction, according to the National Alliance for Model State Drug Laws. Some states confine the products to pharmacy counters. Others allow other retailers to sell pseudoephedrine as long as it is locked up to prevent theft. The federal law only supersedes states with looser standards.

States that lack any pseudoephedrine law tend to be in the northeast, a region with far fewer meth labs than the rest of the nation.

But even in states with no existing restrictions on pseudoephedrine sales, many Americans will see little change in their daily routines. That's because the pharmaceutical industry has already made dramatic changes in anticipation of the new federal law.

Changing cold medicine

Drug companies last year began reformulating cold medicines with phenylephrine, which can't be used to make meth.

The nation's largest drug store chains, historically the largest sellers of pseudoephedrine products, began placing reformulated products on store shelves. And many chains began voluntarily placing existing products with pseudoephedrine behind the counter, even in states that did not require it.

"People have been sort of discovering this over the course of the past year or so as states and as specific retailers have made changes on their own," said Erica Johnson, a spokeswoman for Pfizer Consumer Healthcare.

Pfizer, the first company to reformulate, now offers Sudafed PE with phenylephrine as well as traditional Sudafed with pseudoephedrine.

Some leading convenience store chains have switched entirely to the reformulated product. The 5,300 U.S. stores and franchisees of 7-Eleven Inc. stopped selling pseudoephedrine products last year in advance of the new federal law.

"We saw the direction that this was going and we just decided, let's not sell products with this particular ingredient," said Margaret Chabris, a spokeswoman.

U.S. consumption of pseudoephedrine has plummeted as a result of the changes, federal trade data show. Imports of bulk pseudoephedrine averaged 13 tons a month through July of this year, down from 49 tons a month during the same period in 2004 -- a 73 percent reduction in two years.

Gary Schnabel, executive director of the Oregon Board of Pharmacy, said sales of pseudoephedrine products have largely dried up.

"What we're hearing is that most people are just going to the reformulated products over the counter," Schnabel said.

Whether phenylephrine is as good at unplugging stuffy noses is a matter of debate at the moment.

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., called on the U.S. Food and Drug Administration last month to re-evaluate the decongestant's effectiveness.

FDA officials responded by saying that phenylephrine was approved as safe and effective by an FDA expert panel 30 years ago.

"If a consumer does not feel that phenylephrine provides the type of relief that they obtained with pseudoephedrine, they have the option of not purchasing it and purchasing pseudoephedrine instead," wrote David W. Boyer, assistant commissioner for legislation.

Johnson, the Pfizer spokeswoman, said the company's surveys showed 83 percent of people who used Sudafed in the past continue to be satisfied with the new product containing phenylephrine.

Fewer meth labs

Seizures of methamphetamine labs across the United States have declined dramatically.

DEA data show the number of labs nationally fell 42 percent to 5,845 between 2004 and 2005. When seizures of dumpsites, chemicals and equipment are included, the total was 12,456 in 2005, a decline of 30 percent. The number of labs and waste sites in Oregon fell 60 percent during the same period, from 471 in 2004 to 189 in 2005.

Rob Bovett, legal counsel to the Oregon Narcotics Enforcement Association, said nationwide controls will prevent Oregon meth cooks from shopping for pseudoephedrine in neighboring states.

California, one of the few states still allowing retailers to sell pseudoephedrine over the counter without checking ID, will now have to follow the federal law.

And there will be other impacts, said Bovett, who openly advocates regulating pseudoephedrine "into non-existence."

"As we further change the demand for pseudoephedrine," Bovett said, "we're going to change the world market for pseudoephedrine and thereby change the supply of methamphetamine."

New OTC Policy For Allergy, Cold Meds (NSDY)

By Curtis L. Taylor, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 29, 2006

Consumers must show a photo ID and sign a log to purchase some nonprescription sinus, cold and allergy medicines such as Claritin-D and Sudafed -- drugs that will now be locked behind the counter starting Saturday.

The federal law bans over-the-counter sales of drug products containing ephedrine, pseudoephedrine and phenylpropanolamine to curb illegal production of crystal methamphetamine, an addictive drug made with the ingredients.

Officials said online purchasers will face similar restrictions under the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act included in the anti-terrorist Patriot Bill signed March 9 by President George W. Bush.

"This is crazy," said Jerry McIntosh, 71, a customer at the Wakefield Pharmacy in South Ozone. "I wanted to get a little NyQuil cold medicine. I have a little cold and it makes you feel a little better, but I have to give my phone number and address. This makes no sense. If this is going to be a pain in the neck, I can live without it."

His pharmacist, Bob Mason, said that while he understood the need to curb illicit drug production, the restrictions were a major hardship to him and his customers.

"It takes time to log in the information," Mason said. "Worse, some customers just walk out without buying anything. They say, 'I am not going to do it, I just have a cold,' or 'I should not be harassed just because I have allergies.'"

Jan Engle, a professor of pharmacy practice at the University of Illinois College of Pharmacy, said the important thing is to educate consumers about where their medications are now located and about differences in the new decongestants on open shelves. Many brands are substituting ephedrine and pseudoephedrine, which have 12- and 24-hour time-release formulas, with phenlyephrine, an older drug that lasts about four hours, she said.

"If you are at work and you get congested, the last thing you want to do is stop every four hours to take your medicine," said Engle, who teaches a course on over-the-counter prescription drugs. Engle warned that consumers should be prepared to encounter lines and different policy interpretations at each pharmacy. In some states, the law calls for a two-box limit, but some chain drugstores have adopted a one-box policy.

"The bottom line for consumers is that the drug is still available, it is still safe and effective, it is just in a different place," Engle said.

Dr. Dean Mitchell, an allergist with offices in Baldwin and Manhattan, welcomed the new restrictions.

"It is going to dramatically affect my patients, but in the long run I think it will do some good," he said. "Many people overuse these drugs, which all have potential side effects.

"I see patients who take decongestants on a regular basis who come in with elevated blood pressure and insomnia," Mitchell said. "A lot are suffering from sinus conditions but have not been tested for allergies. There are now special allergy drops that can reverse this problem and they may not need the medicine."

Adam Brzezinski 81, of South Ozone, learned about the restrictions Friday while trying to buy Robitussin cough syrup. "I am lucky because I have a pharmacist that knows me, but I would not give out the information at a chain store," he said.

Who Moved My Sudafed? (TIME/CNN)

By Christine Gorman

Time/CNN, October 1, 2006

The fall allergy season brings a new headache this year. Starting this week, allergy sufferers who want to treat their stuffy noses with pseudoephedrine (an active ingredient in Sudafed and similar over-the-counter remedies) will have to go to a pharmacist or salesclerk, show photo identification and sign a logbook recording their name and street address. The national rule, which echoes restrictions found in several states, is supposed to make it tougher for criminals to manufacture the illegal drug methamphetamine using packets of pseudoephedrine as its raw material. Allergy sufferers who don't want to go through the extra trouble had better have a lot of tissues on hand. The most common alternative, the nasal decongestant phenylephrine, may not be as effective.

Both compounds work by constricting the blood vessels in the nose. But, says Leslie Hendeles, a professor of pharmacy practice and pediatrics at the University of Florida, "phenylephrine doesn't get into the bloodstream very effectively" because it is so quickly metabolized by the digestive system. That made Hendeles and a colleague curious about why the Food and Drug Administration considered the drug effective in the first place. They tracked down the studies on which an advisory panel had based its recommendations back in 1976 and were surprised to learn that seven of the 11 studies showed the drug was no better than a placebo at relieving nasal congestion. Part of the problem may be that there's a lot more variation in people's response to this particular pill, making it difficult to tell if it really works--and for whom.

Fortunately, phenylephrine does a pretty good job for most people when it's sprayed directly into the nose. So a decongestant spray like Neo-Synephrine is a good bet, but only if you use it for three days or less. Using the spray any longer sets you up for something called rebound congestion, in which you become even more stuffed up than you were when you began. That warning also holds true for oxymetazoline, the nasal decongestant found in such nasal sprays as Afrin.

On the other hand, phenylephrine sprays are usually safe for folks with high blood pressure, since the medication stays pretty much in the nose and doesn't affect the rest of the body. Pseudoephedrine, by contrast, should not be used, except under a doctor's order, if you have hypertension. Also, in extremely rare cases, the drug may trigger a heart attack.

So if you have a short-lasting cold, you're covered. But allergy sufferers generally need more than three days' relief. Antihistamines will take care of the runny nose and watery eyes. For your stuffy nose, you're going to want to think about signing that logbook. And if you use a big drugstore, be sure you visit before the pharmacy section closes for the night. There's also a limit to how many boxes you can buy each month, so families may need to plan accordingly. As an alternative, you may want to see a doctor about getting a prescription for a nasal corticosteroid spray.

As with any medication, read the label to make sure you know what you're getting--even if you have used a particular product before. Manufacturers of many familiar nonprescription brands have quietly switched to phenylephrine so that their packages can stay on drugstore shelves. Allergies may be hard to avoid, but if you do your homework and follow the rules, you can still get the relief you need.

Clemens Is Named In Drug Affidavit (LAT)

By Lance Pugmire, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

The star pitcher and five other players used performance-enhancers, according to a former teammate who took steroids, prosecutors say.

Roger Clemens, one of professional baseball's most durable and successful pitchers, is among six players allegedly linked to performance-enhancing drugs by a former teammate, The Times has learned. The names had been blacked out in an affidavit filed in federal court.

Others whose identities had been concealed include Clemens' fellow Houston Astros pitcher Andy Pettitte and former American League most valuable player Miguel Tejada of the Baltimore Orioles.

The discovery ends four months of speculation surrounding the possible identities of Major League Baseball figures whose names were redacted from the search warrant affidavit filed in Phoenix on May 31. The document was based on statements allegedly made to federal agents by pitcher Jason Grimsley, who has since retired.

Grimsley, a journeyman relief pitcher who played on several teams, including the New York Yankees, Baltimore Orioles and the Angels, acknowledged using steroids, amphetamines and other drugs, investigators said in the document. He also implicated a number of former teammates, but the names were blacked out in copies of the affidavit made public in June after investigators used the warrant to raid Grimsley's house.

A source with authorized access to an unredacted affidavit allowed The Times to see it briefly and read aloud some of what had been blacked out of the public copies. A second source and confidant of Grimsley had previously disclosed player identities and provided additional details about the affidavit. The sources cooperated only on condition of anonymity.

According to the affidavit, Grimsley told investigators that Clemens "used athletic performance-enhancing drugs." He also allegedly said Tejada used anabolic steroids.

Clemens and Pettitte did not respond to requests for comment made Saturday through their agents and the Astros. Tejada had previously declined to be interviewed.

Grimsley was questioned by investigators after he allegedly received an illegal shipment of human growth hormone, or HGH. The shipment was tracked to his Scottsdale, Ariz., home by a task force of federal agents investigating drug use in professional baseball, the affidavit said.

For a time, Grimsley secretly cooperated with investigators, they said, but stopped after retaining a lawyer.

According to the 20-page search warrant affidavit, signed by IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky, Grimsley told investigators he obtained amphetamines, anabolic steroids and human growth hormone from someone recommended to him by, a source said, former Yankees trainer Brian McNamee. McNamee is a personal strength coach for Clemens and Pettitte.

The former team trainer did not return several messages left with his wife and on his answering machine.

The affidavit also alleges that Grimsley told federal agents that former Orioles teammates Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons "took anabolic steroids." Roberts was the American League's all-star second baseman in 2005 when Grimsley was an Oriole.

All three Baltimore players declined to be interviewed. Roberts said he had "nothing to talk about" and didn't know why he was named.

A sixth player, retired outfielder and first baseman David Segui, previously came forward to say that his name was among those blacked out in the affidavit provided to the public. Segui told ESPN in June that he used HGH on the advice of his doctor as recently as the 2004 season. He did not obtain approval from the league, he acknowledged.

Government officials have declined to comment about their ongoing investigation of drugs in professional baseball.

Clemens, 44, a seven-time Cy Young Award winner who came out of retirement to pitch for the Astros the last three seasons, was a teammate of Grimsley on the Yankees in 1999 and 2000, as was Pettitte, a two-time all-star who is nearing 200 career wins. Grimsley, Tejada, Gibbons, Roberts and Segui were teammates in Baltimore during the 2004 and 2005 seasons.

Grimsley started this year with the Arizona Diamondbacks, but requested voluntary retirement in June after Major League Baseball suspended him for 50 games.

Edward Novak, Grimsley's lawyer, did not return calls. Previously, he publicly disputed the claims investigators made in the affidavit, saying his client did not volunteer the names of any teammates. He said federal agents asked Grimsley to wear a recording device to gather evidence against San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds and that Grimsley refused.

Grimsley was not arrested and has not been charged. Since June, he has complained to friends that federal agents attributed statements and disclosures to him that he didn't make.

"Jason is loyal to the death, a hardheaded guy who would not give up his friends," one of Grimsley's friends said Saturday. "The only names he discussed with those investigators were names … [the investigators] suggested to him."

The Grimsley friend, who talked about the investigation on the condition he not be named, said investigators warned the pitcher that "if he didn't continue to cooperate, they would expose him as a rat."

Rich Levin, a spokesman for Major League Baseball, said the organization and players association were "doing everything we can to eliminate the use of performance-enhancing substances and amphetamines from the game."

Regarding the investigators' affidavit, Levin said baseball officials had "no information [about] how it was obtained or its accuracy."

Clemens has surprised many in the baseball world with his late-career success. Of his 348 career wins, 55 have come since the season he turned 40. In a controversial tell-all book released two winters ago, former major leaguer Jose Canseco speculated that Clemens' late-career surge showed "classic signs" of steroid use.

"Roger says it is all nonsense," Clemens' agent, Randy Hendricks, responded to Newsday at the time. He said the pitcher "takes vitamin B-12 shots … and will pass every [drug] test."

On Saturday, the agent told the Associated Press: "I've grown weary of having to defend [Clemens] from innuendo and conjecture about every six months for the last several years when he's complied with all of the rules and regulations."

Speaking of another of his clients, Pettitte, Hendricks told AP: "Andy is just surprised and stunned, and has no knowledge of any such activity."

Pettitte, 34, pitched nine seasons and was a part of four World Series championships with the Yankees, then signed with the Astros after the 2003 season, helping Houston advance to the World Series in 2005. He has won 14 games this year for a career record of 186 wins, 104 losses.

Tejada, listed at 5-feet-9, 215 pounds, hit 30 home runs in 2000 for the Oakland A's and has established himself as one of the game's best middle-infield power hitters.

He was drawn into baseball's steroids scandal in August 2005, when then-teammate Rafael Palmeiro, who tested positive for an anabolic steroid and was suspended for 10 games, told an appeals panel the test might have resulted from injectable vitamins given to him by Tejada. After investigating, the panel cleared Tejada.

Tejada's increasingly sullen demeanor has attracted hometown news media coverage in Baltimore, where he also has become a target of complaints from fans who accuse him of not hustling.

During the summer, he canceled an interview with The Times for this article. "I don't want to talk to you," he said. Later, Tejada referred a reporter to agent Diego Bentz, who did not return calls.

Outfielder Gibbons, a product of Mayfair High School in Lakewood and Cal State Los Angeles, spent late June on the disabled list with a knee injury in Scottsdale, Ariz. His father, Jim, acknowledged at his Lakewood home on July 5 that the player was aware of the affidavit.

"Is this about Grimsley?" the elder Gibbons asked a Times reporter. "I'm not saying anything about it. I'll let him know you stopped by."

Roberts, listed at 5-9, 175, hit 18 home runs in 561 at-bats last season, matching his combined total through the previous six years in the major and minor leagues.

After a victory over the Red Sox in Boston on Saturday, two of the Orioles told the Baltimore Sun that they denied the claims made in the affidavit.

"I don't pay any attention to what" Grimsley allegedly said about performance-enhancing drug use, Tejada said. "I know that I've never had a problem with that. I know that I've never used that, and I know I am clean. I don't worry about anybody who puts me in that stuff. I'll get checked out for anybody, any time, any moment — whenever they want."

Gibbons said: "I have passed every test administered by Major League Baseball over all the years. And I am not going to dignify these claims and accusations with any further response."

Grimsley told investigators he had used anabolic steroids beginning in 2000, tested positive during 2003 trial testing, and switched to human growth hormone, undetectable in a urine test, after that. He admitted to using amphetamines until an agreement with the players association banned them several months ago, according to the affidavit.

In a major league career that began with the Philadelphia Phillies in 1989, Grimsley played for seven organizations.

Baseball's Ugly Side Just Got Uglier (NYT)

By William C. Rhoden

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

San Francisco

By 11 a.m. yesterday, Barry Bonds hadn't heard the news.

On this, the final day of a disappointing season, Bonds, baseball's second greatest home run hitter, sat in front of his dressing area, watching his beloved 49ers get shellacked by the Kansas City Chiefs. Bonds wasn't aware that names had been disclosed in connection with the continuing peril of the use of human growth hormone.

In yesterday's editions, The Los Angeles Times reported that Roger Clemens was among six players named by a former teammate as using performance-enhancing drugs.

None of the players was named Barry Bonds.

The article said the former major league pitcher Jason Grimsley also identified Andy Pettitte, Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons as players who used performance-enhancing drugs.

The big fish in these allegations — and they are only allegations — is Clemens, perhaps the most dominating pitcher of his generation. I'm not sure how I expected Bonds to react to the news. Indignation? A sense of satisfaction? Bonds arched his eyebrows in surprise and not much else. "That's awful," he said, and let it go at that.

It is awful, and infuriating, that the hypocrisies of two industries — baseball and news media — are converging. Baseball, if it didn't encourage drug use, at least looked the other way season after season as players did what they it had to do to make it through 162 games. The news media, selectively picking and choosing who to vilify, has been on a Bonds hunt for two seasons. Now it may be confronted with Clemens. If I know my industry, there will now be calls for restraint, for withholding judgment. There will be calls for evenhandedness, for letting it play itself out, following the truth where it leads.

Right.

This hunt has never been about getting at the larger truth, never about purging, going back and finding out how baseball helped perpetuate a culture of amphetamines. Instead, we've witnessed a typically American approach to solving deep-seated problems: denial first, finding a scapegoat, initiating a public chase, holding an equally public execution and subsequently declaring the problem over.

Bonds was supposed to be that scapegoat.

The problem is that the loose string we've grabbed and pulled is undressing an entire industry, dredging up names never intended to be dredged up.

Clemens and Pettitte, teammates with the Yankees and the Astros, denied the allegations.

"I just think it's incredibly dangerous to sit out there and just throw names out there," Clemens said yesterday before the Astros played in Atlanta.

He added: "I've been tested plenty of times. My physicals I've taken, they have taken my bloodwork. I have passed every test. Again, I just find it amazing that you can throw anybody out there."

Pettitte said he was stunned by the report.

"I played with Grimsley for a couple of years in New York and had a great relationship with him," Pettitte told reporters.

Pettitte said he never used any performance-enhancing drugs. "I don't know what else to say except to say it's embarrassing my name would be out there," he said.

Indeed. The moving finger writes and having writ, moves on.

Before yesterday's game, Giants Manager Felipe Alou noted, "The minute your name comes out, even if it's not true, your name came out; it's nice to go home clean."

In June, federal agents searched Grimsley's home in Arizona after he admitted using human growth hormone, steroids and amphetamines. Grimsley was released by Arizona and suspended by Major League Baseball. Alou, who may be on his way out as the Giants' manager, was asked what he thought of the new set of disclosures.

"I was shocked to see some of the names on television this morning," Alou said. "There are some big names. I said, 'Here we go again.' Can you imagine having to go through another year? You believe the season is going to be behind us, the season is over and all of that is behind. Now it's in front of us."

Alou predicted that more names — more big names — will surface as federal agents dig and dig in their attempt to get Bonds. The battleground is filling up with casualties.

In pursuit of Bonds, The San Francisco Chronicle published a story based on documents obtained from a grand jury. Now two of its reporters face prison time. More big-name athletes will have their reputations tarnished. Meanwhile, Bonds, the target in all of this, is sitting in front of his stall, watching a football game.

What fitting symmetry to a baseball season that began with Bonds hounded by suspicion of steroid use, despite never testing positive. The season ends with big names other than Bonds being implicated by a former teammate. Now the mob that has pursued Bonds with a single-minded vengeance must decide whether to pursue Clemens and Pettitte as well.

Asked whether he thought the news media will go as hard after Clemens as it has after Bonds, Alou said: "First of all, it has to be true. We don't know if that is true."

"But I gotta say though," he said, smiling, "that Rockets are hard to catch."

Baseball deserves this. We deserve this.

Clemens, Others Blast Grimsley Report (AP)

-- Roger Clemens calls the report "dangerous and malicious and reckless." Andy Pettitte insists he never took banned drugs. Miguel Tejada says he is being smeared again by scandal.

Some of baseball's biggest stars responded with denials and denunciations Sunday following a Los Angeles Times report in which former pitcher Jason Grimsley accused five players of using performance-enhancing drugs, according to a federal agent's affidavit. The other players cited were Baltimore teammates Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons.

Grimsley once played with Clemens and Pettitte on the New York Yankees and is now out of baseball. The reliever has admitted using a variety of banned substances and was suspended for 50 games by Major League Baseball.

Clemens and Pettitte, now teammates on the Houston Astros, denied the allegations Sunday.

"I just think it's incredibly dangerous to sit out there and just throw names out there," Clemens said Sunday before the Astros played in Atlanta on the final day of the regular season. "I haven't seen (the report), nor do I need to see it."

"For the people involved it is very dangerous and malicious and reckless on the part of somebody ... to put something out there with somebody else's writing on it," he added.

Clemens said he has been tested "plenty of times" and passed every test.

Pettitte was "stunned" by the report.

"I played with Grimsley for a couple of years in New York and had a great relationship with him," the pitcher said before the Astros' game.

"I've never used any drugs to enhance my performance in baseball. I don't know what else to say except to say it's embarrassing my name would be out there."

In June, federal agents searched Grimsley's home in Arizona after the pitcher admitted using human growth hormone, steroids and amphetamines. Grimsley later was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks.

In a search warrant affidavit signed by IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky, the Times reported, he said Grimsley identified other players who had used drugs. Those names were blacked out when the document was released.

"As for Jason Grimsley's affidavit, we have no information regarding how it was obtained or its accuracy," MLB spokesman Richard Levin said Sunday.

All major league players are tested at least twice a year for banned drugs. There is no test for HGH, but it is banned by the sport. Former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell was hired by MLB to investigate steroids in baseball.

The Times said an unidentified source with access to the document _ minus the cross-outs _ allowed the newspaper see it but kept the copy. The Times said a second source who had identified the other players provided additional details about the document.

According to the affidavit, the Times said, Grimsley told investigators Clemens and Pettitte "used athletic performance-enhancing drugs."

Houston teammate Lance Berkman said he would be startled to find either of the two pitchers involved, calling the matter "irresponsible" and "unfortunate."

"You just have to be very, very careful when you make accusations like that," he said. "You better be right about it."

The affidavit also alleged Grimsley told federal agents that Roberts, Gibbons and Tejada, all with the Orioles, "took anabolic steroids."

"What can I do? I spent one morning last year with Grimsley," Tejada said Sunday from Boston. "I mean, I already got thrown under the bus with Palmeiro. No, I don't worry about that."

Rafael Palmeiro was suspended last season for using steroids and suggested the positive test may have been the result of a vitamin B-12 shot Tejada gave him. Tejada insisted he did nothing wrong.

Gibbons has said he has passed every test administered by baseball.

"I'm as shocked as anybody else," he said.

Roberts derided the accusations as "ridiculous."

DOJ_NMG_0072801

"We've had steroid testing, and I've taken all the tests," he told The (Baltimore) Sun. "There is no point in getting into verbal wars."

Novitzky also was the lead investigator in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative probe. Two BALCO officials and Barry Bonds' personal trainer, Greg Anderson, served jail time after guilty pleas in that investigation.

Grimsley has complained to friends, the Times said, that federal agents attributed statements to him that he did not make.

Randy Hendricks, who represents Clemens and Pettitte, told The Associated Press he questions the conduct of the federal agents.

"I've grown weary of having to defend (Clemens) from innuendo and conjecture about every six months for the last several years when he's complied with all of the rules and regulations," Hendricks said. "Andy is just surprised and stunned, and has no knowledge of any such activity."

Atlanta Braves star Chipper Jones called Clemens and Pettitte "iconic figures" and is convinced of their innocence.

Giants manager Felipe Alou was asked how he thinks Clemens will be treated compared to Bonds.

"I've got to say, Rockets are hard to catch," he said. "I was shocked to see those names on television this morning. Some big names. I said, 'Here we go again.'"

Three O's Players Deny Steroid Use (WP)

By Amy Shipley, Washington Post Staff Writer

Clemens, Pettitte Also Rebut Grimsley

The Baltimore Orioles issued a statement of support yesterday for their three players accused of using anabolic steroids by a former major league pitcher as the players -- Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons -- denied the charges.

Houston Astros pitchers Roger Clemens and Andy Pettitte, who were accused of performance-enhancing drug use by former reliever Jason Grimsley in a federal affidavit, also rebutted the charges a day after the Los Angeles Times revealed the identities of the players Grimsley accused.

The players' names had been blacked out in the affidavit that was filed in federal court in May.

Grimsley, who played for the Orioles, New York Yankees, Arizona Diamondbacks and other teams, admitted in the search-warrant affidavit to using anabolic steroids, human growth hormone and amphetamines. In the affidavit, he also implicated six players and an athletic trainer whose names had been unconfirmed until the Times report.

After the affidavit became public, Grimsley was suspended for 50 games by Major League Baseball and released by the Diamondbacks.

Grimsley also named retired Oriole David Segui, who previously acknowledged that his name was among those in the document. Segui told ESPN in June that he had received a prescription for human growth hormone because of naturally low levels. The trainer was Brian McNamee, formerly a team trainer for the Yankees and now the personal trainer for Clemens and Pettitte, according to the Times.

Grimsley played with Tejada, Roberts and Gibbons in 2005 and Clemens and Pettitte in 1999 and 2000 when he was with the Yankees. The charges against Clemens have received particular emphasis because Clemens, 44, has become the sport's measuring stick for fitness, durability and toughness.

"I just think it's incredibly dangerous to sit out there and just throw names out there," Clemens said yesterday before the Astros played in Atlanta, according to the Associated Press. "I haven't seen [the report], nor do I need to see it."

"I've been tested plenty of times. My physicals I've taken, they have taken my blood work. I have passed every test. Again, I just find it amazing that you can throw anybody out there."

Pettitte said he had a "great relationship" with Grimsley and was "stunned" by the report, according to the AP.

"I've never used any drugs to enhance my performance in baseball," Pettitte said. "I don't know what else to say except to say it's embarrassing my name would be out there."

Their agent, Randy Hendricks, noted that Grimsley has said through his attorney that he did not disclose names to federal investigators.

"Roger and Andy deny using performance enhancing drugs," Hendricks said in an e-mail. "Roger passed Olympic-standard blood testing for the World Baseball Classic this year. . . . He is a phenomenal baseball player who does not deserve to have his name bandied about in the public domain based upon an affidavit of an investigative agent to get a search warrant. Roger and Andy never worked out with Grimsley and Grimsley would have no personal knowledge of anything they did."

Grimsley said Clemens and Pettitte "used athletic performance-enhancing drugs" and Roberts, Gibbons and Tejada "took anabolic steroids," according to the affidavit signed by IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky, the Times reported. The newspaper said it was allowed to view the unredacted version by someone with "authorized access" to it.

"What can I do? I spent one morning last year with Grimsley," Tejada said yesterday before the Orioles played at Boston, according to the AP. "I mean, I already got thrown under the bus with [Rafael] Palmeiro. No, I don't worry about that."

The night before, Tejada told the Baltimore Sun: "I know that I've never had a problem with that. I know that I've never used that and I know I am clean."

Gibbons told the Sun he has never failed a drug test.

"And I am not going to dignify these claims and accusations with any further response," he said.

"Our players have addressed the accusations quite strongly and we support them," Orioles Vice President of Player Personnel Mike Flanagan said in a statement. "We have not seen the affidavit and therefore will not comment on it further."

US/Central Afghanistan Mulls Herbicide In Drug War (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

(AP) JALALABAD, Afghanistan With profits from this spring's record opium crop fueling a broad Taliban offensive, Afghan authorities say they are considering a once unthinkable way to deal with the scourge: spraying poppy fields with herbicide.

Afghans including President Hamid Karzai are deeply opposed to spraying the crop. After nearly three decades of war, Western science and assurances can do little to assuage their fears of chemicals being dropped from airplanes.

But U.S. officials in Kabul and Washington are pushing for it. And on Thursday the country's top drug enforcement official said he would contemplate spraying opium crops — even with airborne crop-dusters — if other efforts fail to cut the size of the coming year's crop.

"This year, we'll wait and see how it goes. Next year, the 2008 season, we will consider it," said Lt. Gen. Mohammed Daoud Daoud on the sidelines of an anti-poppy gathering in Jalalabad, the ancient and verdant capital of Nangahar province, once the heart of Afghanistan's poppy belt.

This year Nangahar was a success. Poppy cultivation stayed low amid a boom that saw Afghanistan produce 82 percent of the world's opium, providing for 90 percent of its heroin, according to U.S. and United Nations figures.

Opium eradication is one of the great failures of the five-year period since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. In 2000, under the Islamist Taliban government, Afghanistan produced virtually no opium.

Planting has skyrocketed since then, jumping 59 percent this year, enough to produce 6,700 tons of opium that fetched around $750 million for Afghan farmers and eventually sold for $50 billion on the street, mainly in Europe, according to a U.N. report.

Opium poppies have become Afghanistan's chief crop and economic mainstay even as Washington and Britain have pumped hundreds of millions of dollars into eradication schemes and complex efforts to create markets for legal crops.

In the meantime, drug money nourishes the insurgency. In the opium-rich southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, Taliban commanders protect growers in return for a 30 to 40 percent tax, which is spent to recruit fighters, experts in the region say.

Retired U.S. Gen. Barry McCaffrey, the Clinton administration drug czar, said crop dusters may be the only way to preserve Washington's project in Afghanistan, before drug profits undermine the country's elected government.

"We know exactly where these fields are. They're absolutely vulnerable to eradication. And it is immeasurably more effective to do it with an airplane," McCaffrey said by telephone from Virginia. "I've been telling the Pentagon, if you don't take on drug production you're going to get run out of Afghanistan."

But in Helmand, home to 42 percent of this year's crop, Daoud said it remains too dangerous to spray. A former mujahedeen commander, Daoud said the Taliban can down low-flying planes.

"They have rockets," the bearded general said, fingering a string of prayer beads. "We can't spray there."

U.S. and U.N. experts here say eradicating the drug from this Texas-sized country will take decades.

Inside Afghanistan, with just 150,000 opium users among its 30 million people, poppy eradication is seen as an outside issue. Two speakers at the counternarcotics conference here said it was more urgent to stop people drinking wine.

"We want all drugs banned. Not only poppy," said provincial council chief Fazal Hadi Muslim Yar.

If Karzai approves herbicide, he risks losing the support of 3 million people involved in poppy growing. But without eradication, he could see his government undermined by drug-funded insurgents.

Karzai has said in the past that herbicides pose too big a risk for families and livestock, contaminating water and killing grapes, melons and vegetables grown alongside poppies. But the president approved Afghan eradication teams that used tractors to eliminate thousands of acres of poppies this year.

"Anywhere we eradicate a field, we must immediately provide the farmer with an alternative livelihood," Karzai spokesman Khaleeq Ahmad said on Saturday.

Aerial spraying is especially feared. Rumors have coursed through farm communities blaming sicknesses on secret poppy spraying, said Mohammed Nabi Hussaini, the head of Afghanistan's Poppy Eradication Program.

"There were diseases in children who ate apricots and parents said they saw helicopters nearby," Hussaini said. "But how long can we wait? The longer you wait the more it will get out of control."

McCaffrey said crop-dusting with common herbicides like Roundup was key in drug eradication programs that found success in Thailand and Peru.

Crop spraying is not the preferred option of the United Nations, but would be considered as part of a broad rural development program, U.N. spokesman Dan Norton said on Saturday.

Tens of thousands of Afghan farmers are now making crop decisions, weighing options between poppies and Afghanistan's robust vegetables and melons.

For now, the government counternarcotics campaign is friendly. Afghan government officials held a tent rally at the former winter palace in Jalalabad. With 200 turbaned elders and clerics listening, Daoud urged them to snuff out the illicit trade before it turned Afghanistan into a narco-state.

"Addiction will destroy the young generation that is Afghanistan's future," Daoud told the crowd. "Once you're addicted you're a burden to your family."

Across Afghanistan, tougher action is coming. Counternarcotics officials warned local leaders that they will be fired if cultivation rises.

Finally, Kabul officials drove the message home using the twin pillars of God and honor. Assadullah Sajid, an imam in a starched white tunic and long beard, pointed forcefully at the elders and policemen, invoking the Quran and warning them not to disgrace Nangahar.

"Last year our governor was honored because we didn't cultivate," Sajid said sternly. "Let's keep that honor."

Councilman To Idaho Town: Get Your Guns (USAT)

By Gwen Florio

USA Today, October 2, 2006

The Town Council in Greenleaf, Idaho, is considering a recommendation that all households keep and maintain guns because of the crime that might come with the encroaching growth from nearby Boise.

To date, violent crime is nearly unheard of in Greenleaf, population 890, admits City Councilman Steve Jett, who proposed the ordinance the council will take up Tuesday. Even so, Jett says it's only a matter of time.

"The biggest thing I was looking at is preparation," Jett says.

When asked about violent crime in Greenleaf, which doesn't have its own police force, Albert Erickson, police chief of neighboring Wilder, says, "I don't remember any."

Erickson, whose department covers Greenleaf, finally recalled a domestic-violence complaint there last year. "But I don't even know that it went to court."

Boise is not exactly a hotbed of violence. Its violent crime rate last year was 383 per 100,000 people, below the national average of 469 but higher than Idaho's rate of 257 per 100,000, according to the FBI Uniform Crime Report.

Greenleaf's proposal is not surprising, especially in the West, says David Kopel of the Denver-based Independence Institute, a free-market think tank.

Kopel, author of The Samurai, the Mountie, and the Cowboy: Should America Adopt the Gun Controls of Other Democracies?, ranks Montana as the state with the strongest gun rights, closely followed by Idaho and Wyoming.

"These laws are more suggestive of culture and attitude than a real attempt to arm everybody," says Gary Marbut, president of the Montana Shooting Sports Association.

The Montana Legislature routinely considers resolutions urging residents to own guns. Aumsville, Ore., considered, but rejected, an ordinance similar to Greenleaf's proposal in 2001, a year after the tiny southern Utah town of Virgin passed one.

In a nod to Greenleaf's Quaker roots — it takes its name from Quaker abolitionist and poet John Greenleaf Whittier — Jett says his proposal is merely a recommendation, not a requirement like Virgin's. The wording exempts convicted felons, others prohibited from owning guns and those who object to gun ownership.

The ordinance is modeled on a 1982 law in Kennesaw, Ga., a town that, like Greenleaf, found itself becoming a suburb to a sprawling state capital. "It was basically the law heard 'round the world," says Kennesaw Mayor Leonard Church. He says he has received inquiries from as far away as Australia about Kennesaw's measure.

Although the law is largely a formality — "We don't go door to door, saying, 'Show me your gun' " — Church says studies show enactment of the law coincides with a marked drop in burglaries and violent crime.

Peter Hamm, spokesman for the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, says the group doesn't oppose Greenleaf's proposal.

"There aren't too many rural towns in Idaho where everybody doesn't already have a gun," he says. "And we fully support the right of law-abiding citizens … to own a firearm for self-defense, or hunting, or sporting purposes."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration In Herndon (WP)

CONGRESS LEFT town having failed to pass the comprehensive reform of immigration laws that President Bush claimed to want but didn't do much to promote at crunchtime. The failure leaves millions of illegal immigrants sought after by U.S. employers but with no path to legal status. The nation wants and needs their labor but can't bring itself to deal honestly with the situation. Among the victims of this hypocrisy and gridlock on the national level are the nation's local governments, which are left with little guidance in handling the challenges posed by rapid immigration.

You can get an early sense of how this increasingly will play out in Northern Virginia's town of Herndon, which is back in the news with more ideas on how to clamp down on illegal immigrants. The proposals are small-minded and, if enacted, are likely to be futile in resolving any problems. But we understand local officials' frustration with the federal government's inability to craft an immigration policy for the country.

Herndon is proposing to train local police to enforce federal immigration laws and to place new restrictions on businesses. Anyone seeking a business license would have to prove valid immigration status, and anyone wanting to do business with the town would have to show that workers for the business are in the country legally.

The new initiatives are, as one official conceded, an effort to just do something. But, toward what end, and at what cost? The business proposals duplicate existing laws. Letting the police officer on the corner take over the federal role in the complex world of immigration law could lead to heartbreaking mistakes and unintended consequences. People who look "foreign" to one police officer or another might become targets for unfair scrutiny. Many law enforcement authorities fear that such policies will chill relations with immigrant communities and, as a result, more serious crimes will go unreported and unsolved.

Officials in Herndon say they are still in the early stages of studying their proposals; let's hope that, instead of the emotion that shaped much of last year's debate on day laborers, a more analytical and reasoned examination will be undertaken. Congress would do well to take the same advice.

TAX:

Income Tax Cuts Benefit All Payers (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, October 2, 2006

Americans of every income have benefited from a drop in federal income tax rates as Bush administration tax cuts enacted since 2000 took effect, an independent analysis of newly released IRS data shows.

But those earning $75,000 to $500,000 are shouldering a larger share of total taxes paid as millions more of them earn higher incomes and get hit with the Alternative Minimum Tax, the analysis also found.

The review by the Tax Foundation, a non-partisan research group that favors low taxes, provides one of the first detailed looks at the impact of federal tax changes phased in between 2000 and 2004.

Alluding to the political debate that often surrounds tax issues, Gerald Prante, a Tax Foundation economist, said, "It is true that in dollar amounts the rich have gained the most. But everybody's tax rates have fallen."

The analysis showed, for example, that a taxpayer who earned $35,000 in 2000 would have paid 8.54% of that income — $2,989 after credits — in federal taxes. In 2004, federal taxes would have accounted for 5.12% of that taxpayer's annual income, or $1,792. That represents a 40% decrease in tax burden.

At the higher end of the income brackets, a $1.75 million earner would have paid $513,625 in 2000 federal taxes, when the rate for that earning bracket was 29.35%. Four years later, when the rate dropped to 25%, that earner would have paid $437,500. That represents a 14.8% cut in tax burden, the analysis shows.

Millions of upper-middle and moderately high-income earners also benefited from tax rate cuts. But the analysis shows their savings was limited by the Alternative Minimum Tax, which eliminates some deductions and credits they could otherwise claim on federal tax returns. The levy particularly hits those whose high state and local taxes become ineligible for federal tax deductions.

For instance, taxpayers who earned between $100,000 and $200,000 in 2004 paid 22.5% of all federal taxes, up from 19.4% four years earlier. Those who earned between $200,000 and $500,000 in 2004 paid 17.9% of all federal taxes, up from 15.4% in 2000, the analysis showed.

Prante said the federal government "cut ordinary income tax rates but left AMT alone. So the middle range (of taxpayers) ended up getting less of a reduction."

The Tax Foundation also found that:

•Millions of lower-income Americans — those earning $25,000 annually or less — have been taken off the federal tax rolls. In 2000, roughly 29 million tax returns had no federal tax owed. Four years later, the number rose to about 43 million returns.

The increase resulted from the doubling of the child tax credit from $500 to $1,000, as well as the Earned Income Tax Credit, a federal benefit program for low-income workers.

•Income for the highest-earning Americans dropped sharply from 2000 to 2002, following the end of the bull stock market of the late 1990s, then grew rapidly from 2002 to 2004 as the economy recovered.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Reconfigured Supreme Court Takes Up Cases (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., President Bush's two appointees, will have a chance to shift the law to the right on two charged issues — abortion and race — during the Supreme Court term that starts today.

The court will decide whether doctors can be prosecuted for using an abortion procedure that critics have labeled "partial-birth abortion." And it will rule on whether school boards can maintain integrated schools by assigning some students based on their race.

In the past, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor provided the fifth vote for majority rulings that struck down abortion regulations and allowed schools and colleges to use affirmative action. Now that O'Connor has been succeeded by Alito, the balance may tip the other way.

The session will also see the court take up global warming for the first time. Environmentalists are asking the justices to force the Bush administration to limit vehicle emissions believed to contribute to climate change.

Business lawyers and consumer advocates are closely watching another case involving cigarette maker Philip Morris to see whether the high court will strictly limit "punitive" damage verdicts against corporations.

And California's system for sentencing criminals is under attack. In recent years, the high court has said juries, not judges, should decide the key facts that call for longer prison terms.

In California, a judge may impose a longer prison term if certain "aggravating factors" are found.

If the court declares this sentencing system unconstitutional, thousands of state inmates could win the right to have their sentences reconsidered.

Abortion remains the most divisive issue before the court.

Until now, a 5-4 majority has held to the view that the government may not regulate abortion in a way that threatens the life or health of pregnant women.

Relying on that principle, the court six years ago struck down a Nebraska law that made it a crime for doctors to use a second-trimester surgical procedure that critics call "partial-birth abortion."

Some physicians, including litigant Dr. Leroy Carhart of Bellevue, Neb., seek to remove the fetus intact before cutting its umbilical cord. This procedure, known as D&X, for dilation and extraction, carries less risk of bleeding and infection than other procedures, the doctor maintains.

The high court, in a 5-4 decision upholding the practice, agreed with him in Stenberg vs. Carhart, saying that "significant medical authority supports the proposition that, in some circumstances, the D&X procedure would be the safest procedure."

The dissenters called the procedure "gruesome" and "horrific" and said it bore "a strong resemblance to infanticide."

Afterward, Congress passed the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, and President Bush signed it into law in 2003. Contradicting the court's conclusion, lawmakers said the disputed procedure was "never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother."

Judges in Omaha and San Francisco conducted trials and heard testimony from leading medical experts.

Both concluded that the disputed D&X procedure was a variant on the standard dilation and evacuation method of abortion at this stage of pregnancy. And both agreed with medical experts who said it was often safer.

"This is a medical matter, and the court has never deferred to Congress on a medical issue like this," said Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights, which is representing Carhart.

But U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said Congress' conclusion that the D&X procedure was not needed to protect women was "entitled to great deference."

The oral argument in Gonzales vs. Carhart is set for Nov. 8, the day after the elections.

The high court has also been closely split on race and affirmative action.

Three years ago, with O'Connor speaking for a 5-4 majority, the court ruled that colleges and universities may consider race in the admissions process to bring more diversity to the student body.

But the court's conservatives say schools and colleges should not treat students differently because of race, regardless of the reason.

The court agreed to hear a challenge to public school integration policies in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., that sometimes lead to children being barred from certain schools because of their race.

In Louisville, officials said at least 15%, and no more than 50%, of a school's students had to be black. The parent of a white child sued when her son was turned away from the school nearest her home.

Bush administration lawyers joined the case on the side of the parents and argue that "racial balancing" is unconstitutional. However, school officials say that because housing is segregated in many cities, they need to use race-based guidelines to maintain integrated schools.

If the guidelines in Seattle and Louisville are struck down, the ruling could affect several California districts. Last year, the Los Angeles Unified School District was sued by the Pacific Legal Foundation for using race as an enrollment factor in its magnet schools.

College officials will also be watching the outcome. A ruling striking down school integration policies will be seen as a signal that college affirmative-action policies are in danger as well.

The schools case will be heard Dec. 4.

The global warming case tests whether a coalition of states can force the Bush administration to take action against greenhouse gases.

This dispute, to be heard Nov. 29, turns on the words of the Clean Air Act, which says the Environmental Protection Agency must take steps to limit "any air pollutant" coming from cars and trucks that could "endanger public health or welfare," including changes in the climate or weather.

The EPA administrator refused to adopt new emissions standards for motor vehicles.

The agency's experts said that greenhouse gases such as carbon dioxide were not true air pollutants.

The court's decision could also determine the fate of California's newly adopted rules for cleaner vehicles to be sold in the state beginning in 2009. Those pending rules are also being challenged in lawsuits brought by the automakers.

"It will help California a lot if the court says carbon dioxide is an air pollutant," said UCLA law professor Ann Carlson, an expert on environmental law.

"It's also very significant if the states and environmentalists can force action on this issue when the administration is recalcitrant."

The punitive-damages case, which will come up Oct. 31, tests whether juries, acting on a single claim, can punish companies for wrongful behavior that may have hurt tens of thousands of people.

After Jesse Williams, a lifelong smoker, died of lung cancer in Oregon, his wife sued Philip Morris for fraud. A jury awarded her $21,000 in compensation for his death and $800,000 for pain and suffering. Then, to punish Philip Morris for concealing the dangers of smoking, it added nearly $80 million in punitive damages.

The Supreme Court has been searching for a way to limit these punitive awards, and three years ago said they rarely should "exceed a single-digit ratio between punitive and compensatory damages."

WASHINGTON — In the session that begins today, the Supreme Court is scheduled to consider a number of cases on hot-button issues, among them abortion and school integration.

Question: Can Congress outlaw a midterm abortion procedure referred to by opponents as "partial-birth" abortion?

Answer: Six years ago, the court on a 5-4 vote struck down a similar state ban on the grounds that it could threaten the health of some pregnant women. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, now retired, was in the majority, and she has been replaced by President Bush's appointee Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. (Gonzales vs. Carhart and Gonzales vs. Planned Parenthood)

Q: Can school districts maintain a racial balance in schools by limiting the percentage of white and black students, or does this use of race violate the rights of students who are excluded?

A: Lawyers challenging the integration guidelines used in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky., say any such use of race is unconstitutional. (Parents Involved in Community Schools vs. Seattle School District and Meredith vs. Jefferson County Board of Education)

Q: Can the Bush administration refuse to regulate the emissions of cars and power plants that are blamed for global warming, or does the Clean Air Act require the government to restrict such pollutants?

A: The court will hear an appeal from lawyers for Massachusetts, California and 10 other states that have demanded that the Environmental Protection Agency take action. (Massachusetts vs. EPA)

Q: Can juries award millions of dollars to a single plaintiff to punish a company for a pattern of wrongdoing?

A: An Oregon jury awarded $80 million in damages to the family of a longtime smoker who died of lung cancer. The Supreme Court has been searching for a limit on such punitive damages. (Philip Morris vs. Williams)

Q: Are immigrants convicted of drug possession subject to deportation under a strict federal law?

A: The 1996 law says immigrants who commit an "aggravated felony" are to be deported, and the government says low-level drug crimes are felonies. (Lopez vs. Gonzales, Gonzales vs. Duenas-Alvarez)

Q: Is California's system of sentencing criminals unconstitutional because it lets a judge increase a defendant's term based on "aggravating factors"?

A: In several recent rulings, the court has said juries, not judges, should decide the factors that call for longer sentences. (Cunningham vs. California)

For Supreme Court's New Term: Rise Of A New Centrist (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

Abortion regulations and race-based public school enrollment plans are among major national issues at the US Supreme Court this year in a term that offers the first real insight into the constitutional vision of the high court under Chief Justice John Roberts.

Constitutional scholars and other analysts are watching closely to see if respect for legal precedent - the principle of stare decisis - emerges as a defining approach, or whether the Roberts court will seek to build on the conservative agenda of the Rehnquist court, with sweeping rulings that erode or erase liberal precedents.

A major factor in the direction of the court, whose 2006-2007 term begins Monday, is Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is emerging as a primary centrist power on the court following the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Analysts say he may provide the swing vote in several key cases.

"The absence of Justice O'Connor will be one of the most fundamental changes the court has seen," former acting solicitor general and Duke Law School Professor Walter Dellinger told reporters in a recent preterm briefing.

"It is difficult to overstate the significance of that shift," said former solicitor general and Pepperdine Law School Dean Kenneth Starr, in the same briefing. "All eyes will be on Kennedy."

Justice Kennedy's new judicial clout will be on full display in both the race and abortion cases. Similar cases were decided by 5-4 majorities in recent years with Justice O'Connor joining the court's four liberal justices. In contrast, Kennedy dissented in both cases.

Last term was a year of historic transition for the court with the passing of Chief Justice William Rehnquist and the retirement of O'Connor. It marked the arrival of Mr. Roberts as chief justice and Samuel Alito as an associate justice.

The change in the high court's roster is expected to swing the balance of power to the right, possibly overturning legal precedents on a range of hot-button issues, including both the abortion and race cases, analysts say.

Although it is not clear how Roberts and Justice Alito will vote in these cases, many analysts suggest they are likely to align with the court's conservative wing and that Kennedy will be in position to provide the decisive fifth vote. Partial-birth abortion is key case

At issue in the abortion case is the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. The law was passed by the Republican-controlled Congress in open defiance of an earlier Supreme Court ruling that so-called partial-birth abortions could not be banned by states unless lawmakers provided an exception in cases where a woman's health might be threatened by the unavailability of the banned procedure.

Congress swept aside the court-imposed requirement by declaring in its law that there were no circumstances when a partial-birth abortion might be medically necessary. If no circumstances exist, lawmakers concluded, there is no need for a health exception. That Congressional finding disregards the testimony of some medical experts who say the procedure can be necessary in certain cases.

One key issue in the case is whether the high court should defer to Congress on what is medically necessary or set the standard itself.

Three district courts and three federal appeals courts have struck down the 2003 statute, ruling that it is unconstitutional because it fails to provide a health exception as required by the Supreme Court.

Despite universal defeat in the lower courts, supporters of the law hope that O'Connor's retirement and Alito's arrival may have tipped the balance of power on the issue.

In 2000, the Supreme Court struck down a Nebraska law nearly identical to the federal law by a 5-4 vote. Justice Kennedy wrote one of the most impassioned dissents of his 18 years on the court. "The majority views the procedures from the perspective of the abortionist, rather than from the perspective of a society shocked when confronted with a new method of ending human life," he wrote. He stressed in his dissent that he opposed "the decision, the reasoning, and the judgment." Will Kennedy stick to precedent?

With the possibility of the court divided 4-4 on the issue, Kennedy may wield the decisive vote. If he sticks to the analysis in his dissent in the Nebraska case, court watchers say the law will be upheld. If he adheres to his strongly held belief in stare decisis - affirming precedent even when a justice disagrees with it - the federal law will be struck down.

But Kennedy's dissent in the Nebraska case suggests another possibility. In 1992, Kennedy helped author a major abortion decision, Planned Parenthood v. Casey, which reaffirmed the central holding in Roe v. Wade that established a woman's right to choose to have an abortion. Part of Kennedy's contribution to the Casey decision was a guarantee that the states could regulate abortion procedures provided the regulations didn't create a substantial obstacle to obtaining an abortion. In his dissent in the Nebraska partial-birth abortion case, Kennedy complained that the five-justice majority swept aside the guarantee he apparently wrote into the Casey opinion.

Now, six years later, Kennedy could uphold the 2003 federal law under the theory that the same leeway guaranteed to state lawmakers in the 1992 Casey decision also exists for federal lawmakers. In effect, he would be applying stare decisis to his interpretation of Casey - an interpretation that would undercut the Nebraska ruling as being an unfaithful application of the 1992 Casey precedent. One complicating factor to this scenario, however, is Justice Antonin Scalia's insistence that the Casey abortion precedent (and Roe) must be overruled.

That's not the only complication. A federal abortion regulation runs counter to Kennedy's view of states' rights and federalism. Medical care is generally an area left to state regulation, not federal micromanaging. And some analysts question whether Congress has the power under the Commerce Clause to impose a national ban on a medical procedure that many states wish to retain.

The court will hear arguments on the partial-birth abortion issue on Nov. 8.

Kennedy may cast the deciding vote in the other potential megacase of the term. It involves race-based enrollment plans that seek to maintain integrated public schools in Seattle and Louisville.

The programs are aimed at balancing the racial composition of public schools by excluding whites and admitting blacks to white-majority schools and excluding blacks and admitting whites to black-majority schools.

Parents who want their children to attend their neighborhood school sued, claiming the programs violate the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment by using race to determine who can and who cannot attend certain schools.

The same 5-4 split that some analysts say may decide the partial-birth abortion case could also determine the school race cases. In 2003, the court upheld an affirmative action plan at the University of Michigan Law School. The justices split 4-4 on the issue, with O'Connor casting the deciding fifth vote.

Now Kennedy, who dissented in the Michigan case, could reverse or limit that 2003 holding by casting the deciding vote in the Seattle and Louisville cases.

The court's new term also includes a case examining the scope of government regulation to fight global warming, and a legal issue of keen interest to the business community - whether large punitive damage awards violate the Constitution's due process requirements. Key issues for the Supreme Court's new term

Abortion: Is the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003 unconstitutional because it lacks an exception in instances where the procedure is deemed medically necessary to protect a woman's health? Or should the courts defer to Congress's determination that the procedure is never necessary?

Race: Do race-based student enrollment plans in public schools in Seattle and Louisville violate the constitutional requirement of equal protection? Or are they justifiable efforts to achieve a better mix of black and white students in certain schools?

Federal regulation: Can the Environmental Protection Agency be forced by a group of environmentalists and certain states to regulate greenhouse gases emitted from motor vehicles and shown to contribute to global warming?

Punitive damages: Does a jury verdict ordering the Philip Morris tobacco company to pay $79.5 million in punitive damages to the widow of a former chain smoker violate constitutional guarantees of due process?

Free speech: Do unions have a First Amendment right to spend fees collected from nonunion members on partisan political campaigns when the nonmembers have not given their consent?

Criminal law: Should a 2004 landmark Supreme Court decision barring the introduction as evidence of out-of-court "testimonial" statements be applied retroactively in cases where defendants were not given an opportunity to cross-examine those witnesses?

Criminal law: Should another 2004 major Supreme Court decision be applied retroactively in cases where judges used evidence never presented to a jury to enhance a convicted criminal's sentence?

Federalism: Do state governments or the federal government have power to regulate state-chartered companies (like mortgage firms) that are subsidiaries of national banks?

Roberts Court May Be Defined In Second Term (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — If Year 1 was the transition for the new Roberts court, Year 2 is likely to be the test.

During the first term under the leadership of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., the justices were able to find common ground with some regularity by agreeing not to decide much. By the time the term ended in late June, the extent to which the members of the newly configured court were prepared to confront either precedent or one another remained unclear.

Chances are high that the new term, which begins on Monday, will be different. The cases that the court has agreed to decide — 38 so far — offer few off-ramps, requiring instead that the justices proceed to rulings that will define the new court in both substance and style.

Less than six weeks from now, for example, the court will hear the Bush administration's defense of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003. While there are some secondary issues, there is no escaping the fact that at the end of the day, the Supreme Court will have to declare whether the federal statute is constitutional. In doing so, it will have to grapple with the meaning of a 5-to-4 decision that struck down a similar state law six years ago. The administration will argue that if the federal statute cannot coexist with that precedent, the court should overrule the earlier case.

Two cases on whether public school systems can take race into account in maintaining balance in individual schools do not confront the court's precedents quite as directly. But coming only three years after a sharply divided court permitted the continued use of race in university admissions, the decisions in these cases will provide the first clear indication of where the center now lies on questions of race and public policy after the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Justice O'Connor held the balance of power on such questions for years, and wrote the opinion three years ago in the case from the University of Michigan Law School.

The business community is watching several cases closely, particularly an appeal of a $79.5 million award of punitive damages against the cigarette maker Philip Morris, upheld by the Oregon Supreme Court on behalf of the family of a smoker who died of lung cancer.

Of all the areas of Supreme Court doctrine most likely to be affected by the court's change in membership, punitive damages ranks high on the list. It is also something of a wild card, because the question of whether the constitutional guarantee of due process places any substantive limits on the award of punitive damages by state courts has divided the court in a way that follows no ideological pattern, and the inclinations of the new justices are unknown.

The consistent dissenters from the court's effort to curb punitive damages have been Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice O'Connor were in the majority in seeking to limit punitive damages. If their successors, Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., agree with the dissenters, the court's shift could be abruptly and bitterly disappointing to those encouraged by the court's halting but increasingly assertive steps in setting boundaries on punitive damages.

The new chief justice has made some notable administrative choices since the last term ended. As his administrative assistant, he hired Jeffrey P. Minear, a senior lawyer in the office of the solicitor general and a longtime familiar figure at the court.

The title of administrative assistant understates the role its holder plays in the day-to-day management of the court. Previous administrative assistants have come from a variety of backgrounds; Chief Justice Rehnquist's last assistant, Sally M. Rider, had held several top-level positions as a government lawyer. But none has ever been the chief justice's professional peer, as Mr. Minear clearly is. His 56 Supreme Court arguments, in fact, surpass Chief Justice Roberts's 39. Both men are the same age, 51.

In another development, the court has revised its practice of waiting two or three weeks to post argument transcripts on its Web site. Beginning on Tuesday (in observance of Yom Kippur, the court has scheduled no arguments on Monday), the court will post transcripts on the day of argument at www.supremecourtus .gov. While the court continues to resist television coverage of its sessions, the change is a step toward public access that would have been unthinkable only a few years ago.

These are some of the leading issues for the new term:

Abortion Rights

Two federal appeals courts, in St. Louis and San Francisco, declared the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003 unconstitutional, basing their rulings on the Supreme Court's decision in Stenberg v. Carhart, which struck down Nebraska's similar law six years ago. The new cases, Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380, and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382, are the Bush administration's appeals of those rulings.

The statute outlaws a surgical procedure that doctors use to perform abortions after about 12 weeks of pregnancy. In its decision six years ago, the Supreme Court held by a vote of 5 to 4 that the law had to take into account medical judgments that the procedure was sometimes necessary for a pregnant woman's health.

Congress responded by enacting a federal law without a health exception, declaring that the procedure was never necessary to protect a pregnant woman's health. Among other issues, the new cases therefore present the issue of the respective roles of Congress and the court in defining the scope of constitutional rights, an issue on which Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a dissenter in the case six years ago, has been particularly protective of the court's role.

Racial Quotas in Schools

Federal appeals courts upheld student assignment plans in Louisville, Ky. (Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915) and Seattle (Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1, No. 05-908). Both cities have long struggled to achieve integration, and now seek to maintain it by taking race into account in limiting students' choices of which schools to attend.

While many justices are wary of "this divvying us up by race," as Chief Justice Roberts phrased it in a voting rights case last term, the same justices also tend to support local education policies. The National School Boards Association is filing a brief supporting the school systems, while the Bush administration is arguing that the assignment plans are unconstitutional.

Punitive Damages Limits

The court has laid down various markers for curbing the discretion of state court systems to award punitive damages. In Philip Morris USA v. William, No. 05-1296, the Oregon Supreme Court upheld the $79.5 million award, nearly 100 times the compensatory damages a jury had awarded the smoker's widow.

This is far greater than the 10-to-1 ratio that the court's most recent decision, State Farm v. Campbell in 2003, suggested as the outer limit of due process. On the other hand, earlier cases concerned economic rather than physical injuries. The court's new membership aside, this case is sufficiently distinctive in several ways so as to make the outcome unpredictable.

Air Pollution Regulation

Two cases present interpretive issues under the Clean Air Act. In Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency, No. 05-1120, 16 states and other parties are challenging the Bush administration's view that Congress has not authorized federal regulation of motor vehicle emissions that contribute to global warming. The question in Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy Corporation, No. 05-848, is what the law requires of utility companies seeking to modernize aging power plants.

Court Ruling Fuels Dispute In West Over Eminent Domain (WP)

By Blaine Harden And Juliet Eilperin

SEATTLE -- Libertarians and land developers have found populist fodder in a contentious Supreme Court decision from last year that favors eminent domain over private property.

This fall, they are trying to harness anger over the ruling in an effort to pass state initiatives in the West and federal legislation that could unravel a long-standing fabric of state and local land-use regulations. Among other things, the rules control growth, limit sprawl, ensure open space and protect the environment.

The property-rights movement, as it is known, has a major new benefactor -- Howard Rich, a wealthy libertarian real estate investor from Manhattan. He has spent millions -- estimates run as high as $11 million -- to support initiatives that will appear on ballots throughout much of the West.

The initiatives -- and legislation approved Friday in the House -- have alarmed many city and state officials, along with environmental organizations, budget watchdog groups and smart-growth advocates. They complain about "bait-and-switch" tactics.

"They bait you with eminent domain, but you end up voting to destroy all land-use regulation," said Elaine Clegg, a nonpartisan member of the city council in Boise, Idaho.

Following the lead of an Oregon initiative that in 2004 derailed the nation's strongest laws against sprawl, measures this November aim to do much the same thing in Idaho, Arizona, California and Washington. They would compel state and local governments to pay cash to property owners when land-use rules, such as zoning regulations, reduce the value of their land. Some of the measures say that if government can't pay up, owners can develop their land as they see fit.

In Oregon, there is no money to pay claims that total $5.6 billion, so land-use rules are being waived. In Washington, passage of a "pay-or-waive" initiative could cost state taxpayers $7 billion to $8 billion in the next few years, according to studies by the state and the University of Washington. In California, where there is no provision to waive payment, Proposition 90 has aroused opposition from staunchly conservative groups such as the California Taxpayers Association, which is concerned that the initiative could cost the state billions of dollars, triggering tax increases and slow growth.

The federal bill, which was approved in the House by a vote of 231 to 181, would revamp land-use regulation nationwide, allowing developers and property owners to challenge local and state rulings in federal court, rather than in state court.

The National Association of Home Builders has been pushing the measure for years, but the Supreme Court's eminent-domain decision finally "brought the bill back into the limelight," said Jerry Howard, the association's chief executive.

The bill's author, Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio), who chairs the Judiciary subcommittee on the Constitution, said property-rights disputes that can drag on for years deserve speedy resolution in federal court.

"The Fifth Amendment says you can't take a person's property without due process," he said, comparing property rights with freedom of speech and freedom of religion.

Opponents of the bill, including 36 attorneys general and a slew of environmental advocates, say the measure will undermine state and local governments' ability to oversee growth and preserve open space.

In Idaho, a measure called Proposition 2 would halt eminent-domain seizures of the kind allowed by the Supreme Court in 2005 in Kelo v. New London . That ruling upheld the right of local governments to condemn private property and then hand it over to someone else for commercial development. Since Kelo , 26 states have passed laws that ban the use of eminent domain for economic development purposes.

But the Idaho initiative, as with others in the West, is about much more than just eminent domain. It would require state and local governments to compensate landowners for regulations that restrict what they can do with their land.

About three-fourths of the more than $330,000 spent to put Proposition 2 on the ballot came from groups funded by Rich, in a pattern of spending that has been repeated in many Western states.

Groups bankrolled by Rich have this year spent about $11 million in 12 states in support of measures to restrict land-use planning, cap state spending or limit judicial power, according to state campaign finance reports compiled by the Ballot Initiative Strategy Center, a Washington-based group that is supported by labor.

Rich was not available to comment on his spending or the goals of his property-rights groups.

John Tillman, president of one of those groups, Americans for Limited Government, declined in an e-mail to comment on the amount of Rich's spending, saying that campaign finance reports "speak for themselves." He did not dispute the $11 million figure.

Tillman did note that the Supreme Court decision in Kelo has alarmed the public, putting "everyone on notice that property rights are on shaky ground and that the time to act is now."

In some states, grass-roots opposition to land-use rules existed well before Kelo and before Rich began spending money. For the past 15 years in Washington state, the Washington Farm Bureau has fought laws that limit what some farmers can do with their land in heavily populated places such as King County, which includes Seattle.

In Oregon, which had been a national leader in land-use planning, the consequences of rolling back the rules are becoming clear. At last count, there were 3,038 claims by property owners involving more than 173,000 acres, according to a tally kept by Portland State University. Of the 2,630 claims that have been decided, 90 percent have gone in favor of landowners, with state and local governments waiving land-use rules. Most of the claims come from owners of what had been protected farm and forest land bordering fast-growing urban areas.

"The agenda behind these initiatives is to make it so expensive for local and state governments to regulate land use that they can hardly function at all," said John Echeverria, executive director of the Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute.

In recent weeks, courts in Nevada and Montana have knocked some initiatives off ballots. The Nevada ruling was on technical grounds, but a state judge in Great Falls, Mont., found "a pervasive and general pattern of fraud" in the gathering of signatures for three ballot measures aimed at reining in government power.

"A number of paid out-of-state signature gatherers used bait-and-switch tactics to fraudulently induce countless Montanans to sign petitions other than the petitions they thought they were signing," wrote Judge Dirk M. Sandefur.

The ruling has been appealed to the Montana Supreme Court. Nearly all of the money for signature gatherers came from Montanans in Action, which declines to reveal its donors.

Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer (D) has said that Rich is bankrolling the measures and has challenged him to debate their merits. Rich has not responded to this request nor to a similar debate offer from Gov. Ted Kulongoski (D) of Oregon, where Rich's money has been instrumental in putting a spending-cap initiative on the ballot.

Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! (TIME)

By Mark Thompson

Time, October 2, 2006

Counsel, sharpen your legal arguments. The Supreme Court returns for its new term this week, and it's expected to be a corker. This will be the court's first full term with Samuel Alito in Sandra Day O'Connor's old seat. And on the docket are a raft of high-profile cases on hot-button issues that should give the best indication yet of the decision-making dynamics and working style of the John Roberts era. Here's a look at what to expect.

1 UNANIMITY IS JOHN ROBERTS' GOAL

During Chief Justice Roberts' honeymoon term, about half the court's decisions were unanimous--nearly double the typical tally in recent years. This term, big cases on divisive social issues mean Roberts is likely to struggle to build such consensus. Still, he'll try in order to boost the court's "stature and legitimacy," he said in July. When the court can choose either a narrow but unanimous ruling or a sweeping, landmark decision by a 5-4 vote, he said, "I think it's better to decide on the former ground, and let it go at that."

2 ANTHONY KENNEDY, THE SWING JUSTICE

With Sandra Day O'Connor retired and his colleagues evenly divided, centrist Kennedy is the likely swing vote in tight cases. He began to play the role last term--with characteristic moderation. He sided with conservatives to limit the reach of the Clean Water Act but voted with the liberals to declare unconstitutional the Bush Administration plan to try alleged terrorists before military tribunals.

3 FLASHPOINT NO. 1: ABORTION

Watch for Kennedy's leanings in November, when the court hears arguments on the constitutionality of the 2003 federal ban on dilation-and-extraction (a.k.a. partial-birth) abortions. In 2000, when the court struck down a similar ban enacted by Nebraska, Kennedy voted with the minority. This time the question is whether he'll be swayed more by his aversion to abortion or his respect for precedent.

4 FLASHPOINT NO. 2: AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

In December, the court will wrestle with whether race can be used to assign pupils to public elementary and secondary schools. White parents from Louisville, Ky., and Seattle, backed by the Bush Administration, argue that using race as a deciding factor violates the constitutional right to equal protection. The most recent precedent: 2003, when the court ruled 5-4 that race could be used as a factor in admissions to public universities. Kennedy, who dissented in that case, could swing the decision the other way now.

Whose Court Is It Anyway? (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0072815

The Roberts court officially began last year, but the term that starts this week should give the first clear picture of what kind of court it will be. The docket includes major cases involving abortion, affirmative action and the environment.

The justices in the Supreme Court's now solidly conservative majority will be given a chance to prove what sort of conservatives they intend to be: those who issue rulings to match their personal ideology, or those who want to keep the court on a steady path by respecting precedent.

The cases that have so far attracted the most attention are a pair of challenges to a federal law that criminalizes so-called partial birth abortions. The law, passed by Congress in 2003, does not have an exception for procedures necessary to protect the health of a pregnant woman. The court struck down a nearly identical ban in 2000 by the State of Nebraska. That ruling was 5 to 4, and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor — the court's perennial swing vote before she retired — sided with the majority.

The "partial birth" cases should reveal a lot about the views of Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. If they are as hostile to abortion rights as many court watchers believe, there may now be five votes in favor of the ban, which could outlaw many second-trimester abortions and endanger the lives of women.

But if they are true to the statements they made at their confirmation hearings about respecting precedent, they should not want to reverse a decision the court made on this subject as recently as 2000.

The court has also agreed to hear a pair of challenges to admissions policies at K-12 public schools in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., that take race into account to promote diversity. These cases revisit many issues the court considered in 2003, when it upheld the University of Michigan's use of race in law school admissions. That was another 5-to-4 decision with Justice O'Connor casting the deciding vote. That ruling was right to say that schools should be able to take race into account, and the court should not change its stance now — opening the door to even more challenges to affirmative action.

Among the other important cases the court will hear is one about global warming. A group of states and environmental organizations have sued the Environmental Protection Agency for failing to do its duty under the Clean Air Act to regulate new cars' emission of carbon dioxide and other pollutants. The court can and should prod the Bush administration to do more to protect the earth from the buildup of greenhouse gases, by requiring it to enforce the law that Congress passed.

If Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito turn out to be conservatives with a deep respect for precedent, the court is likely to remain fairly centrist. But the biggest factor is likely to be Justice Anthony Kennedy, who began last term to fill Justice O'Connor's role as a voice of moderation. We hope he continues to do so.

Dues On The Docket (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

It's no secret that the political power and influence of U.S. public-employee unions derives from their ability to collect mandatory dues. But the issue of whether these forced dues can be used for political activities without explicit permission to do so from workers could use some legal clarification.

That might happen now that the Supreme Court has agreed to hear an appeal from the state of Washington, where even nonmembers of unions can be compelled to pay collective-bargaining dues as a condition of employment. In 1992 Washington voters overwhelmingly approved a so-called "paycheck protection" initiative that forbade unions from using compulsory fees of nonmembers for political purposes without their consent.

Nevertheless, the state teachers union, the Washington Education Association, continued to spend dues money on politics without permission, finally prompting a lawsuit from then-Attorney General Christine Gregoire in 2000. The state won that case, but the union ultimately appealed to the state supreme court, where it argued that the paycheck protection law was unconstitutional and the court agreed.

In its March decision striking down the law, the state court said that requiring consent to spend dues on political programs is "too heavy an administrative burden" for unions. The court also held, strangely, that the opt-in provisions of paycheck protection violate the First Amendment rights of the union. Why? Due to the "obvious, significant expense involved in complying with" the law, the court averred.

In other words, it is too burdensome to ask a teachers union to do what every other group in the U.S. must do if it wants to raise money for a political cause: Identify, contact and persuade people to contribute. This is the "burden" of groups on both the left and right -- from the Sierra Club to the National Rifle Association. This union exception isn't very persuasive, and we'd be surprised if the U.S. Supreme Court buys it.

In a landmark 1988 decision, Communications Workers v. Beck, the Supreme Court held that workers under union contracts couldn't be forced to pay dues for activities not directly related to collective bargaining. But enforcement, which falls to the Labor Department and National Labor Relations Board, has often been weak or nonexistent. Moreover, under Beck, workers must opt-out of their dues money going to partisan political causes. Many are unaware that they have this right, and unions have become expert at creating obstacles to discourage those who want to exercise it.

The temptation for the Justices in the current case will be to rule narrowly on the First Amendment issue raised by the Washington supreme court and stop there. But the Court could do a service for the country by addressing the issue more fundamentally. Six states have passed paycheck protection laws that organized labor has opposed vigorously. And in 28 states workers can still lose their jobs for not joining the union.

The High Court now has an opportunity to set some national guidelines regarding the constitutionality of both paycheck protection laws for nonunion workers and the more general practice of unions extracting money from any worker involuntarily. Let's hope they don't take a pass.

Archbishop's Call For Court Blessing Steers Clear Of Issues (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — Speaking to Supreme Court justices, cabinet members, politicians and hundreds of judges and lawyers gathered here on Sunday to celebrate a special Mass marking the start of the judicial calendar, Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl of Washington rejoiced in what he called the resurgence of faith in the shaping of public policy and urged those before him to remain rooted in their religion.

"What we do and how we act, our morals and ethics, follow on what be believe," Archbishop Wuerl told a standing-room crowd at the Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. Matthew downtown. "The religious convictions of a people sustain their moral decisions."

Officially called the Solemn Votive Mass of the Holy Spirit, "votive" indicating that it is being celebrated for a particular intention, Red Masses are held all over the country, typically at the start of a judicial year. The Supreme Court's new term begins Monday.

Worshipers ask for the blessing of the Holy Spirit on those who administer justice, in a tradition that goes back to 13th-century Europe. The service is called the Red Mass because of the red vestments clergy members wear.

This year, the Mass was celebrated by the new leader of the Washington Archdiocese, Archbishop Wuerl, to bless a Supreme Court that has a Catholic majority for the first time. The five Catholics on the court are Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia and Samuel A. Alito Jr.

All but Justice Alito were in attendance Sunday, as were Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; several other cabinet members; Mayor Anthony A. Williams; and Lt. Gov. Michael Steele of Maryland, a Republican candidate for the Senate.

Many non-Catholics attend Red Masses, as a sign of respect. Last year, President Bush came; generally, presidents attend at least one during their terms.

A procession of priests and bishops was followed by a police color guard. A Ralph Vaughan Williams hymn was followed by the national anthem.

Having earned a reputation as a skilled diplomat in his previous tenure as bishop of Pittsburgh, Archbishop Wuerl did not overtly talk about issues the church has championed, like prohibiting abortion, although the court this session will review the constitutionality of a ban on a type of late-term abortion.

Instead, he said the values formed by religion could not be separated from the insight and judgment brought to bear on law and policy.

"The two spheres, church and state, while distinct, are always interrelated," Archbishop Wuerl told the worshipers. "Politics, law, faith are mingled because believers are also citizens. Church and state are home for the same people."

For those who may have been looking for some clue to the archbishop's approach to political issues, he strode the range of Catholic social teaching without focusing on a particular topic, as he called for "speaking out against racial discrimination, social injustice or threats to the dignity of life."

Advocates on the right and the left have said that, historically, personal religious beliefs have not necessarily directed the way justices vote on a case. But when Justice Alito was confirmed in January, the news media and others noted the Catholic majority on the court.

Few may have raised the issue of the justices' religion if they had all been Methodist, for instance, said John H. Garvey, dean of Boston College Law School, in a telephone interview. But Mr. Garvey said it was valid to discuss the religious composition of the court because some people would assume the justices voted a particular way because of their Catholic faith.

"They are not a voting bloc," Mr. Garvey said. "The Catholic Church is a very big tent with people from the far left and the far right in it. The fact that the Catholic members of the court are center-to-right rather than center-to-left says more about President Bush than about the Catholic Church."

Lucia A. Silecchia, professor of law at Catholic University of America in Washington, said it was too soon to tell whether the Catholic justices held common views. "Where it gets complicated is that all five identify themselves as Catholic, but they aren't necessarily consistent with one another," Professor Silecchia said.

The Mass ended with "America the Beautiful" and the hymn "O God Beyond All Praising." The archbishop descended the altar and left smiling and chatting with Chief Justice Roberts.

Later, on the steps of the cathedral, two young men approached Archbishop Wuerl to have him bless their rosaries and to take pictures with him.

As the archbishop stood with one man, the other, holding the camera, said happily, "Here's to the union of church and state!"

The archbishop laughed, but gently corrected him. "No," he said, "remember, I said they were two distinct spheres."

Archbishop Stresses Ties Between Morality, Faith At Mass With Justices (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

At a Mass attended by four U.S. Supreme Court justices, Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl said yesterday that religious faith is an enduring "cornerstone" of American life and that morality and ethics "cannot be divorced from their religious antecedents."

The archbishop delivered the homily as he celebrated his first Red Mass, held annually as the Supreme Court convenes at which worshipers seek God's blessing and guidance for those who administer justice.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. sat in the first pew during the service at the Cathedral of St. Matthew of the Apostle in Northwest Washington alongside Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony M. Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was among five members of President Bush's Cabinet who attended the service, which began with the 1,000 worshipers rising and singing the national anthem and ended with "America the Beautiful."

One group that routinely seeks to hold prayer vigils outside the Red Mass was not allowed to get close to the officials in attendance.

On Thursday, a federal judge rejected the Christian group's claim that their faith demands that they demonstrate and pray in support of the public display of the Ten Commandments -- and that to do so properly they must be allowed to cross arbitrary security barriers around the cathedral. U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth said the group, led by Presbyterian Rev. Patrick Mahoney, Christian activist Troy Newman and the Christian Defense Coalition, could demonstrate but behind security barricades. No demonstrators, however, appeared immediately outside the church.

In his homily, Wuerl, who took over the Archdiocese of Washington in June, described spirituality and religious faith as an integral part of American life, one that endures even as some resist its place in political discourse.

"The assertion by some that the secular voice should alone speak to the ordering of society and its public policy, that it alone can speak to the needs of the human condition, is being increasingly challenged," Wuerl said.

"Looking around, I see many young men and women who, in such increasing numbers, are looking for spiritual values, a sense of rootedness and hope for the future," he said. "In spite of all the options and challenges from the secular world competing for the allegiance of human hearts, the quiet, soft and gentle voice of the spirit has not been stilled."

Religious faith, the archbishop said, has long played an important role in U.S. society, from the Mayflower Compact, which established law, to the Declaration of Independence. George Washington, he said, told Americans in his farewell address that "we cannot expect national prosperity without morality, and morality cannot be sustained without religious principles."

"What is religion's place in public life?" Wuerl asked. "Politics and faith are mingled because believers are also citizens. Both church and state are home to the very same people."

The Red Mass originated in medieval Europe and has been celebrated in the United States in New York since 1928. The service has been held annually in the District since 1953, sponsored by the John Carroll Society, a Washington-based organization for Catholic professionals.

Government Needs Faith, Wuerl Says (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

Catholic Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl yesterday invoked the legacies of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and their ideals of American law and religion while celebrating his first Red Mass, held each year on the Sunday before the Supreme Court's fall session.

"George Washington, after whom this city is named, was not the first, but perhaps the most prominent American political figure to highlight the vital part religion must play in the well-being of the nation," Archbishop Wuerl said at the 53rd annual Mass at the Cathedral of St. Matthew the Apostle in Northwest. "His often-quoted farewell address reminds us that we cannot expect national prosperity without morality. And morality cannot be sustained without religious principles."

Archbishop Wuerl also cited the Declaration of Independence and the writings of Thomas Jefferson, which he said were intended to be "an expression of the American mind and to give to that expression the proper tone and spirit."

Four Supreme Court justices and other government and Catholic officials were among the 1,500 people who filled the 111-year-old church for the 80-minute service.

Fire marshals had to close the church doors, off Rhode Island Avenue, shortly after the service began at 10 a.m. as a safety precaution for the overflow crowd.

The Red Mass is named after the clergy vestments and the color of fire, a symbol of the Holy Spirit. The masses began centuries ago in Rome, Paris and London.

The justices attending yesterday were Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., Anthony M. Kennedy, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, all Roman Catholics.

Other U.S. officials included Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Alphonso R. Jackson, Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael O. Leavitt and Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, who conducted the second reading of Mass.

The first reading was performed by Anita B. McBride, chief of staff to first lady Laura Bush.

Also attending were ambassadors from Argentina, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Ireland, Italy, Jordan, Malta, Norway, Portugal and Venezuela.

At conclusion of the Mass and as normal Sunday services began, the justices, other officials and their spouses went to brunch at the nearby Renaissance Mayflower Hotel for the presentation of awards by the John Carroll Society to two lawyers and a staff member for "outstanding volunteer legal services to low-income people in the Washington area."

Lawyers Kevin C. Fitzgerald and William E. Lawler III were recipients. Legal staffer Francine L. Higginbotham was honored for supervising and managing the taking of telephone calls from poor people needing legal services.

Last year, according to the archdiocese's Community Services, $10 million in free, legal services were provided to 6,000 needy people by more than 280 lawyers and 55 law firms.

High Court Justices Attend Pre-term Mass (AP)

AP, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — An audience that included four of the Supreme Court's Roman Catholics heard Washington's new archbishop on Sunday describe how religion has been a guiding principle in American history.

In a worship service traditionally held the day before the high court's new term, Cabinet members and foreign ambassadors joined the capital's legal community at the annual Red Mass.

Four of the five Roman Catholics on the high court — Chief Justice John Roberts, Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas — came to worship at the Cathedral of St. Matthew the Apostle.

Justice Samuel Alito, who gave Catholics a majority for the first time when he joined the nine-member court in January, did not attend the Mass.

In his first Red Mass in Washington since being appointed in May, Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl spoke of religion's relationship to public life.

"Morality and ethical considerations cannot be divorced from their religious antecedents," Wuerl said in his homily. "What we do and how we act, our morals and ethics, follow on what we believe. The religious convictions of a people sustain their moral decisions."

Wuerl said politics, law and faith mingle "because believers are also citizens. Church and state are home for the same people."

He called religious faith a "cornerstone in the American experience."

"May our religious faith, as a foundational part of our national experience, continue to nurture and sustain each branch of this society so that by its very connectedness to the vine, we can blossom and flourish," Wuerl said.

The service has been held at the cathedral since 1953 by the John Carroll Society, a group of Washington professionals who are Catholic.

Cabinet members attending the service included Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt and Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson.

Celebration of the Red Mass dates to the 13th century and is conducted to ask the Holy Spirit for guidance for those who seek justice. The Mass takes its name from the red vestments, symbolizing the Holy Spirit, worn by the celebrants.

The Supreme Court this term is dealing with familiar issues such as abortion and race. Bush's two conservative appointees, Roberts and Alito, give opponents of abortion and affirmative action reason to hope the high court will move in their direction.

Roberts, Gonzales Speak On Judicial Independence (LAW)

By Tony Mauro

Law.com, October 2, 2006

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. has made his strongest plea yet for judicial independence, even warning fellow conservatives to back off from attacking judges for unpopular decisions.

Speaking Thursday and Friday before a historic D.C. gathering of federal and state judges, lawyers, academics and business leaders aimed at preserving a "fair and independent" judiciary, Roberts recalled former President Ronald Reagan's definition of a judge's duties.

"The judge's commitment to the preservation of our rights often requires the lonely courage of a patriot," Roberts quoted Reagan as saying 25 years ago. "To the extent that attacks on judicial independence come from conservative quarters, I would commend to those quarters the words of the leading conservative voice of our time."

But Roberts also said attacks on the judiciary are "utterly bipartisan," and a key to warding off such attacks is to use "self-restraint" in decision-making.

"Judges are insulated from political pressure precisely because they are not supposed to be making political decisions but deciding cases according to the rule of law," said Roberts.

But the chief justice urged all to defend the judiciary. "Just as attacks on judicial independence come from all parts of the political spectrum, so should the defense of judicial independence."

At the same conference, sponsored by Georgetown University and the American Law Institute, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales offered similar remarks, defending the judiciary while warning judges not to overstep their authority.

"It is essential that judges be courageous enough to do the right thing, motivated solely by a respect for the law, undeterred by criticism or the possible outcome of the next election," said Gonzales. But he urged judges to retain "a proper sense of judicial humility."

Though he couched his comments in largely general terms, Gonzales went on to criticize high court rulings that have struck down Bush administration wartime measures. The Constitution gives the courts "relatively few tools" to intervene in military and foreign policy, Gonzales said, adding, "Judges must resist the temptation to supplement those tools based on their own personal views about the wisdom of the policies under review."

While blended with implied criticisms of some decisions, the defense of the judiciary by Roberts and Gonzales was a notable response from two top Bush appointees to recent sharp criticisms, mainly by Republican lawmakers, of federal judges. Even as the conference was getting under way, the House Judiciary Committee endorsed a bill that would create an inspector general to oversee disciplinary complaints against federal judges -- an idea that was bitterly criticized in corridor discussions throughout the conference.

But the conference also focused on problems facing state courts, besieged by increasingly costly and political judicial elections. Though the consensus of the more than 200 participants was that judicial elections should be eliminated, there was equal recognition that these elections are here to stay in most of the 39 states that have them.

Other areas of consensus were the need for enhancing jury service, increasing legal services to the poor, and improving public understanding of the courts. Participants urged the chief justice to give an annual "state of the judiciary" address that would highlight court developments in a visible way to parallel the president's State of the Union address.

Another measure urged by many, according to Stanford Law School professor Pamela Karlan, who summarized ideas offered by participants, was allowing broadcast coverage of Supreme Court hearings. "You are your own best advertisement for judicial independence," Karlan said to the justices in attendance.

The conference was conceived and launched by retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Justice Stephen Breyer. At various times during the day-and-a-half-long meeting, five other Supreme Court justices attended, along with numerous state chief justices. Seeking to expand the discussion beyond lawyers and judges, O'Connor also persuaded the likes of billionaire investor Warren Buffett and Washington Post Chairman Donald Graham to attend.

If O'Connor was the unstoppable force organizing the event, Breyer was its motivational speaker, offering an impassioned speech on Thursday that sought to explain the need for independent courts in terms that citizens could understand.

Fair courts, independent from politics and pressure, are the key to economic and political stability, Breyer said. "You want prosperity? You want judges." Businesses, he said, need to rely on enforceable contracts to expand.

And when the Court tackles controversial issues ranging from abortion to the outcome of a presidential election (as in Bush v. Gore), Breyer said the public's trust in the courts explains why its decisions will be obeyed. "No paratroopers -- none. No bullets. No rocks thrown in the streets. That's not what you do in the United States. It's the rule of law."

No Bill Too Small For GOP Incumbents In Tight Elections (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

In a bid to help embattled incumbents win tough reelection campaigns in November, House Republican leaders last week muscled through more than 165 bills that their members can use to win over voters back home -- and deflect attention from the scandals they left behind in Washington.

The scandal brewing around former Florida representative Mark Foley's inappropriate e-mails to teenage boys is only the latest in a series of indictments, resignations and accusations to rock Washington. In the face of such ill winds, House

Republican leaders have urged GOP candidates to focus their campaigns on local issues and personal accomplishments. The last days of legislating were devoted to giving the candidates the specifics to run on.

Dozens of the made-to-order bills that flew through the House bear the names of the endangered lawmakers, from Pennsylvania Rep. Jim Gerlach's Open Space and Farmland Preservation Act to Connecticut Rep. Christopher Shays's reauthorization of the HOPE VI housing program, to measures to preserve Native American languages and assist in water planning for Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.).

"If you've got people with must-do pieces of legislation, you want to help them out," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the vice chairman of the House Republican Conference.

To be sure, larding up bills for endangered incumbents is nothing new. But with money tight and only two spending bills completed, this year's efforts focused less on home-district spending and more on substantive measures tailored to specific constituents -- a "suburban agenda" for embattled Republicans in the suburbs of Philadelphia, bills to appeal to Christian conservatives for troubled Midwestern Republicans and expressions of independence for Republicans from districts that have turned against President Bush.

Kingston said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), in his first end-of-session rush in that post, proved masterful at filling blank spots on the House's agenda with long-sought legislation.

The name of Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.), one of the most threatened incumbents, was blazed across the Public Expression of Religion Act, which passed the House Tuesday and would deny legal fees to anyone winning a lawsuit to block the display of religious symbols in public places. The little-noticed "GOP Suburban Agenda" that cleared the House in recent weeks included eight bills, seven of which were authored by Republicans in jeopardy.

"People care about these issues," said Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick (R-Pa.), an endangered freshman who returned to Bucks County over the weekend to tout an "online predators" bill and a measure to promote charitable giving for open-space preservation to counter Democratic attacks that have been fixated on the war in Iraq.

"I've got the quintessential suburban district," Fitzpatrick said. "When I go home and go to the ball fields with my wife, this is what people want to talk about, parklands and 'my space.' "

On the campaign trail, such small-bore bills are likely to be featured far more prominently than the measures that captured more headlines in Congress's last days, such as legislation creating military commissions to try suspected terrorists, a House-passed bill authorizing Bush's warrantless wiretapping, final approval of a 700-mile fence on the U.S.-Mexico border, and bills covering port security, defense policy, military spending and homeland security funding.

Democratic campaign chiefs remain confident that such local measures will have little impact in an election year that they say remains a referendum on the president's leadership.

"There are forces bigger and more powerful at work," shrugged Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Democratic leaders have not let up in criticizing what they call a "do-nothing Congress," which has delayed action on a legion of big-ticket items. Despite personal promises from Republican leaders in the wake of influence-peddling scandals, changes to the rules governing lobbying were never made. Nine of 11 annual spending bills haven't passed. High-profile efforts to authorize Bush's warrantless wiretapping, open offshore areas to oil drilling and reform the rules on foreign investment after the Dubai ports fiasco all fell short of a presidential signing ceremony.

Bush's top three domestic priorities -- a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws, a remaking of Social Security and simplification of the tax code -- went nowhere. The minimum wage has not been raised for a decade. And the last, best chance for conservatives to virtually eliminate the estate tax permanently may have passed if Democrats gain seats in the House and Senate in November.

But in a year when National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) has implored candidates to resist national themes in their campaigns, major legislation may be beside the point, GOP aides say. Not when Rep. Chris Chocola (R-Ind.) will get money to deal with leaking underground storage tanks in his district, when Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.) will get to tout his National Dam Safety Act and when Rep. Mark Green (R-Wis.) can claim bragging rights for the transfer of national forest land to the towns of Laona and Wabeno, Wis., as he campaigns for governor.

"I asked for help and I got it," Gerlach said of the leadership's last-minute scheduling of a vote on his open spaces and farmland preservation bill. "It was legislation my district wants. It was something my legislative district has a need for."

The effort to achieve such successes went to extraordinary lengths last week, even almost bringing down a major defense policy bill. House and Senate negotiators nearly failed to reach agreement on the defense bill, not because of issues such as the prohibition on torture that held up the bill last year, but because of an issue that had nothing to do with national defense -- a measure to clamp down on illegal immigrant gangs.

During a rare news conference, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) publicly challenged Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), saying he would not bring the defense policy bill to the House floor without the gang provision. Asked why Hastert had singled out the gang measure for his stand, one senior House leadership aide pointed to the person standing next to the speaker: freshman Rep. David G. Reichert (R-Wash.), the provision's author, who is running neck-and-neck with Microsoft executive Darcy Burner.

In the end, Hastert relented, but he offered Reichert a promise to be used on the campaign trail. The gang measure will be one of the first revisited when Congress returns after the election.

Trading Votes For Pork Across The House Aisle (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — For more than a decade, Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania has operated a political trading post in a back corner of the House of Representatives.

A gang of about two dozen Democrats mill around his seat. A procession of others walk back to request pet spending projects, known as earmarks. And Republicans come by, asking him to enlist some of those Democrats to join them on close votes. “Whether they get what they want in the bill or they get the votes they are looking for, nobody ever leaves completely disappointed,” said Representative Paul E. Kanjorski, a Pennsylvania Democrat often found in what is known as the Murtha corner.

Outside Washington, Mr. Murtha, a Vietnam veteran and longtime hawk, may be best known for his break with the president over the Iraq war last fall. But inside the Capitol, he is best known for turning earmarks into power. As the top Democrat on the House military spending subcommittee, he often delivers Democratic votes to Republican leaders in a tacit exchange for earmarks for himself and his allies.

In the last year, Democratic and Republican floor watchers say, Mr. Murtha has helped Republicans round up enough Democratic votes to narrowly block a host of Democratic proposals: to investigate federal contracting fraud in Iraq, to reform lobbying laws, to increase financing for flood control, to add $150 million for veterans’ health care and job training, and to exempt middle-class families from the alternative minimum tax.

In one case that particularly irked Democratic partisans, Mr. Murtha led three others in voting against a politically vulnerable Louisiana Democrat’s proposal to divert money intended to be spent on base closings to research prosthetic limbs for veterans. It failed by one vote.

For their “nays” on that and other matters, all four Democrats were rewarded. In the weeks after the vote, they claimed credit for a total of more than $250 million in earmarks in the 2006 appropriations bills. Mr. Murtha alone brought home about $80 million for his district and $120 million for his state, according to Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan group that tracks such projects.

Mr. Murtha, who announced a bid this spring to become the next House Democratic leader, acknowledges that some Democrats grouse about his history of leading others across the aisle. (Several Democrats said as much, but none would speak publicly.) He confirmed working with Republicans on the Iraq war spending vote that blocked the Democratic corruption investigation, but said he did not remember the others. He said he always acted on principle, working with Republicans either because he agreed with them or to uphold private agreements about spending bills.

"You just need to get the things done, so you give them the votes to get the things done," he said in an interview. "There is no question that some projects come out of it for our members, and that is not a bad thing." He added, "Deal making is what Congress is all about."

Mr. Murtha can punish lawmakers, as well. Those who do not support the defense spending bill, for example, discover their next earmark requests go nowhere. "Let me tell you the facts of life," Mr. Murtha said he tells balky legislators. "If you vote against this bill, you won't have any input at all the next time."

Earmarks — often buried deep in complex bills by unidentified lawmakers — have come under new scrutiny since the conviction last fall of Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican on the defense-spending panel who accepted more than $2.4 million in bribes from contractors. The cost of earmarks has tripled in the last decade to about $64 billion a year, according to the Congressional Research Service. Mr. Murtha and other lawmakers say many earmarks are worthwhile, but critics charge that they waste taxpayers' money, encourage cronyism and foster self-dealing.

Some members of Congress complain that earmarks corrupt lawmaking in other ways. "They are used as internal bribery in order to get members to vote for a piece of legislation they wouldn't ordinarily give two minutes to," said Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee.

No one is more adept at such trading than Mr. Murtha, say current and former members, Congressional aides and outside observers. "He delivers Democrats for key votes, which increases his clout and ability to get more earmarks, which then increases his ability to get Democratic votes," said Steve Ellis, a vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense.

Mr. Murtha leans right on abortion rights and gun control but left on labor, tax and economic issues. And he consistently opposes ethics reform or disclosure requirements, including a proposal this year that would have required lawmakers to sign their names to earmarks, on the grounds that voters police lawmakers' actions.

He has sided with Republicans 169 times on close votes since 1994, more often than all but three of the most conservative Democrats. Many of those votes have been on nonideological but politically pivotal questions. For example, Mr. Murtha has often led members from his corner crowd to vote for procedural rules that limit potential amendments or debate on Republican bills — votes that typically follow party loyalty.

Dick Armey, a former Republican majority leader, said his party's strategists would often tell him, "Murtha will get us some votes."

At 74, Mr. Murtha remains an imposing figure: 6 feet 3 inches tall, with giant hands spread wide as he talks and size 12 shoes stuck out into the aisle. His corner perch is the only seat informally reserved for an individual lawmaker. "No one else dares sit there," said Representative Mike Doyle, a Pennsylvania Democrat and Murtha protégé.

He can also be very persuasive, thanks to his position on the spending committee. "If Jack Murtha tells you he needs your vote, then you would have to think very hard before not delivering it," said Representative James P. Moran, a Virginia Democrat who sits on the subcommittee and in Mr. Murtha's corner. "There are just too many chits out there."

Members have watched with envy as Mr. Murtha has used earmarks to remake Johnstown, Pa., an impoverished former steel town that now includes a Murtha highway, a Murtha airport and Murtha health centers. He has steered billions of dollars to his district over the years, including more than $80 million in the defense spending bill passed Friday, according to a preliminary tally.

Mr. Murtha's patronage has transformed Johnstown into a national hub of the defense business, attracting giants like Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman. He even built one contractor from scratch. In 1988, Mr. Murtha asked the chancellor of the University of Pittsburgh to set up a nonprofit that could use Navy money to establish a Center for Excellence in Metalworking in Johnstown.

Since then, Mr. Murtha has delivered earmarks to the organization, now called Concurrent Technologies Corporation, for work like consulting on counterterrorism, designing ejection seats for pilots and developing software. The military and other federal agencies have paid Concurrent nearly a billion dollars in grants and contracts since 1999. In the most recent defense bill, Mr. Murtha inserted $1.3 million for Concurrent to research Army tank designs.

"It is Murtha's pet rock," said Stephen Gage, chief executive of an Ohio economic development organization that once worked with Concurrent.

Concurrent's executives, in turn, have given more than $114,000 to the congressman's campaigns over the last three elections, making it one of his biggest corporate donors. The organization pays about $500,000 a year to a lobbying firm, the PMA Group, whose executives and clients have given Mr. Murtha more than $1.2 million in donations since 1999.

Mr. Murtha's brother, Kit, recently retired from a smaller lobbying firm, KSA Consulting, that sought defense earmarks and represented many companies in Mr. Murtha's district. From 1998 through 2003, he received more contributions from military contractors than has any other member of the House, according to the Center for Public Integrity, a nonpartisan group.

Elected to the House in 1974, Mr. Murtha learned the politics of parochial projects from former Speaker Tip O'Neill, who named Mr. Murtha to the defense appropriations subcommittee and used him as his eyes and ears on the floor.

He survived a brush with scandal during the 1980 Abscam investigation, when he did not accept but did not rule out taking a $50,000 bribe from undercover agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation; he eventually became a cooperating witness.

After becoming chairman of the defense spending panel in 1989, Mr. Murtha imposed a new discipline. Previously, the House often debated defense spending bills, which account for about half of federal discretionary spending, for weeks of contentious amendments and speeches, both in the committee and on the floor. Most Democrats often voted against the measures. "It took day after day after day," Mr. Murtha recalled.

Not any more. Mr. Murtha installed a new system that the Republicans have continued: the chairman and ranking member work out the details behind closed doors, pack the bill with plenty of earmarks, and link future projects for members to their support for the bill. The appropriations committee now typically debates and approves the bill in less than eight minutes and the full House in less than half an hour. (The $437 billion measure passed last week took under 20 minutes.)

"The defense community has some presence in almost every Congressional district — or so long as you vote for the bill, it does," said Mr. Moran, the Virginia Democrat. Mr. Murtha would "see to it" that members understood that those with earmarks in the bill who considered voting against it "better set their sights lower the next time," Mr. Moran said.

Mr. Murtha gave up the chairman's gavel when the Republicans took over the House in 1994 but managed to retain an unusual share of power. He has sole authority to grant nearly half the panel's earmarks and decide on all requests from Democrats, he said. Many minority appropriators work closely with their subcommittee chairmen, but Mr. Murtha's collaboration was especially close. He has worked for decades as a partner with the committee's senior Republicans. He still receives frequent visits from Representative Jerry Lewis, the California Republican who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee and is now under scrutiny in a federal investigation that grew out of the Cunningham scandal.

Mr. Murtha has used his influence in the caucus to place friends in strategic positions on appropriations committees and other House panels. Representative Nancy Pelosi, a California liberal who is the current Democratic leader, is a close Murtha ally. He put her on the appropriations committee early in her career and managed her campaign to be leader.

His friends say Mr. Murtha often guides their votes, especially on defense matters. "He is sort of like the general and we are the lieutenants," Mr. Doyle said.

Mr. Murtha takes care of his troops. Beginning with $1.5 million in 2003, for example, he has earmarked several million for the Doyle Manufacturing Technology Center to help lure military contractors to Mr. Doyle's district.

Mr. Kanjorski, the Pennsylvania Democrat, said he had help on "8 to 10" projects, including a $9.5 million deal four years ago for research by a firm partly owned by his nephews. In an interview, Mr. Kanjorski said his relatives "just happened to be the only people who would take responsibility" for developing the technology, which involved using water jets to pulverize materials. He said he recently gave Mr. Murtha a pair of high-tech disease-resistant socks made with silver fibers by a company in his district. After padding around in them, Mr. Kanjorski said, Mr. Murtha was so pleased that he agreed to an earmark to buy them for soldiers.

Other lawmakers have learned not to cross him. Aides to Representative Allyson Y. Schwartz, a freshman from the Philadelphia suburbs, say she has become a regular in the Murtha corner in part because her predecessor, a reform-minded Democrat who sometimes clashed with Mr. Murtha, suffered in his ability to obtain earmarks. In contrast, Mr. Murtha has helped Ms. Schwartz obtain a $7 million contract for a local defense firm and $150,000 to refurbish a historic inn in her district.

A spokeswoman for Ms. Schwartz said only that "she is proud of her relationship with Mr. Murtha." (The predecessor, Joe Hoeffel, now a Pennsylvania development official, acknowledged disagreements with Mr. Murtha but said they had worked well together.)

Mr. Murtha said he and his staff did their best to vet every earmark request but ultimately relied on the judgment of the members. He said he always asks, "Is this worthwhile not only to your district but to the country?"

Since Mr. Murtha announced his ambition to become party leader if the Democrats take the House this fall, supporters of his rival, Representative Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who is the party's whip, have begun quietly questioning Mr. Murtha's deal making. They argue that Mr. Murtha's pacts with Republicans should disqualify him for the job. Mr. Hoyer declined to comment.

Mr. Murtha, for his part, argued that his experience brokering votes would be an asset if Ms. Pelosi became the speaker. Running the House with a slim majority would require bipartisanship and party discipline. "I come across a little tougher," he said. "And I do have a lot of people that vote with me on an awful lot of issues."

GSA Will Try To Fix Procurement Problems With A New Service (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Legislation that would permit the General Services Administration to revamp troubled operations and create a new purchasing service has been sent to the president for his signature.

Once the bill is signed, the GSA will roll out a new Federal Acquisition Service, which will combine the agency's Federal Supply Service and Federal Technology Service. Officials plan to have the FAS operating within 60 days after President Bush acts.

Sponsors of the legislation, including Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) and Sens. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) and Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), hope the reorganization will help improve the agency's financial controls and make for more efficient purchasing of services, equipment and supplies used by federal agencies.

In recent months, the GSA has been tagged as a problem agency. Its business began slumping in fiscal 2004, and the technology service began operating in the red. Some field offices were investigated for improper contracting activities; some federal agencies became dissatisfied with GSA services and took their business elsewhere.

Lurita Alexis Doan , who took office as the head of the GSA in May, is moving to restore morale at the agency and contends that most agencies would be better served if they stick to their primary missions and let the GSA handle procurement. She has recruited a commissioner for the new FAS, Jim Williams , an experienced project manager who has worked at the Department of Homeland Security and the Internal Revenue Service.

Most federal agencies rely on congressional appropriations for their programs, but GSA obtains most of its funding by contracting on behalf of federal agencies. It buys goods and services each year from the private sector and resells them to agencies, charging a fee for its management services.

The agency's technology service buys computers, software and telecommunications for the government, and the Federal Supply Service buys vehicles, property and general supplies. Congress hopes that consolidating the two services and their funding streams into the new FAS will help the GSA resolve its budget problems.

The GSA projects a loss of $96 million to $110 million for fiscal 2006 in the technology service but will not have a tally until financial statements are compiled in mid-November, officials said. Part of that loss stems from a decision to write off a $71 million in-house contract management system, GSA Preferred, that had not met expectations.

In hopes of breaking even in fiscal 2007, which began yesterday, the agency has cut costs -- dropping some internal projects, cutting back on travel and canceling some support contracts.

About 150 GSA employees have taken cash buyouts, which also will help reduce the agency's costs in the coming year. The GSA, which has about 13,000 employees, hopes to avoid staffing cuts if it can improve its financial outlook.

Sponsors of the reorganization legislation hope that creation of the FAS will help the GSA better coordinate how it buys and sells products and services. With the merger of the GSA's technology and general supply funds, officials expect more sales to federal customers. The two funds handle about $56 billion in annual sales and produce revenue of $7 billion to $8 billion to cover GSA operating expenses, officials said.Saving Money on a Move

Congress has extended a test program for reimbursing federal employees who are directed to move to new duty stations. The experiment, authorized for four years, gives employees more flexibility in arranging their moves and, based on previous trial runs, should reduce the government's costs.

Under travel rules, employees are entitled to reimbursement for certain expenses, including real estate and settlement costs and the transportation and storage of household goods. The government provides relocation assistance to about 28,000 civil service employees a year at an estimated cost of more than $800 million, according to a Senate report accompanying the bill.

The FBI and U.S. Customs and Border Protection reported substantial savings when they allowed employees to volunteer for a fixed-rate reimbursement, the report said.

For example, Border Patrol agents were offered $5,000 to $20,000 as a lump-sum payment for relocating during a 2004-05 test project. The average cost for a move was $16,888 during that period, much less than the average historical cost of $72,000 under federal travel rules, the report said.

The bill, sponsored by Collins, has been sent to the president for his signature.

Study Finds Missed Messages On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

When citizens send e-mails to their congressmen through the Web sites of lobby groups, they expect those messages to zip electronically to the place they intended.

It turns out that isn't always the case.

A new study by a company that routes thousands of these e-mails to Congress shows that plenty of constituent e-mails never reach lawmakers' offices.

"Citizens would be understandably upset if they knew that letters they sent through the U.S. Post Office were never delivered," writes Dennis W. Johnson, a George Washington University professor who oversaw the study for the e-mail company, Capitol Advantage. "Unfortunately, there is strong evidence that much of the electronic mail that citizens assume is reaching Congress is ending up in an electronic trash can."

Congress has had an e-mail problem for years. It is deluged with an estimated 200 million constituent messages annually, the vast majority of them electronic. The number is so large and is growing so quickly that lawmakers are desperate to find ways to throttle the volume.

The number of e-mails has mushroomed in part because of the now-common practice among interest groups to rally their troops via cyberspace. Generally, a lobby will send an e-mail to its most eager members, which directs them to a Web site. Once there, the members fill out a form that routes to lawmakers e-mails that advocate whatever it is the group is pressing for at the moment.

Lawmakers have come up with ingenious methods to undermine the effectiveness of such programs. As readers of this column know, some congressional offices are now insisting that would-be e-mailers solve a simple math problem (to prove they are real human beings and not some machine spamming them with the push of a button). Many offices are also demanding that constituents disclose what issue they want to communicate about and to reveal information about themselves: Zip code, street address, e-mail address, phone number and the like.

Now we know that these efforts are working well. According to the Capitol Advantage study, six of the 10 leading companies that run Web sites that send e-mails for interest groups failed to deliver even half of those e-mails through their systems.

That is a big disappointment. After all, aren't public officials supposed to be open to the public?

The survey wasn't as comprehensive as I might have liked and the companies that set up the Web sites are disputing its findings. But its overall conclusion is difficult to contradict: Lobby organizations are having a hard time getting e-mail to Congress.

"There's a lot of resentment toward us on Capitol Hill," said Bill Pease, chief technology officer of GetActive Software Inc., a vendor of public policy programs for the Web.

Lawmakers tend to think that e-mail communications and, in fact, almost all mass mailings are fake and can easily be disregarded, several executives said.

To get around the hurdles, Web site operators have taken to faxing the e-mails to legislators. For example, the Business Industry Political Action Committee, or BIPAC, routinely faxes to Congress messages that started out as e-mails typed into its sites by constituents. So does Democracy Data & Communications LLC, which also runs regular hand deliveries to Capitol Hill so it can be doubly sure that messages reach targets.

All of this, of course, is absurd. Electronic messages are being delivered on paper. Many of the missives that actually reach their targets are not accorded attention by the people who matter. Faxes, in particular, have low credibility with lawmakers.

Which leads to the more interesting question: Can democracy be conducted through shortcuts?

The Internet allows interest groups to mobilize their members with incredible ease and speed. Hundreds, even thousands of messages can be directed to individual lawmakers with a single, well-placed e-mail alert to trained zealots back home. Even with the obstacles placed in the way of these communications, e-mails roll into Congress at an amazing rate.

So amazing, in fact, that it is possible that lawmakers have become inured to the sheer volume and have learned not to care as much about them.

An earlier poll of congressional staffers, also underwritten by Capitol Advantage, touched on this. It discovered that half of the aides it surveyed thought the folks whose names were attached to the e-mails they receive aren't aware that the e-mails were sent to Capitol Hill. Another 25 percent of staffers questioned whether those communications were legitimate.

That strikes me as the bigger issue: Not whether every e-mail is getting through to Congress but how many of them are being read with serious interest. I bet a closer look at that issue would be even more unsettling to Web site operators and their clients than the latest estimate of delivery rates.Qorvis Branches Out

Qorvis Communications LLC has bought Sparky's Garage. No, the fast-growing public relations firm isn't going into the auto repair business. Sparky's Garage is a local advertising firm, and Qorvis has bought the seven-person shop in the belief that commercials will play an ever larger role in lobbying.

But not just any commercials. "A lot of issue advertising turns out to be very expensive memos to Congress or the administration," said Qorvis's Michael J. Petruzzello. "And it's hard to quantify if it's reaching its target audience and whether it's effective."

Sparky's Garage, now known as Qorvis Advertising, "will bring a fresh approach to issue advertising," Petruzzello promised, by integrating its commercials with the Internet and grass-roots lobbying. And adding some pizzazz.

The five-year-old ad agency's founder Bill Replogle (who called himself the chief mechanic) has worked on accounts that range from Harley-Davidson to the Washington Nationals. Those kind of clients don't normally cross paths with public policy types. But maybe the mixture will wake up the Washington wonks. That's what Qorvis is betting.

Treating War's Toll On The Mind (USN)

By Betsy Streisand

U.S. News and World Report, October 1, 2006

Thousands of soldiers have post-traumatic stress disorder. Will they get the help they need?

As they take their seats in the movie theater, Eric and Raquel Schrumpf could be any young couple out on a summer night in Southern California. No one notices as Schrumpf, 31, a former Marine sergeant who served in Iraq, scans the rows for moviegoers who may be wired with explosives under their jackets. No one pays attention as a man who appears to be Middle Eastern, wearing a long coat with bulging pockets, takes a seat in the same row as the Schrumpfs and Eric starts watching him intently. No one listens as Schrumpf instructs his wife to "get as low to the ground as you can if something happens." Then something does. Schrumpf hears metal jangling as the man reaches into his pocket. Convinced he is a suicide bomber about to strike, Schrumpf lunges at him. The man jerks away and his deadly weapon falls to the floor: a can of Coke.

Schrumpf has everyone's attention now, as he and his wife quickly leave the theater. The Schrumpfs can't even remember what movie they went to see. Not that it would have mattered. Eric Schrumpf had room for only one movie in his head, the one where he is in Iraq. Now, more than two years later, Schrumpf has a good job, a strong marriage, a couple of pets, and a life that looks startlingly like everyone else's in Orange County, Calif. But he is still never more than a sound, smell, or thought away from the war. He gets anxious in a crowd, has been known to dive for cover, even indoors, at the sound of a helicopter, reaches for nonexistent weapons to be used in nonexistent circumstances, and wakes up screaming from nightmares about burning bodies and rocket-propelled grenades. "I'll never be the same again," says Schrumpf, who as a weapons and tactics instructor with the 5th Marine Regiment was part of the initial push into southern Iraq in 2003. "The war will be part of my life and my family's life forever."

Reliving the war. Like thousands of soldiers who have returned from Iraq and Afghanistan, Schrumpf is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, a chronic condition whose symptoms include rage, depression, flashbacks, emotional numbness, and hypervigilance. It can be brought on by a single event, such as when a grenade landed next to Schrumpf, ticking off his death and then failing to explode. Or it can be the result of repeated exposure to trauma such as house-to-house firefights or the accidental killing of civilians. "Soldiers who are routinely exposed to the trauma of killing, maiming, and dying are much more likely to bring those problems home," says Army Col. Kathy Platoni, a clinical psychologist and leader of a combat stress-control unit that works with soldiers on the battlefield. At its most basic, PTSD is the inability to flip the switch from combat soldier to everyday citizen and to stop reliving the war at so high a frequency that it interferes with the ability to function.

The problem is as old as war itself. But this time, American soldiers have been assured by the government and the military that the solution will be different: Iraq will be nothing like Vietnam, with its legacy of psychologically scarred veterans whose problems went unrecognized, undiagnosed, and untreated. "The hallmark of this war is going to be psychological injury," says Stephen Robinson, a Gulf War vet and director of government relations for Veterans for America in Washington, D.C. "We have learned the lessons of Vietnam, but now they have to be implemented."

Since the war began, the departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs have stepped up efforts to address the mental health needs of soldiers before, during, and after they are deployed. And more effective treatments for PTSD have been developed. But as the war drags on, the psychological costs are mounting and so is the tab for mental health care. Troop shortages are driving already traumatized soldiers back into combat for three and sometimes four tours of duty. Those who make it home often feel too stigmatized to ask for treatment lest they jeopardize their military careers. And if they do ask, they often can't get the care they need when they need it.

In addition, there are concerns among veterans groups that the Bush administration is trying to reduce the runaway cost of the war by holding down the number of PTSD cases diagnosed (and benefits paid), and that the promise to protect the mental health of nearly 1.5 million troops is not being kept. "Throughout this war, everything has been underestimated-the insurgency, the body armor, the cost, and the number of troops," says Paul Rieckhoff, an Iraq war vet and founder of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America in New York. "Now, the psychological problems and the needs of these soldiers are being underestimated, too."

Just how many troops will bring the war home with them is impossible to know at this point. But the numbers could be substantial. In a study published in 2004 in the New England Journal of Medicine, researchers at the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research found that nearly 17 percent of soldiers who have returned from Iraq, or nearly 1 in 6, showed signs of major depression, generalized anxiety, or PTSD. A report in the Journal of the American Medical Association earlier this year found that 1 in 5 soldiers met the risk for concern. And those numbers are virtually certain to grow as the war enters its fourth year. "I do think we're going to see a whole lot more PTSD as time goes on," says Platoni.

The VA, short of doctors, therapists, and staff in some areas, is straining to meet the mental health needs of the troops who have already returned from Iraq and Afghanistan. Soldiers often wait weeks or even months to see a psychiatrist or psychologist. A 2004 study by the Government Accountability Office found that six of the seven VA medical facilities it visited "may not be able to meet" increased demand for PTSD. "I don't think anybody can say with certainty whether we are prepared to meet the problem because we don't know what the scope is yet," says Matthew Friedman, a psychiatrist and executive director of the VA's National

Center for PTSD in White River Junction, Vt. "What we do know is that the greater the exposure to trauma, the greater the chance that someone will have PTSD."

Danger zone. There may be no war better designed to produce combat stress and trauma. Operation Iraqi Freedom is a round-the-clock, unrelenting danger zone. There are no front lines, it's impossible to identify the enemy, and everything from a paper bag to a baby carriage is a potential bomb. Soldiers are targets 24-7, whether they are running combat missions or asleep in their bunks. "There is no moment of safety in Iraq," says Andrew Pomerantz, a psychiatrist and chief of the Mental Health and Behavioral Science Service at the VA Medical Center in White River Junction. "That's one of the things we're seeing in people when they come back-a feeling of an absolute lack of safety wherever they are."

Stories of vets who sleep with guns and knives and patrol the perimeters of their homes obsessively are as common as tales of valor. Marine Lt. Col. Michael Zacchea, 38, who trained Iraqi troops and was in about 100 firefights, knows that paranoia all too well. "Every time I get on the road," says Zacchea, who commutes from Long Island to Wall Street, "it's like I'm back in the streets of Baghdad in combat, driving and running gun battles, with people throwing grenades at me." Zacchea, a reservist, is now being treated for PTSD at a VA hospital, but had it not been for chronic dysentery, migraines, and shrapnel wounds in his shoulder, he says he probably would have been redeployed in September, emotional scars and all.

And he still may be. The military's need to maintain troop strength in the face of historic recruiting lows means many service members, including some suffering from psychological problems like Zacchea, have no choice but to return. President Bush recently authorized the Marine Corps to call up inactive reservists, men and women who have already fulfilled their active-duty commitment. "They're having to go deep into the bench," says Robinson, "and deploy some people who shouldn't be deployed."

Multiple tours. Robinson is referring to the increasing number of reports of service members who stock antidepressants and sleeping pills alongside their shampoo, soap, and razor blades. The Defense Department does not track the number of soldiers on mental health medications or diagnosed with mental illnesses. But the military acknowledges that service members on medication who may be suffering from combat-induced psychological problems are being kept in combat. "We're not keeping people over there on heavy-duty drugs," says Army Surgeon General Kevin Kiley, who estimates that 4 to 5 percent of soldiers are taking medications, mostly sleeping pills. "Four to five percent of 150,000, that's still a lot of troops. But if it's got them handling things, I'm OK with that."

Handling things is a relative term. Army Pvt. Jason Sedotal, 21, a military policeman from Pierre Part, La., had been in Iraq six weeks in 2004 when he drove a humvee over a landmine. His sergeant, seated beside him, lost two legs and an arm in the explosion. Consumed by guilt and fear, Sedotal, who suffered only minor injuries, was diagnosed with PTSD when he returned from his first tour in early 2005 and given antidepressants and sleeping pills. Several months later, while stationed at Fort Polk, La., he sought more mental health care and was prescribed a different antidepressant.

Last November, Sedotal was redeployed. "They told me I had to go back because my problem wasn't serious enough," Sedotal said in an interview from Baghdad in mid-September. Sedotal says he started "seeing things and having flashbacks." Twice a combat stress unit referred him to a hospital for mental health care. Twice he was returned to his unit, each time with more medication and the second time without his weapon. "I stopped running missions, and I was shunned by my immediate chain of command and my unit," says Sedotal, who returned to Fort Polk last week.

Cases like Sedotal's prompted Congress earlier this year to instruct the Department of Defense to create a Task Force on Mental Health to examine the state of mental health care for the military. It is expected to deliver a report to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld in May 2007 and make recommendations for everything from reducing the stigma surrounding disorders to helping families and children deal with the traumatized soldier.

Sending military members who suffer from PTSD back into combat goes straight to one of the toughest issues of the war: how to protect soldiers' mental health and still keep them fighting. It is well-established that repeated and prolonged exposure to combat stress is the single greatest risk factor in developing PTSD.

At the same time, there is tremendous resistance to sending home soldiers who are suffering from psychological wounds, in all but the most severe cases. "If a soldier has some PTSD symptoms," says Kiley, "we'll watch him and see how he does." The expectation "is that we're all in this boat together and we need to drive on to complete the mission," he says, adding that if the situation gets worse, the soldier would most likely be given a couple days of rest to see if he recovers. Once soldiers are evacuated, "they are much less likely to come back."

With that in mind, the DOD has designed a program to manage combat stress and identify mental health problems when they occur. It will include so-called battle-mind training for recruits, which focuses on the emotional fallout of seeing and contributing to the carnage of war and how to deal with it. Once they are in Iraq, there are psychologists and combat stress-control teams, such as Platoni's, who work side by side with troops to help them deal with their emotions and decompress immediately after battle. "Soldiers suffering from combat stress do better if they are treated early, efficiently, and as close to the battlefield as possible," says Col. Charles Hoge, chief of the Department of Psychiatry and Behavioral Sciences at Walter Reed Army Institute of Research.

Currently, there are more than 200 psychiatrists, therapists, social workers, and other mental health experts working with soldiers "in theater." They lend an ear, encourage soldiers to talk about their experiences with each other, and administer whatever short-term remedies they can, including stress-reduction techniques, anger-management strategies, or medications. However, their mission, first and foremost, is to be "force multipliers" who maintain troop strength. Their success is judged by their ability to keep soldiers from going home for psychological reasons. Soldiers are often their allies in this effort, as they feel such guilt and shame over abandoning their units they'll most likely say anything to keep from leaving. "It's a very sticky wicket," says Platoni. "We don't know if our interventions are enough to help them stay mentally healthy, or if they'll suffer more in the long term."

Last year, for instance, Platoni spent four months in Ar Ramadi, near Baghdad, where her battalion was under constant attack by insurgents. "They were watching their fellow soldiers burning to death and thinking they might be next," says Platoni. When a break came, one platoon was removed from combat for 48 hours so they could rest, shower, have a hot meal, and talk to psychologists about what they'd been through. "When they returned to the fighting," says Platoni, "they were able to deal with their fears better and focus on what needed to be done."

When soldiers do return home, the true emotional trauma of war is often just beginning. They go through a cursory post-deployment medical screening and a quick interview with a healthcare worker, who may or may not specialize in mental health. And returning soldiers are far more likely to downplay emotional problems for fear of being shifted from the "go home" line into the "further evaluation" line and being prevented from seeing families and friends.

Macho warrior. Three to six months after they return-the time when PTSD symptoms are the most likely to start becoming obvious-troops are given another mental health screening and may be referred for further evaluation, although the chances are slim. A GAO report issued in May, for instance, found that of the 5 percent of returning veterans between 2001 and 2004 who tested as being at risk for PTSD, fewer than one quarter were referred for further mental health evaluations. William Winkenwerder, assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, took issue with the study: "We're doing more than any military in history to identify, prevent, and treat mental health concerns among our troops. It is a top priority for us." Even with a referral, many veterans and active-duty soldiers will not seek help for fear of being stigmatized. To help break down the barriers, the DOD has begun encouraging high-ranking soldiers to openly discuss the effects that combat and killing can have on a person's psyche. Even so, the military remains dominated by the image of the macho warrior who sucks it up and drives on. According to the VA, the number of PTSD cases has doubled since 2000, to an all-time high of 260,000, but fewer than 40 percent of veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan have sought medical treatment. "This is the military culture," says Schrumpf, who now gets regular therapy and takes medication to help with his PTSD. "If it gets out that you even went to see the medical officer, and it always does, then you're done as a career marine."

In a surprising admission, former Georgia Sen. Max Cleland, who lost three limbs in Vietnam, announced in August that he is being treated for PTSD in the hopes of encouraging other vets to do the same. One of the biggest problems for Vietnam veterans, for instance, was that their psychological wounds went unrecognized and unattended for so long that, by the time they got treatment, many were past of the point of being helped. Cleland is one of a growing crowd of Vietnam vets who are finally seeking help-and competing for VA services-as a result of long-buried feelings stirred up by the Iraq war.

In the past few years, in part because of events such as September 11, there have been advances in therapies for PTSD. "Just because you have PTSD, it doesn't mean you can't be successful in daily life," says Harold Wain, chief of the psychiatry consultation and liaison service at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., the main Army hospital for amputees. Many of the patients Wain sees have suffered catastrophic injuries and must heal their bodies as well as their minds.

Reimagining the trauma again and again, or what's known as exposure therapy, has long been believed to be the most effective way of conquering PTSD. It is still popular and has been made even more effective by such tools as virtual reality. However, therapists are increasingly relying on cognitive behavior therapy or cognitive reframing, putting a new frame around a thought to shift the way a soldier interprets an event. A soldier who is racked with guilt because he couldn't save an injured buddy, for instance, may be redirected to concentrate on what he did do to help. Other approaches such as eye movement desensitization and reprocessing use hypnosis to help soldiers.

For some soldiers, simply talking about what happened to them can be therapy enough. When Zachary Scott-Singley returned from Iraq in 2005, he was haunted by the image of a 3-year-old boy who had been shot and killed accidentally by a fellow soldier. With a son of his own, Scott-Singley couldn't get the picture of the child and his wailing mother out of his head and became increasingly paranoid about his own child's safety. "I was constantly thinking about how people were going to attack me and take him," he says. Scott-Singley twice sought mental health care from the Army. The first time he says he was told that since he wasn't hurting anybody, he didn't have PTSD. The next counselor suggested he buy some stress-management tapes on the Internet and practice counting to 10 whenever he felt overwhelmed. (The VA is legally precluded from discussing a soldier's medical records.) Ironically, Scott-Singley found his therapy on the Web anyway, with his blog A Soldier's Thoughts (misoldierthoughts.blogspot.com). "It feels so much better to know I am not alone."

Outcry. Many veterans say they would also find it therapeutic to hear Bush acknowledge PTSD and the psychological costs of the war instead of downplaying them. Earlier this year, for instance, the Institute of Medicine was asked by Congress to re-evaluate the diagnostic criteria for PTSD, which was established by the American Psychiatric Association in 1980. Critics claim the review was ordered by the Bush administration in an effort to make it harder to diagnose PTSD, which would in turn reduce the amount of disability payments. The number of veterans from all wars receiving disability payments for PTSD, about 216,000 last year, has grown seven times as fast as the number receiving benefits for disabilities in general, at a cost of $4.6 billion a year. And that figure does not include most of the more than 100,000 Iraq and Afghanistan veterans who have sought mental health services. The IOM report, released in June, supported the current criteria for diagnosing PTSD.

Now the institute is looking at the accuracy of screening techniques and how to compensate and treat vets with PTSD, widely regarded as an easy condition to fake. And in another move that infuriated veterans groups, the VA late last year proposed a review of 72,000 cases of vets who were receiving full disability benefits for PTSD to look for fraud. The move prompted such an outcry that it was called off.

Studies and reviews aside, there isn't enough help available to veterans with PTSD. According to a report from the VA, individual veterans' visits to PTSD specialists dropped by 20 percent from 1995 to 2005-"a decrease in capacity at a time when the VA needs to reach out," the report stated. Secretary of Veterans Affairs James Nicholson says the VA sees 85 percent of new mental health patients within 30 days. "But that still leaves 15 percent and that's a big number. Could we do better? Yes."

Bush has called for a record $80.6 billion in the 2007 VA budget. That includes $3.2 billion for mental health services, a $339 million increase over this year's budget. However, those increases are being met by increasing demands for care, as well as rising cost-of-living allowances and prescription drug prices. "The bigger budget doesn't really add up to much," says Rieckhoff.

However frustrating and exhausting the process, most vets can avoid getting help only so long before friends and family push them into counseling or they get in trouble with the law. "It's almost like your family has its own form of PTSD just from being around you every day," says a former Army sergeant who worked as an interrogator in Iraq and asked that his name be withheld. "When I came back I was emotionally shut down and severely paranoid. My wife thought I was crazy and my son didn't realize who I was. Because of them, I got help."

Like many soldiers, he found it at one of more than 200 local Veterans Centers, which offer counseling for PTSD and sexual assault, a growing concern for women in the military. Vet Centers are part of the VA but operate like the anti-VA, free of the delays and bureaucracy. There is almost no paperwork, and the wait to see a counselor is rarely more than a week. It's no coincidence that when Doonesbury character B.D. finally went for help with his PTSD, he went to a Vet Center (story, Page 60).

The centers are small and staffed mostly by vets, which creates the feel of a nurturing social environment rather than an institutional one. The free coffee is strictly decaf, and the approach is laid back. "Someone may come in asking about an insurance problem, and as we answer their questions, we ask them how are they feeling," says Karen Schoenfeld-Smith, a psychologist and team leader at the San Diego Vet Center, which sees a lot of Iraq vets from nearby Camp Pendleton. "That's how we get them into it." Many come just to talk to other vets.

It is that same need to talk that keeps Schrumpf E-mailing and phoning fellow marines and returning to Camp Pendleton every couple of weeks to hang out. "It is the only place I can talk about the killing," he says. Next month, Schrumpf will leave California for his home state of Tennessee, where he says it will be easier to raise a family. He's not worried about taking the war with him. In fact, in many ways he is more worried about leaving it behind. "The anger, the rage, and all that is just there," says Schrumpf. "And honestly, I don't want it to leave. It's like a security blanket." Or a movie, that just keeps on playing.

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

Could it really be as simple as falling gas prices? President Bush is enjoying a bump up in the polls: His approval ratings-as measured by the USA Today/Gallup Poll-have drifted up from the mid-30s in early June to 44 percent now, their highest levels in more than a year. And this rebound comes despite Americans' widespread unhappiness over the war in Iraq, anxiety about rising income inequality, and job insecurity bred of globalization.

Gas prices are down more than 66 cents a gallon in the past seven weeks, easing inflation worries and boosting the stock market, with the Dow Jones industrial average close to a record high. Last week, the Conference Board reported that consumers' outlook for the next six months had improved markedly since August.

The timing for a turnaround certainly is auspicious for Republicans going into the November 7 midterm congressional elections. All year long, Democrats have been trouncing Republicans in the polls, seemingly poised to retake one or both houses of Congress. But the latest Gallup survey found voter preferences split evenly between Democrats and Republicans. Is the economy suddenly giving the GOP a lift? Indirectly, says James Campbell, a University at Buffalo-SUNY political science professor and author of Before the Vote: Forecasting American National Elections. "With congressional elections, the economy only directly matters at the margins," he explains. "But the economy does affect presidential approval ratings, and they do affect congressional elections."

As he stumps for GOP candidates, the president is talking more and more about the economy, first because he believes it is trending his way and second, many suspect, because he wants to distract voters from an unpopular war. Just last week, Bush carried the "good news" economic message to Meyer Tool in Cincinnati, while also continuing to pound home the theme that the Grand Old Party is better equipped to fight the war against global terrorism. That argument has also boosted Bush, some pols believe.

The Chart. The Democrats, of course, aren't convinced about the economy. They've got their own message, focused on uncertainty, anxiety, and stagnation. And there isn't likely to be any letup in the shrill rhetoric as the midterm melee enters its final round. An improving economy-or voters' perception of an improving economy-might just keep the GOP in control of the House of Representatives, the branch that many analysts see as most likely to change hands. At least that's the conclusion of University of Texas-Dallas political science professors Patrick Brandt and Thomas Brunell. The duo just finished testing a forecasting model that attempts to predict the outcome of the battle for the House. Their three main factors are the presidential approval rating, inflation rate (think of it as a proxy for gas prices), and unemployment rate. Using a model-generated prediction of a 43 percent presidential approval rating on Election Day, the Brandt-Brunell formula predicts the GOP will retain 220 seats, a loss of 12 seats but still enough to keep control. And every 2 additional Bush approval points would mean a loss of one seat fewer.

Things Fall Apart (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Right after the 2004 election, it seemed as if Thomas Frank had been completely vindicated. In his book “What’s the Matter With Kansas? How Conservatives Won the Heart of America,” Mr. Frank argued that America’s right wing had developed a permanent winning strategy based on the use of "values" issues to mobilize white working-class voters against a largely mythical cultural elite, while actually pursuing policies designed to benefit a small economic elite.

It was and is a brilliant analysis. But the political strategy Mr. Frank described may have less staying power than he feared. In fact, the right-wing coalition that has spent 40 years climbing to its current position of political dominance may be cracking up.

At its core, the political axis that currently controls Congress and the White House is an alliance between the preachers and the plutocrats — between the religious right, which hates gays, abortion and the theory of evolution, and the economic right, which hates Social Security, Medicare and taxes on rich people. Surrounding this core is a large periphery of politicians and lobbyists who joined the movement not out of conviction, but to share in the spoils.

Together, these groups formed a seemingly invincible political coalition, in which the religious right supplied the passion and the economic right supplied the money.

The coalition has, however, always been more vulnerable than it seemed, because it was an alliance based not on shared goals, but on each group's belief that it could use the other to get what it wants. Bring that belief into question, and the whole thing falls apart.

Future historians may date the beginning of the right-wing crackup to the days immediately following the 2004 election, when President Bush tried to convert a victory won by portraying John Kerry as weak on defense into a mandate for Social Security privatization. The attempted bait-and-switch failed in the face of overwhelming public opposition. If anything, the Bush plan was even less popular in deep-red states like Montana than in states that voted for Mr. Kerry.

And the religious and cultural right, which boasted of having supplied the Bush campaign with its "shock troops" and expected a right-wing cultural agenda in return — starting with a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage — was dismayed when the administration put its energy into attacking the welfare state instead. James Dobson, the founder and chairman of Focus on the Family, accused Republicans of "just ignoring those that put them in office."

It will be interesting, by the way, to see how Dr. Dobson, who declared of Bill Clinton that "no man has ever done more to debase the presidency," responds to the Foley scandal. Does the failure of Republican leaders to do anything about a sexual predator in their midst outrage him as much as a Democratic president's consensual affair?

In any case, just as the religious right was feeling betrayed by Mr. Bush's focus on the goals of the economic right, the economic right suddenly seemed to become aware of the nature of its political allies. "Where in the hell did this Terri Schiavo thing come from?" asked Dick Armey, the former House majority leader, in an interview with Ryan Sager, the author of "The Elephant in the Room: Evangelicals, Libertarians and the Battle to Control the Republican Party." The answer, he said, was "blatant pandering to James Dobson." He went on, "Dobson and his gang of thugs are real nasty bullies."

Some Republicans are switching parties. James Webb, who may pull off a macaca-fueled upset against Senator George Allen of Virginia, was secretary of the Navy under Ronald Reagan. Charles Barkley, a former N.B.A. star who used to be mentioned as a possible future Republican candidate, recently declared, "I was a Republican until they lost their minds."

So the right-wing coalition is showing signs of coming apart. It seems that we're not in Kansas anymore. In fact, Kansas itself doesn't seem to be in Kansas anymore. Kathleen Sebelius, the state's Democratic governor, has achieved a sky-high favorability rating by focusing on good governance rather than culture wars, and her party believes it will win big this year.

And nine former Kansas Republicans, including Mark Parkinson, the former state G.O.P. chairman, are now running for state office as Democrats. Why did Mr. Parkinson change parties? Because he "got tired of the theological debate over whether Charles Darwin was right."

A Party Without Principles (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

After years of single-party government, the prospect of a Democratic majority in the House ought to feel refreshing. But even with Republicans collapsing in a pile of sexual sleaze, I just can't get excited. Most Democrats in Congress seem bereft of ideas or the courage to stand up for them. They clearly want power, but they have no principles to guide their use of it.

On Friday, Harry Reid, the Democratic leader in the Senate, correctly denounced a border-fence bill as a concession "to the radical anti-immigrant right wing" of the Republican Party. It's absurd to fence off 700 miles of the border and leave the other 1,300 miles open; besides, the government lacks the manpower to prevent migrants from defeating the fence with tunnels or ladders. But if blowing billions on this symbolism is a sop to right-wing nuts, why did 26 Senate Democrats vote for the bill while only 17 opposed it?

The day before the immigration vote, the majority of Senate Democrats summoned up the courage to oppose the Bush assault on the nation's traditions of justice. Of course they were right; you don't win a war of ideas by abandoning your most appealing ones. But if the Democrats had made common cause with the bill's Republican opponents, they could have filibustered the president's bill. Why vote against something and simultaneously allow it through? On an issue as basic as access to justice, can't Democrats stand on principle?

These battles dominated last week's headlines, but the Democrats' under-the-radar behavior was even more depressing. A conservative group circulated a petition calling for bipartisan talks on Social Security, with all potential solutions to be part of the discussion. Rather than embracing this eminently sane idea, top Democrats in Congress loudly slammed the door on it.

There's a long tradition of demagoguery on entitlement reform, but refusing even to discuss the challenge plumbs new depths of cynicism. A decade ago, Democratic centrists such as Sen. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska argued that runaway entitlement spending would rob the rest of the budget, draining money from social programs that liberals are supposed to care about. Today, a pragmatic Republican such as Sen. Bob Bennett of Utah can propose a progressive fix to Social Security that does not involve personal accounts. But Democrats won't come forward to support him.

In rejecting Social Security discussions last week, the Democrats painted the conservatives' petition as a Trojan horse designed to get personal accounts back onto the table. Even if that were true, since when was all mention of personal accounts taboo for Democrats? A decade ago, a majority of the appointees to Bill Clinton's Social Security commission came out in favor of personal accounts. Even the dissenting minority was open to the idea of investing Social Security funds in the stock market.

If today's Democratic leaders were even a little bit awake, they would realize that the case for Social Security reform has grown stronger since the Clinton era. It's not just that the budget outlook has deteriorated or that the squandering of a decade renders a solvency fix more urgent. A new body of research shows how the lack of reform threatens core Democratic constituencies.

Social Security benefits were designed in the 1930s to protect traditional couples. But married couples make up a declining fraction of the adult population, particularly among minorities. Since 1970 the married share of the adult population has dropped by 10 percentage points for whites, 14 percentage points for Hispanics and an astonishing 22 percentage points for African Americans. Because Social Security benefits were not designed to protect singles, these changes in family structure are driving up poverty rates among the old. In the early 1990s, 2.4 percent of married retirees lived below the poverty line, according to the Urban Institute. But fully 21.2 percent of divorced retirees were poor, and the rate among never-marrieds was 16.2 percent.

If Democrats cared about poor women and minorities, they would be clamoring to reform Social Security. But instead they get a childish gratification out of stamping their feet and refusing to discuss the subject. They can't muster the courage to block the suspension of habeas corpus. But when it comes to blocking entitlement reform, the Democrats ride out to battle.

I'm not saying that Republicans are at all better, and of course elections breed some policy timidity. But the infuriating thing about the Democrats is that, just a decade ago, they knew how to empathize with voters' economic insecurities without collapsing into irresponsibility; they combined attractively progressive social policies with sensible pro-market fiscal responsibility. Now many in the party have lost interest in this necessary balance. If the Democrats win a measure of power next month, it's hard to see what they will do with it.

'Anything Goes' Administration (WP)

THE INTERIOR Department's inspector general says the department suffers from an "anything goes" ethical culture.

"Simply stated, short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," Inspector General Earl E. Devaney told a House Government Reform subcommittee last month. "Ethics failures on the part of senior department officials

-- taking the form of appearances of impropriety, favoritism and bias -- have been routinely dismissed with a promise 'not to do it again.' "

At the Education Department, its inspector general found, officials violated conflict-of-interest rules and steered contracts for its $4.8 billion Reading First program to favored textbook publishers.

"They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive deleted by IG] out of them in front of all the other would-be party crashers who are standing on the front lawn waiting to see how we welcome these dirtbags," the Reading First program director, Chris Doherty, wrote about one company in an e-mail to staff members.

Mr. Doherty, you won't be surprised to learn, just left the department to "return to the private sector."

Meanwhile, three top officials at the Department of Housing and Urban Development told the inspector general there that Secretary Alphonso Jackson had said "it was important to consider presidential supporters when candidates for HUD discretionary contracts were being considered."

Mr. Jackson "personally intervened with contractors whom he did not like . . . these contractors had Democratic political affiliations," the inspector general found. The secretary had boasted in a public speech last April that he killed an advertising contract because the recipient had criticized the president -- then dismissed his comments as "anecdotal."

In fact, the investigation found, Mr. Jackson had expressed such political preferences -- there just wasn't evidence that anyone had acted on his wishes.

And then there was the U.S. Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, which sent -- in the account of The Post's Rajiv Chandrasekaran, "the loyal and the willing instead of the best and the brightest" to help rebuild Iraq -- with a screening process that featured questions on whether applicants voted for George W. Bush or even what they thought about Roe v. Wade .

A 24-year-old who lacked a background in finance -- but who had applied for a White House job -- was detailed to reopen Baghdad's stock exchange. The head of a faith-based relief organization that provided health care while promoting Christianity in developing countries was sent to replace a physician with extensive experience in postwar health administration because, the physician was told, the White House wanted a "loyalist" in the job.

These dots connect to form a disturbing picture -- not so much of greed-fueled corruption as of ideologically driven coziness. Those who differ from the party line are excluded from the benefits of power, while those who toe it are welcomed and, if they err, quickly forgiven. A more responsible president would put a quick stop to this. A more responsible Congress would insist.

The GOP Record (WSJ)

The 109th Congress has gone home to fight for re-election, and the best testament to its accomplishments is that very few Republicans are running on them. They're running instead against the peril to the country if the Nancy Pelosi Democrats take power.

We'll know in six weeks if this liberal fright mask is enough to save the GOP majority, but it's not too soon to say that Republicans in the 109th have been a major disappointment. The best thing about this Congress is that by doing little at least it did little harm. But despite their best chance in 50 years to reform the creaky institutions of the welfare state, Republicans couldn't maintain the unity or discipline to achieve nearly any of what they promised in 2004. * * *

The one great exception is the confirmation of two new Supreme Court Justices. GOP Senators in particular helped to steer President Bush away from his underwhelming initial choice of White House counsel Harriet Miers toward the distinguished Samuel Alito. With the High Court playing an ever more decisive role in our political life, this may be Mr. Bush's most significant legacy beyond the war on terror.

Republicans also deserve credit for financing the war, which is more than many Democrats say they'll do if they run Capitol Hill. The extension for two more years, through 2010, of the 15% rate on dividends and capital gains will also help sustain the economic growth that is throwing off record revenues to pay for the war even as the budget deficit declines. The recent compromise on terrorist interrogations may also turn out to be historic, putting Congress's imprimatur on the Presidential powers needed to fight an enemy that violates the normal rules of war. Toss in bankruptcy and class-action reform, and some free-trade agreements. That's about it for the good news.

On the liability side, the list of flops is extensive, starting with making the tax cuts permanent, repealing the estate tax and immigration reform. Senate Democrats did their part to kill the first two, but House Republicans get credit for fanning public worry about immigration and then pretending that a 700-mile fence will solve the problem.

Social Security reform was never going to be easy, and Mr. Bush's war-driven decline in job approval meant he couldn't move any Democrats. But that still doesn't excuse such prominent Republicans as Tom Davis (Virginia) and Roy Blunt (Missouri) for resisting their President's reform effort behind the scenes. So frightened were they that they never even brought the subject up for a vote.

Perhaps the most puzzling abdication was the GOP failure to do anything at all on health care. The window for saving private health care from government encroachment is closing, and both business and workers are feeling the pinch from rising costs. Yet Republicans failed to make health-care savings accounts more attractive, failed to let business associations offer their own health plans, and failed even to bring to a vote Arizona Congressman John Shadegg's bill to avoid costly state mandates by letting health insurance be marketed across state boundaries. The biggest winner here is Hillary Rodham Clinton's 2008 Presidential campaign.

Republicans have many explanations for their paltry record, some of them even accurate. The troubles in Iraq sapped Mr. Bush's support, dividing Republicans while uniting Democrats who saw a chance to regain power this fall. Hurricane Katrina blew away whatever hope there was of spending restraint and changed the national conversation from GOP priorities. And Tom DeLay's ethical troubles, and eventual ouster as Majority Leader, created a leadership vacuum.

Yet none of this excuses the more fundamental problem, which is that too many Republicans now believe their purpose in Washington is keeping power for its own sake. The reform impulse that won the House in 1994 has given way to incumbent protection. This is the root of the earmarking epidemic, which now mars every spending bill and has become a vast new opportunity for Member corruption. This is also part of what corrupted Duke Cunningham, Bob Ney, Jack Abramoff, Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon. Power for its own sake also explains the House GOP's decision to join Senate Democrats in killing serious reform of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, despite $16 billion in accounting mistakes or fraud. The Members are in bed with the housing subsidy lobby.

Even amid all of this scandal, many Republicans still refuse to acknowledge any problem. Appropriators continue to resist major budget reform, and the same Republicans who gave a Democratic President the line-item veto in the 1990s refused to give a weaker version to a GOP President this year. No wonder so many loyal Republican voters have been telling pollsters they're not sure if they'll vote this year.

With his party down in the polls, Mr. Bush has tried to recast the midterm election as a referendum on the war on terror. This strategy may yet save Republicans from losing Congress, both because the war is the most important issue of our time and because the Democrats are calling for retreat in Iraq and essentially for a return to the antiterror policies of the 1990s (see below). But it is no credit to the performance of Republicans in this Congress that their best argument for re-election is the wartime flaws of their opponents.

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

NOT LONG AGO, even the most optimistic Democrats thought the party would be lucky to regain control of the House of Representatives in the midterm elections. Now, buoyed by bad news for President Bush and once-favored GOP incumbents such as the gaffe-prone Sen. George Allen of Virginia, Democrats are daring to dream that they will gain control of both houses of Congress on election day.

Such a change on Capitol Hill would be momentous, of course, which may explain why Bush went into oratorical overdrive last week by caricaturing Democrats as "the party of cut-and-run" in Iraq. But aside from being bad news for some partisans and good news for others, how would a congressional shift affect national and international policy?

On balance, it would be constructive. A Democratic Congress would be more of a check on the presidency, less patient with the U.S. involvement in Iraq, more protective of civil liberties in the war on terror, more willing to allow regressive tax cuts to expire and, in the case of a Democratic Senate, unlikely to approve stridently conservative judicial nominees. It also would be more sympathetic to one of Bush's priorities, comprehensive immigration reform.

The paradox is that, to win control of Congress, Democrats will have to rely on Democrats who sound suspiciously like Republicans.

Which raises the question: What does a politician have to do to get kicked out of his party nowadays? One might ask Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, who is running for reelection as an independent after losing in the Democratic primary for his support of the Iraq war. On the other side of the aisle, one could ask Steve Laffey, a Rove Republican who lost in the primary in part because the Bush administration supported his opponent, Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee, a Rockefeller Republican who disagreed with the White House on a variety of issues but stands a better chance in the general election.

This leads to yet another paradox: As the stakes get higher, party affiliation matters more but means less.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairmen of the Democratic congressional campaign committees, have been willing, even eager, to support candidates who don't toe the party line. Schumer, for example, recruited Pennsylvania Treasurer Bob Casey, an opponent of abortion, to oppose incumbent Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. Yet a victory for Casey, who is ahead in the polls, is vital to hopes of Democratic control. Even on issues on which there is a clear partisan divide, such as the war in Iraq, some Democrats have been allowed to tack to the center.

That's what they call "big tent" politics. But a tent is valuable for what it keeps out as much as for what it lets in. Last week, when the Senate took up Bush's proposal for military commissions to try suspected terrorists, all but one of the 44 Democrats voted to give suspected terrorists the right to file habeas corpus petitions challenging their confinement. But after that amendment was defeated, 12 Democrats, including five whose names are on the ballot next month, voted for a bill that guts the Great Writ. That's not the kind of position Democrats — or Republicans, for that matter — should be standing for.

Curing The Debt Addiction (NYT)

The Treasury secretary, Henry Paulson Jr., capped off his recent trip to China with a visit last week to Capitol Hill. His aim was to dissuade Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, from moving forward on their bill to impose punitive tariffs on China. The two senators accuse China of manipulating its currency, the yuan, to gain an unfair trade advantage.

Mr. Paulson was right to try to parry the senators' protectionist efforts, and he has succeeded, for now. But the issue will persist so long as he fails to satisfactorily address a root cause of mounting protectionist pressures: the United States' growing indebtedness to the rest of the world.

Instead, Mr. Paulson recently told reporters that the nation's deficit in trade and other international transactions — on track this year to reach $800 billion, or nearly 7 percent of the economy — is actually a sign of strength. America has kept the world prosperous, he said, by buying global goods.

Come again? America's borrow-and-spend ways have indeed juiced the global economy. But the resulting indebtedness makes the country vulnerable to the protectionism Mr. Paulson wants to avoid, as well as to broader economic disarray.

Many American businesses — and politicians — see the mounting trade deficit and immediately cry foul. Demands for tariffs are the predictable, if misguided, reaction. Protectionism conveniently shifts the blame for trade-related hardships to foreigners, which is easier than adapting homegrown business practices to make America more competitive.

There are other dangers. If lenders like China began to doubt the strength of the American economy, they could put their money elsewhere, driving up American interest rates, perhaps sharply.

To reduce excessive foreign borrowing, it is imperative to reduce the federal deficit. To that end, Mr. Paulson has pledged to help the Bush administration find ways to curb Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. That would certainly cut the budget, but at the cost of weakening the already frayed safety net — at precisely the time when increasing globalization is creating economic hardship for many Americans. It would be far better to start a deficit reduction effort by calling for a moratorium on further tax cuts and allowing other Bush-era tax cuts to expire as scheduled.

That, along with continuing efforts to adjust exchange rates in China and other countries, would lower the risks the United States is now courting.

Democrats' Risky Strategy: Trumpeting The Wealth Gap (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

October 2, 2006; Page A1

WENTWORTH, N.C. -- Many Democratic politicians, shrugging off lessons of recent political history, see this as the year when the widening gap between the rich and the rest of America will help win them votes.

As a group of his constituents munched on pot roast and buttered green beans in a school cafeteria here, Rep. Brad Miller -- a two-term Democrat seeking re-election in a district spanning rural, suburban and urban communities -- launched into what he believes is a winning pitch.

"People who are doing well are doing very well," he said into a handheld microphone, his tie loosened as he walked among the tables. "The rich are doing just fine. But wages aren't budging for the majority of Americans."

The congressman's words resonate here. Although some voters are prosperous suburbanites, others in this district along the Virginia border have lost textile-mill jobs. They've been forced into lower-paying positions with fewer benefits and scant prospect for raises. Pamela Tucker, a mental-health worker from nearby Reidsville, says she can barely keep up. "Things are worse. The taxes, the price of health care, gas," she says. "People don't have the means."

Other Democrats -- including Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow in a tough re-election fight and Claire McCaskill in her challenge to Missouri incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent -- are sounding similar themes: The U.S. economy is growing, but the poor and especially the middle class aren't benefiting. The rich are. And President George W. Bush and a Republican Congress are to blame, they argue.

It's a risky bet. Government data do show an unambiguous trend toward a widening gap between the rich and everyone else, a trend that pre-dates Mr. Bush's election in 2000. And yet U.S. electoral history is littered with Democrats who tried to use the inequality issue only to find voters unswayed and Republicans accusing them of "class warfare" or business-bashing.

"The language of income distribution and income inequality is rarely effective in American politics," says political scientist William Galston, a domestic-policy adviser in the Clinton White House now at the Democratic-leaning Brookings Institution. While Americans may be unhappy that the rich are getting ahead while they're not, most still aspire to be rich and are turned off by candidates who demonize wealth, he says.

"There is little doubt that there has been a 25-year trend of a growing gap, sometimes called income inequality, between the wages of the skilled and the unskilled," says Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers. "While that trend shows no obvious signs of abating in the near future, by some measures inequality has slowed a bit in recent years."

Former Vice President Al Gore touched upon a "people versus the powerful" theme in his unsuccessful 2000 presidential bid. Some strategists say it failed because he didn't push it hard enough. Others say it failed because voters found the message polarizing. During a Democratic Leadership Council forum in 2002, Mr. Gore's running mate, Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, said the strategy made it "more difficult for us to gain support of the middle class, independent voters who don't see America as 'us versus them.'"

Four years later, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's running mate, then-Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, spoke frequently about "two Americas" in which "one America does the work, while another America reaps the reward." They lost, too.

The one recent Democratic candidate to tap economic angst most successfully was Bill Clinton. He talked often in the 1992 campaign about how well the top 1% were doing while others were falling behind. After winning office, he persuaded

Congress to raise taxes on the rich. But even his administration divided on how hard to push the issue after Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994. Two close advisers, Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and Labor Secretary Robert Reich, sparred over the populist message.

"I had sat in on enough discussions about swing voters to feel that this crucial section of the electorate reacted badly to anything that sounded like class warfare," Mr. Rubin wrote in his book, "In an Uncertain World." Terms like "corporate welfare," a favorite of then Labor Secretary Reich, could inflame voters, Mr. Rubin said.

Many Democrats say this year the message could draw voters. "This is an issue they [Democrats] are talking about and should be talking about," says Stan Greenberg, a Democratic pollster.

While the war in Iraq continues to be a big issue, Mr. Greenberg and other strategists are advising Democratic candidates to talk often about the economic squeeze on their middle-class base. "Most people are seeing continuing financial pressure -- gas prices, health-care costs -- symbols that, when contrasted with the perception that the macro-economy is doing great and CEOs and others are doing very well, help to underscore what's happening and what's not happening," says Mr. Greenberg.

Some Republicans try to debunk the statistics Democrats cite, arguing that they overstate the income gap by looking at wages, while ignoring health and retirement benefits and tax breaks that help the working poor. Kevin Hassett, director of economic-policy studies at the Republican-leaning American Enterprise Institute, points to an increase in consumer spending as evidence that Americans are doing better than Democratic campaign themes suggest.

Winning Argument

But other Republicans concede that Democrats may have a winning argument when it comes to economic issues this year -- inequality included. "We get clobbered among economy voters," says Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio. "The reason [Democrats] are doing this is they see the people who are uncomfortable about the economy as people who are more likely to vote for them in real numbers."

Since the last recession ended in 2001, the U.S. economy has grown nearly 15%, after inflation. Corporate profits have skyrocketed and the stock market has rebounded. Yet many Americans haven't seen paychecks grow fast enough to keep up with rising prices. While incomes at the top rose, adjusted for inflation, the median household income fell for five years in a row before turning up in 2005. It remains below its 1999 peak. The Census Bureau reports that the top 20% of households claimed 50.4% of all the income in 2005, up from 45.6% in 1985.

Even Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has acknowledged the gap. "Amid this country's strong economic expansion, many Americans simply aren't feeling the benefits. Many aren't seeing significant gains in their take-home pay," he said in an August speech. In another talk, in September, he added, "I believe it is the responsibility for all nations to search for ways to moderate income disparities."

Voters are beginning to take notice of the trend. In early September, a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found the "gap between rich and poor" ranked as the No. 2 economic issue -- after "gas prices and energy costs." Voters most often blamed the gap on "excessive salaries and bonuses" and competition from companies and workers overseas. More than half said they disapproved of the way President Bush was handling the economy.

Economists cite a variety of factors for widening inequality. Technology has favored the most skilled and most educated, and hurt the less qualified.

Globalization has brought competition from millions of new workers around the globe, crimping wages for some workers while boosting demand for others. American unions have grown steadily weaker. And social mores have changed, tolerating much wider pay disparities within the same workplace, be it a manufacturer or a law firm.

Figuring out how to reverse the trend poses a problem for policy makers. Most Democratic candidates favor an increase in the minimum wage, modest proposals for college and child-care tax credits, rolling back some of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, and finding ways to shield Americans against rising gas prices. But beyond that, Democrats candidates haven't fleshed out a program for reversing inequality.

The centrist Democratic Leadership Council is pushing what it has dubbed the American Dream Initiative to counter the "mistaken belief that when the wealthy do even better, the middle class will eventually get their share." The plan, championed by New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, among others, also calls for giving every child a $500 savings bond at birth so every American adult will have a nest egg.

While most candidates aren't citing income statistics on the stump, stagnant paychecks are a subtle, yet constant, thread in many campaigns. To skirt accusations of class warfare and business-bashing -- and to court swing voters -- Democrats focus not on the plight of the poor, but on the notion that middle class workers, despite being more productive than ever before, aren't being rewarded for their hard work.

"Unemployment has been low for some time now and it's pretty clear that the working man and woman is pretty unhappy with their lot and it's not because they're unemployed," says Alan Blinder, a Princeton University economist who worked in the Clinton White House and later was vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. "It's a combination of wages aren't going anywhere, people are losing health insurance and their pensions are under threat. And people are feeling it. At the same time, they're reading about this CEO or that CEO walking off with $100 million for managing their company badly."

Most Outspoken

Among the most outspoken on the issue of inequality is Rep. Miller, a 53-year-old lawyer and former North Carolina state legislator. He has seized on the issue in stump speeches. He has peppered Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke and former Chairman Alan Greenspan with questions about inequality at House hearings. He frequently mentions the names and salaries of highly-paid CEOs in speeches and on the House floor.

Mr. Miller told the Wentworth crowd, for instance, that CEOs make an average of $14 million a year. "Do we see the world through the eyes of Lee Raymond, who just left Exxon Mobil, making $145,000 per day or do we see it through the eyes of the guys working for $545 per week?" he asked. "That's the difference between Republicans and Democrats."

While Mr. Miller is talking about wages, the conservative Republican underdog, Vernon Robinson, a former Winston-Salem city councilman dubbed by the local press as "the black Jesse Helms," is focusing on social issues -- particularly illegal immigration and making English the official U.S. language. He says he hasn't heard much concern from voters about wages, and terms Mr. Miller's focus on CEO pay "pretty esoteric," adding, "He's saying 'vote for me. I'll make sure your boss gets paid less.' "

Other Democratic candidates are doing much the same as Mr. Miller, particularly in the Northeast and Midwest, where the economy is a big issue. In central Ohio, Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy, challenging Republican incumbent Rep. Deborah Pryce, talks frequently on the stump about gas prices, health-care costs and the minimum wage.

"I know how parents feel trying to put their kids through college. I hear all the time how it costs $60 a week to fill up my car and how health care is an enormous cost for all people," Ms. Kilroy, a Franklin County commissioner, said in an interview. Ohioans, she said, are "upset with the economy and Congress and their willingness to give these tax breaks for the super wealthy and burden future generations with the deficit."

At a rally at Ohio State University earlier this year, Ms. Kilroy accused Ms. Pryce of "supporting deep cuts to student loans that will put college out of reach for some lower- and middle-class students."

Ms. Pryce's office says she has never supported cuts to student-loan programs. "Kilroy's campaign has been consistently negative on everything," says her spokesman, George Rasley. "So the fact that they would be negative on the economic situation in Columbus -- by some measures the seventh-best economy in the country -- is no surprise even though it's a big lie." Polls show Ms. Kilroy and Ms. Pryce neck-and-neck.

On the stump in Missouri, Ms. McCaskill, in a stiff race to unseat Sen. Talent, railed against Washington policies that protect "millionaires" at the expense of the middle class. She has proposed a middle-class tax-relief package, arguing that "Missouri's middle class has been overlooked while the Bush administration has given billions in tax cuts to big corporations and millionaires." She has called for an increase in the minimum wage, and criticized Republicans' eagerness to cut the estate tax.

Consumers Extract Less Cash From Their Homes But Defy Predictions Of Greater Thrift (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

A year into the housing market's slowdown, Americans have yet to snap shut their wallets, defying predictions that the cooling market would have a chilling effect on consumer spending.

This year, despite what appears to be the most significant housing-market slump in more than a decade, the nation's consumers have increased their purchases of goods and services at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of more than 3% -- just as they have for the past two years. "They're not backing off," says Janet Hoffman, managing partner of consulting firm Accenture Ltd.'s North American retail practice.

In recent years, the long run-up in real-estate prices, coupled with a proliferation of low-interest financing options, allowed many consumers to borrow against the rising value of their homes to pay for cars, vacations and home improvements, among other things. Many economists assumed that a slowdown in the overheated housing market would reverse that trend, leading to a big pullback in spending.

So far, however, only half of that equation is panning out: Americans aren't using their houses like ATMs as much as they once did. Even so, their willingness to spend hasn't suffered, though economists don't agree on why.

Data developed by former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and Fed economist James Kennedy suggest consumers "extracted" cash from their homes -- such as through cash-out refinancings or home-equity loans -- at an annual rate of $497 billion in the second quarter. That was down sharply from a peak of $871 billion in the third quarter of 2005.

Bob Moulton, a mortgage broker with Americana Mortgage Group Inc., Manhasset, N.Y., says new applications for home-equity lines of credit and cash-out mortgage refinancings are down 50% from a year ago. Aside from the fact that home prices aren't rising as they used to, higher interest rates are the primary culprit.

Donna Simoes, an office manager in Williston Park, N.Y., took out a $200,000 home-equity line of credit with an interest rate of just under 4% two years ago to finance a bathroom remodeling and other projects. Today, the rate is up to 7.75%, and she rarely uses the credit line. "As the rate started to rise, my stomach started to fall," Ms. Simoes recalls. "I'm not willing to pay that amount of interest."

Even though consumers appear to be tapping home equity less than they have in the past, they are still finding ways to sustain their spending. Even stores that are heavily dependent on the state of the housing market are benefiting from those outlays. Sales at building-material and garden-supply centers are up more than 8% from a year earlier, outpacing the 6.7% year-to-date jump in overall retail sales, according to the Commerce Department. Sales at furniture and home-furnishing outlets are up 6.5% from last year.

There are several possible explanations. First, while housing is slumping -- the median sales price of an existing home is down 1.7% from a year ago, according to the National Association of Realtors -- other parts of the economy aren't. Unemployment remains low at 4.7%, employers are adding workers and incomes are rising. Corporate profits are up, businesses are increasing their capital spending, and exports have picked up this year. Moreover, the sharp drop in gasoline prices that began in August has given consumers a quick boost in purchasing power.

"There are pretty significant offsetting factors, including the fading energy tax and the healthy stock market," says Michelle Meyer, an economist with Lehman Brothers.

A second possibility is that not enough time has elapsed and that the impact of the cooling housing market may still be coming. "It's likely to take another year or so to see the pronounced effects," says Tim McGee, chief economist at U.S. Trust. If the housing market continues to deteriorate over the coming year, Mr. McGee and some other economists say, the decline in home-equity borrowings will combine with a reverse "wealth effect," in which consumers spend less because they feel less wealthy, to depress spending and shave one percentage point or so from economic growth in 2007.

Other observers, however, say that during the housing boom economists exaggerated the role of home-equity borrowing as a driver of consumer spending, and that's why a slowdown or modest decline in real-estate appreciation won't have much impact on consumer buying habits now. "The run-up in housing values over the past several years did not spur much of a bigger-than-expected increase in consumer spending...so we wonder about how large a spending effect one should expect to accompany a fall in housing prices, if that were to occur," Boston Fed President Cathy Minehan said last month.

Ms. Minehan said much of the equity consumers extracted from their homes over the past few years was used to reduce other forms of consumer debt and make home improvements, and that "overall household balance sheets today continue to look fairly strong."

A recent survey done for Deutsche Bank Securities found that homeowners spent only about 14% of the money they cashed out of their homes -- and that didn't go back into their real-estate investments -- on consumer goods and services. The rest was either used to make other investments or to repay debt. Vinay Pande, chief investment adviser at Deutsche Bank Securities, says the survey found consumers "were unconcerned about a housing bubble," so declining house prices probably would have only a slight impact on their spending.

Even if Ms. Minehan and Mr. Pande are underestimating the potential impact of reduced home-equity borrowing, there are other reasons to suspect that consumers will keep spending even as the housing correction plays out. The overwhelming majority of mortgage debt and home-equity loans are held by Americans in the upper half of the income range. Households in the top 10% of income hold 42% of the value of home-equity lines of credit, according to data from the Fed's 2004 Survey of Consumer Finances. Those affluent consumers have already racked up sizable gains in the value of their homes in recent years and can most likely afford to weather a modest pullback without cutting back their spending.

"If you look at the appreciation over the last three to five years, it's still way up," said Pat Conroy of Deloitte & Touche. "Even though we've had a very small downturn the past six to 12 months, that really hasn't put a huge damper on the consumer's mind-set."

Coming Of Wage (WSJ)

By ALLAN HUBBARD And EDWARD P. LAZEAR

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

The U.S. economy has faced challenges from recession to corporate scandals to terrorist attack to natural disasters. And through it all, the economy has proven to be resilient and responsive. In the past three years our economy has grown 3.7% per year, faster than any other major industrialized economy, and added more than 5.7 million payroll jobs, more than all the jobs added in the European Union and Japan combined.

Yet questions understandably arise about whether this economic expansion is paying off for U.S. workers. American workers are among the hardest working and most productive in the world. They deserve to receive their share of the gains in this economic expansion, as they have in past expansions.

A pattern that prevails as the economy moves from recession to recovery, and then into a sustained expansion, is that productivity grows first. The higher productivity growth means higher profits for businesses, which induce them to expand output and then employment. Later, as fewer workers are available for hire, wages grow, profit rates fall, and workers' share of the gains rises. This is what we observed during the last expansion. After the recession in the early 1990s, wage growth was flat. It did not pick up until the last few years of the decade.

We are seeing the same pattern in this economic expansion. Productivity growth has been exceptionally strong in the past five years, well above the historical average. And now employee compensation per hour has also picked up. Over the first half of this year, compensation growth has averaged a remarkable 6.3%, at an annual rate adjusted for inflation. This growth is much faster than in previous years.

As has been the case for many years, higher health-care costs mean much of the growth in compensation goes to benefits. Although benefits are important, workers also naturally care about whether their paychecks are going up.

Recently, nominal wages of production workers have also grown considerably. At an annualized rate, nominal wage growth has been about 4% so far this year, faster than at this point in the last economic expansion. Nominal wages are now growing faster than the past couple of years and are growing at about the same rate as they were in the late 1990s.

The difference between this economic expansion and the last expansion is that higher-than-expected energy prices have consumed much of this strong nominal wage growth. Inflation-adjusted wage growth without the increase in energy prices is similar to past economic expansions. The issue here is energy prices, not wage growth. Workers' paychecks are going up, but they have had to use much of that increase for energy purchases like gasoline.

The recent news on energy prices is good for workers. Nationwide gasoline prices have fallen by about 65 cents per gallon since early August and market data suggest that inflation will fall below the levels of the past few months. This decline, coupled with the nominal growth rates that we see in both compensation and wages, means that workers should enjoy more real earnings in the months ahead.

The Bush administration is pursuing a variety of short and long-term measures to address high energy prices. Last year, the president and Congress enacted the first major energy bill in over a decade. It is a significant first step toward a long-term vision of achieving greater energy security through diversification of energy sources, improved efficiency and increased domestic production. In addition to implementing the new law, the administration is pursuing new ideas for alternative technologies and clean domestic production. For example, the administration and Congress are working to increase research in alternative fuels, and to safely increase domestic oil and natural gas production in the Outer Continental Shelf and Alaska. These and other pro-growth policies will benefit both the overall economy and workers.

Most importantly, American entrepreneurs and companies are investing billions of dollars in creative ideas for new fuels, power resources and better efficiency. Our flexible economy that rewards risk-taking and boosts productivity will also help us produce reliable and cost-effective energy.

With some politicians and commentators criticizing tax relief, free trade, immigration and labor policies, it is important to recognize the truth about wages and the distinctions between this economic expansion and past expansions. Increasing the tax and regulatory burden on our economy will not increase wages or make the current expansion more rewarding for workers. Without the tax relief, workers would be taking home a smaller portion of their paychecks. Higher taxes and a higher regulatory burden would just slow the strong productivity growth that we need to remain competitive in the global economy and increase standards of living.

How Military Credentials Play In November Elections (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

Andrew Duck knows he's a long-shot candidate for Congress. He's running against a seven-term incumbent, Roscoe Bartlett (R) of Maryland. He's a Democrat in a deeply red district. And he's raised only $150,000 so far, in an era when you need many times that to be taken seriously.

But he's got something on his résumé that Representative Bartlett doesn't have: 20 years of service in the Army, including time on the ground in Iraq. Will that make a difference? Probably not. Incumbents are tough to defeat. But, Mr. Duck says, when Republican voters hear his history, they're willing to give his flyer a second look.

For most of the 51 Democratic military veterans running for Congress this fall as nonincumbents - 50 for the House and one for the Senate - the climb is steep. In the House, only six are in competitive races, as defined by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. The one Democratic Senate challenger who's a vet, Jim Webb of Virginia, is locked in a tight race against Sen. George Allen (R) after a series of mishaps by the senator.

Of the 40 Republican military vets running for the House as challengers, only five are in competitive races. So the military credential has not been a big boon to either party's roster. But the Democratic Party, which has struggled for decades with an image of weakness on security, has tried to make more of their candidates' military service than has the GOP. And even if winning election to Congress is beyond the reach of many Democratic vets, they argue that they can still help their party.

"We offer them [the Democrats] something that they didn't have when we came to the party," says Duane Burghard (D), a Navy vet who is running against Rep. Kenny Hulshof (R) of Missouri. "We can stand up with authority and legitimacy that, in fact, the Democrats offer veterans and national security a better chance."

Last week, the group VETPAC, the Veterans' Alliance for Security and Democracy political action committee, held an event on Capitol Hill in support of Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who has taken major heat from Republicans for his turn against the Iraq war last year. VETPAC took over earlier this year as the lead nonparty group supporting Democratic military vets running for Congress as challengers, after the demise of the group Band of Brothers. Fundraising for VETPAC has been slow; before a fundraiser last week, it had raised only about $35,000.

Republicans say that the Democratic focus on veterans as candidates - highlighted in a party Web page called "Fighting Dems" - has been a failure. "This is the most overdone story of this cycle," says Danny Diaz, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee. "They are trying to use veterans as a PR tool and it's not working."

Still, in at least one competitive race, Rep. Rob Simmons (R) of Connecticut is using the lack of military service by his opponent, Joe Courtney, against him in a TV ad. So it may be that in some cases, military service insulates candidates from potential charges that they are weak on defense.

In the cases where Democratic vets are running competitive races, it's hard to say if it's military service that has made the difference. An impressive résumé doesn't get a challenger far without political and fundraising skill. It also helps if the incumbent is vulnerable and the political leanings of the district are favorable.

Joe Sestak, a retired vice admiral in the Navy, has raised more than $1 million and is giving 10-term Rep. Curt Weldon (R) of Pennsylvania a run for his money. Because of Admiral Sestak's high-level service, including time in the White House, "he has relationships with donors and political types that regular service-members don't have," says Amy Walter, House race analyst for the Cook report.

But "people know Weldon, he has a relationship with voters," Ms. Walter adds. "Will those relationships outweigh a desire for change?"

According to the Cook list, the other competitive Democratic challengers who are vets running for Congress are: Ken Lucas of Kentucky, Tammy Duckworth of Illinois, Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania, Chris Carney of Pennsylvania, and Eric Massa of New York.

Among GOP veterans running as challengers, the five competitive candidates are: Van Taylor of Texas, Chris Wakim of West Virginia, Max Burns of Georgia, Martha Rainville of Vermont, and Mac Collins of Georgia.

Bush The 'ATM' Readies Campaign Blitz (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's calendar this month will be filled with political events on behalf of GOP candidates for the House of Representatives, Senate and governor's offices, including a three-day Western swing starting today.

"The fact is we've got more requests than time," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Much of the focus this campaign season has been on the vulnerability of Republicans, who have controlled Congress for 12 years. This year, they face a public that a number of polls show is at best ambivalent about the war in Iraq and questions Bush's leadership.

In his public stump speeches, Bush says history and the voters will vindicate the decision that has become pivotal to the campaign: Iraq.

"Americans face the choice between two parties with two different attitudes on this war on terror," Bush said recently at a campaign stop for Alabama Gov. Bob Riley and the Republican Governors Association. He attacked Democrats as "the party of cut and run" in Iraq.

Over the next three days, Bush will stump and raise money for House candidates in Nevada, Arizona and California.

In the Golden State, Republican incumbent Reps. John Doolittle and Richard Pombo have had to answer questions about ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Both deny any impropriety or wrongdoing. Bush will try this week to help Bob Beauprez in Colorado, where the congressman lags in the polls in his bid for governor.

White House political affairs director Sara Taylor said Bush will have an "aggressive schedule" leading up to Election Day but declined to detail the president's complete itinerary.

"We're cognizant of the fact we need to turn out the vote," Taylor said. "We need to turn out Republicans to win a lot of these districts."

Democrats need 15 seats to retake the House and six seats in the Senate. Republicans have 22 governorships on the line Nov. 7.

Bush's approval rating is 44% in the most recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, his highest in a year. Some GOP candidates, such as House hopeful Rick O'Donnell, who is running for Beauprez's House seat in Colorado, have called on Bush to develop a new plan in Iraq. Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele and others have played down their Republican connections.

Many Democrats wield the Iraq war as a weapon against Bush and the Republicans. Sarah Feinberg of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee listed at least 15 House candidates who have criticized Bush in their ads against Republican opponents. Bush is also featured in Senate ads for Democrats in Virginia, New Jersey, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Arizona and Rhode Island, according to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

None of that has diminished Bush's ability to raise money. A record-setting fundraiser for his own campaigns, Bush through Friday has raised $182 million for Republican candidates and organizations, the Republican National Committee says. That's closing in on the at least $188 million he took in during the 2001-02 campaign season, according to published reports.

"For Republicans, he's like an ATM machine," said Stuart Rothenberg, publisher of a non-partisan political report. "Otherwise, they want to stay away from him."

DeWine Senate Race Now Dead Heat (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

A new poll shows the Ohio U.S. Senate race between the Republican incumbent, Sen. Mike DeWine, and his Democratic opponent, Rep. Sherrod Brown, in a statistical dead heat, and yesterday Mr. DeWine attempted to distance himself from President Bush before next month's midterm elections.

In a televised debate between the two lawmakers on NBC's "Meet the Press," Mr. DeWine said he would not have voted for the war in Iraq if he had known Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein's regime did not possess weapons of mass destruction.

He also said he doesn't have confidence in Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "He's made major mistakes in this war. There's absolutely no doubt about it."

The Mason-Dixon poll of 625 registered Ohio voters shows Mr. Brown leading Mr. DeWine 45 percent to 43 percent, with a four-point margin of error. In the same poll, Mr. DeWine is trailing Mr. Brown among independent voters, 52 percent to 33 percent.

Mr. DeWine also attempted to separate himself yesterday from the term "cut and run," a popular phrase among Republicans to describe Democrats' position regarding the war on terror.

"I don't know what it means," he said. "I don't know what it means to people."

In a speech to Republican donors Thursday, Mr. Bush described the Democrats as "the party of cut and run" when defending his administration's strategy on Iraq and the overall war on terrorism.

Nonetheless, Mr. Brown accused Mr. DeWine of being too close to Mr. Bush's policies.

"People who sit on the intelligence committees, like Mike DeWine, simply haven't done their jobs. They've not demanded accountability," Mr. Brown said. "They didn't demand a plan to reconstruct Iraq and rebuild Iraq. And then they didn't demand any kind of exit strategy."

Much of the NBC debate focused on Iraq, with Mr. DeWine and Mr. Brown offering their own ideas about how best to resolve the conflict and bring U.S. troops home. Mr. DeWine said he does not support a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops, while Mr. Brown, who voted against the war, said U.S. commanders should initiate a plan for troop withdrawal within two years.

When it was pointed out that he voted in favor of a 1998 resolution calling for regime change in Iraq, Mr. Brown said he supported the resolution under the reasoning that economic sanctions would be enough to force Saddam from power.

"Without military action?" Mr. Russert asked.

"Well, I don't know. We might have," Mr. Brown said.

It has been an especially difficult year for Republicans in Ohio. Gov. Bob Taft and Rep. Bob Ney both pleaded guilty to corruption-related charges, and the state has one of the higher casualty rates among U.S. troops serving in Iraq. Ohio Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell, the once-promising Republican gubernatorial candidate, now trails his Democratic opponent, Rep. Ted Strickland, by double digits.

"The climate, as they say, in politics is not good. But Ohioans know me," Mr. DeWine said when asked if his campaign was negatively being affected by outside forces. "I've served Ohioans, starting as a county prosecutor in 1976, for 30 years. I think they know my integrity. I think they know my honesty. I think they know who I am."

However, Mr. Brown said, "It's a bit more than a perception," and pointed out that Mr. DeWine previously had accepted campaign contributions from disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Mason-Dixon poll shows 10 percent of voters remain undecided about which candidate they will support, meaning either candidate is well within striking distance with just over a month before Election Day.

New Polls Detail Senate Campaigns In Three Pivotal States (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - Democrats are slightly ahead of Republicans in three election battleground states that will help determine control of the Senate, a series of polls released Sunday showed.

In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester had the support of 47 percent of registered voters while incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns had the support of 40 percent.

In Ohio, Democrat Rep. Sherrod Brown had 45 percent of registered voters, while incumbent Republican Sen. Mike DeWine had 43 percent.

In Tennessee, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr. had 43 percent and former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, the Republican Senate nominee, had 42 percent.

Democrats probably must win all three races if they're to take back control of the Senate on Nov. 7. They need to gain six seats overall, and these three are among the six seats currently held by Republicans that are considered most vulnerable.

Another Republican incumbent, Sen. George Allen of Virginia, was locked in a 43-43 percent dead heat with Democratic challenger James Webb, according to a poll released Friday by McClatchy Newspapers and MSNBC.

The surveys underscored how much these states are up for grabs and how much rides on the final five weeks of campaigning. The work of both major parties to get their supporters to turn out on Election Day could prove decisive. One in 10 voters remain undecided in Montana and Ohio, 12 percent in Virginia and 14 percent in Tennessee.

The polls were all conducted by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc. for newspapers in each of the states - the Lee Newspapers in Montana, the Cleveland Plain Dealer in Ohio and the Memphis Commercial Appeal and Chattanooga Times Free Press in Tennessee. Each state poll was of 625 registered voters and had an error margin of plus or minus four percentage points. The polls were taken between Sept. 25 and Sept. 28.

Mason-Dixon conducted a broader series of polls for McClatchy Newspapers and MSNBC in seven other closely fought Senate battleground states. Virginia results were released Friday, the other six will be released Monday.

In Tennessee, Mason-Dixon found the contest close in the fight for the Republican-held seat being vacated by Sen. Bill Frist, the majority leader who is retiring to run for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

Ford is running as a tough-minded moderate in a state that has trended Republican and did not even support Tennessee son Al Gore when he was the Democratic presidential nominee in 2000. Ford supports the death penalty, voted for the Patriot Act, and aired one ad featuring him in the church where he was baptized.

The congressman led among women 47-38 percent, and among Democrats 88-4 percent.

He also led among his fellow African-Americans by a margin of 91-3 percent. If he were to win the election, he'd be the first popularly elected African-American U.S. senator from the South.

Corker will not be outflanked to the right, however. He supports the Iraq war, vows tougher border security, and supports gun rights. He stresses that he cut violent crime while mayor, though the size of the reduction is disputed.

Corker led among men by 46-to-39 percent, among Republicans by 76-to-10 percent and among independents by 43-to-33 percent. He led among whites by 49-to-35 percent.

In Montana, Burns has two problems: his mouth and his friends.

Known for crusty speaking since his days as a farm radio host, Burns strikes some Montanans as down to Earth, others as embarrassing. In the most recent example, he told some Virginia firefighters who came to Montana to help fight a wildfire that they'd done "a piss poor job."

But it's his association with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff that could hurt him more. Burns took nearly $150,000 in Abramoff-related contributions before returning them. Also, two of his aides went to the 2001 Super Bowl on Abramoff's tab.

Tester, president of the state Senate, repeatedly hits Burns on ethics. "I won't sell Montana down the road by cutting deals with lobbyists like Jack Abramoff," Tester said in a recent debate.

In Ohio, Republican DeWine also has two problems. His are named President Bush and Ohio Gov. Bob Taft, both fellow Republicans.

Other polls have shown that Bush and the Iraq war are unpopular in Ohio, and that Taft's popularity dropped after he pleaded guilty to misdemeanor charges stemming from a statehouse ethics scandal.

DeWine is far from out of the race, however. To differentiate himself from Bush, he campaigns as a pragmatist who works both sides of the political aisle to get things done in the Senate. That's underscored by his role as one of the Senate's "Gang of 14" that forged a compromise last year to allow confirmation of several federal judges while preserving the minority's right to filibuster, or block, other nominations.

DeWine led among men by 47-43 percent, but trailed among women 47-39 percent. He and Brown each had support from about 80 percent of their party's base - but Brown led among independents by 52-33 percent.

The Mason-Dixon poll of 625 registered voters in each state was conducted by telephone Sept. 25-27 in Ohio and Tennessee and Sept. 26-28 in Montana.

Ohio Candidates For Senate Debate On Iraq (USAT)

USA Today, October 2, 2006

Rivals in Ohio's Senate race held their first televised debate Sunday, arguing on ABC's Meet the Press about Iraq and how to improve the situation. The Democratic National Committee has targeted GOP Sen. Mike DeWine's seat as key to efforts to gain a Senate majority.

Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, who voted against giving President Bush the authority to go to war in 2003, seized on the recent disclosure of a secret intelligence report and new books saying the war has increased terrorist threats. Brown accused DeWine of backing the status quo in Iraq and failing, as a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, to hold the Bush administration accountable.

DeWine distanced himself from Bush's comments last week that Democrats had become the “party of cut-and-run,” saying he did not know what that statement meant. DeWine said there would not have been a vote for war in 2003 if intelligence about the threat from Iraq's suspected weapons of mass destruction had been accurate.

Dean encourages voting by mail

Democratic Party chief Howard Dean said he's trying to improve the turnout of minority voters who support Democrats by encouraging mail-in ballots, a tactic he said Republicans have used effectively. He said Democrats are testing the tactic in a New Mexico congressional race this year. If the plan works, “we're going to do that in 2008 all over the place,” Dean said at the party's annual Hispanic leadership summit Saturday in Washington. In New Mexico's largely Democratic 1st District, home to what Dean called a Democratic National Committee pilot project, five-term Republican Rep. Heather Wilson is challenged by Democratic Attorney General Patricia Madrid, who grew up in a Hispanic household near the border.

Romney supports crackdown with a twist

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney told New Hampshire Republicans at their annual convention Saturday that he supports plans to reduce illegal immigration from Mexico but that the United States should do more to keep foreign students who come here and earn advanced degrees. “Let me tell you, you get a Ph.D. here in one of our great institutions, I want you to stay,” Romney said. “It makes no sense that we put up a big concrete wall against those who have education and skills but our doors have been wide open to people that have neither.”

Polls: Top Senate Races Very Competitive (AP-Y)

AP, October 2, 2006

Democratic Rep. Harold Ford is running even with Republican Bob Corker in Tennessee, while Democrat Jon Tester has edged ahead of Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana, according to polls released Sunday for some of the most contested Senate races.

The findings suggest an intensely competitive campaign for Congress heading into the Nov. 7 elections.

Republican Sen. Mike DeWine is in a virtual tie with Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown in Ohio.

The three races are three that Democrats need to win if they are to take control of the Senate.

The Mason-Dixon polls done for various media outlets found:

_Ford had the backing of 43 percent in Tennessee, while former Chattanooga, Tenn., Mayor Corker was backed by 42 percent. Corker had a lead in midsummer polling matching the two.

_Tester has pulled ahead of Burns in Montana, by 47 percent to 40 percent. They were tied in August polling.

_Brown had 45 percent and DeWine had 43 percent in Ohio, findings similar to those of a Quinnipiac poll released a week ago.

The polls were conducted for MSNBC, McClatchy Newspapers and newspapers in each of the states — The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer, the Lee Newspapers in Montana and The Commercial Appeal of Memphis, Tenn., and Chattanooga Times Free Press in Chattanooga, Tenn.

The polls of 625 registered voters in each state were conducted Sept. 25-28. They had margins of sampling error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Time, October 2, 2006

The polls keep suggesting thatÂ Republicans could be in for a historic drubbing. And their usual advantage--competence on national security--is constantly being challenged by new revelations about bungling in Iraq. But top Republican officials maintain an eerie, Zen-like calm. They insist that the prospects for their congressional candidates in November's midterms have never been as bad as advertised and are getting better by the day. Those are party operatives and political savants whose job it is to anticipate trouble. But much of the time they seem so placid, you wonder whether they know something.

They do. What they know is that just six days after George W. Bush won re-election in 2004, his political machine launched a sophisticated, expensive and largely unnoticed campaign aimed at maintaining G.O.P. majorities in the House and Senate. If that campaign succeeds, it would defy history and political gravity, both of which ordain that midterm elections are bad news for a lame-duck President's party, especially when the lame duck has low approval ratings. As always, a key part of the campaign involves money--the national Republican Party is dumping at least three times as much into key states as its Democratic counterpart is--but money is only the start. "Panic results when you're surprised," says Republican National Committee (R.N.C.) chairman Ken Mehlman. "We've been preparing for the toughest election in at least a decade."

Thanks to aggressive redistricting in the 1990s and early 2000s, fewer than three dozen House seats are seriously in contention this election cycle, compared with more than 100 in 1994, the year Republicans swept to power with a 54-seat pickup in the House. Then there's what political pros call the ground game. For most of the 20th century, turning out voters on Election Day was the Democrats' strength. They had labor unions to supply workers for campaigns, make sure their voters had time off from their jobs to go to the polls and provide rides to get them there.

Now, though, Democrats are the ones playing catch-up when it comes to the mechanics of Election Day. Every Monday, Ã¼berstrategist Karl Rove and Republican Party officials on Capitol Hill get spreadsheets tallying the numbers of voters registered, volunteers recruited, doors knocked on and phone numbers dialed for 40 House campaigns and a dozen Senate races. Over the next few weeks, the party will begin flying experienced paid and volunteer workers into states for the final push. The Senate Republicans' campaign committee calls its agents special teams, led by marshals, all in the service of the partywide effort known as the 72-Hour Task Force because its working philosophy initially focused on the final three days before an election.

So Republicans hope to close the deal in tight races with a get-out-the-vote strategy that was developed in the wreckage of the 2000 presidential campaign. Bush's team was led then, as it is now, by Rove, Bush's political architect and now White House deputy chief of staff, and Mehlman, then White House political-affairs director. Their theory was that Bush lost 3% or 4% of his expected vote in 2000 because those people just stayed home.

What Rove and Mehlman wanted to figure out was the code for increasing the number of Republican voters who could be reliably summoned to the polls--a code that, once cracked, could be used to win election after election. "We want to turn 75%-Republican areas into 78%- or 79%-Republican areas while at the same time turning 15% areas into 18% or 19% areas," says Mike DuHaime, political director of the R.N.C.

In the off year of 2001, the creators of the 72-Hour program tested it in odd, lower-profile contests, including court races in Pennsylvania. The Bushies picked clusters of precincts where they quietly tried their new methods, then compared those with similar precincts where the campaigns did things the more traditional way. Those experiments helped Republicans develop a handful of precepts that constitute the party's playbook for this fall:

1. Learn from the past Fifteen G.O.P. data experts spent months after the '04 election comparing turnout records from the swing states with the Bush-Cheney campaign's databases to figure out the optimal amount of mail, phone calls and door knocks that would persuade a probable G.O.P. voter to go to the polls.

2. Draw in new voters The Bush-Cheney campaign used state records to locate potential Republicans with Florida State University license plates, then had fellow Seminoles call them to sound out their views. Whereas parties used to go after certain precincts or ZIP codes, Republicans now know even which individual households they want through microtargeting --the use of computerized consumer data, from magazine subscriptions to charitable contributions, to help locate voters who are likely to vote Republican if they turn out. Other telltale signs of potential latent Republicanism are snowmobile ownership and enrollment in private schools.

3. Low tech can be better Caller ID, TiVo, cable channels and satellite radio all make it harder to reach voters than it was just a few years ago, increasing the importance of person-to-person appeals, the hallmark of old-fashioned, grassroots campaigns that used to connote an amateur or a low budget. "You clearly have to have TV ads," says White House political-affairs director Sara Taylor, "but for a little less TV, you can buy a whole lot of pizzas and phone lines and salaries for young men and women right out of college" to make phone calls, knock on doors and recruit and manage volunteers.

4. Details, details The shopping list includes everything from chairs to cell phones for hundreds of workers for Republican Party victory committees, whose staffs are charged with creating state turnout machines. The G.O.P. says their volunteer forces in '04 proved to be more effective than the paid workers contracted by Democrats, unions and Democrat-oriented fund-raising groups. Even Election Day comes sooner for Republicans, who have begun putting a huge effort into locking down absentee voters and vote-by-mail ballots in states that use them.

5. Spend more Republican officials estimate that at the end of August, their committees and campaigns had $235 million to spend in the two-month home stretch, a $58 million advantage over Democrats. The R.N.C. plans to lay out more than $60 million on turnout efforts and advertising vs. the more than $14 million set aside by Democratic National Committee (D.N.C.) chairman Howard Dean. Senator Hillary Clinton of New York, who has been critical of Dean's approach, complained at a D.N.C. fund-raising luncheon in Washington last week that the G.O.P. "is pouring tens of millions of dollars into races, and we're not matching that." House Republican officials contend that many of their Democratic challengers are so little known that they could be buried in an ad blitz. "You hit them, and they fold like a house of cards," a strategist said.

Republicans had begun to feel better about the election recently after Bush got a bump in the polls, reflecting a steady decline in gas prices and a successful effort by the White House to push national-security issues to the top of the news. But by last week G.O.P. operatives were less elated. Newscasts were trumpeting the tales of infighting in Bush's war cabinet told in Bob Woodward's State of Denial, a book full of stories about an Administration pursuing a war with no clue how to go about it. And Representative Mark Foley, a Republican from Florida, resigned after his X-rated Internet chats with teenage boys from the House page program were made public. A safe seat for Republicans was suddenly in jeopardy.

Republicans acknowledge one ominous vulnerability: for more than a decade, the party has benefited from an intensity gap. Stoked by hatred of Bill Clinton or love for George W. Bush, G.O.P. voters have been more certain to vote than Democrats--meaning that the party tends to perform better than the final opinion polls suggest. Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, head of the House Democrats' campaign committee, recently told TIME that gap had counted for as much as 5 to 7 points for the Republicans. But he thinks this election year might be different. "Their voters are unhappy," he says. "They're despondent about a failed President."

White House officials also concede they aren't so sure that Republicans will be motivated to go to the polls this year. Of course, expressions of doubt on the part of senior Republicans could be part of another game the G.O.P. plays better than the Democrats do these days: the expectations game. The Republicans are, after all, in the enviable position of being able to lose a lot. As long as they end up keeping control of both houses, they still come out the winner on Election Day. Sparks In The Heartland (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

NORTH VERNON, IND.-Democratic congressional candidate Baron Hill can't say for certain that the recent drop in gas prices represents an attempt by oil companies to boost Republican fortunes in the midterm elections, but he won't rule it out, either. "The best thing that happened to the oil companies is the oil men in the White House," Hill says, munching on tuna salad at a table of supporters in the White Front Cafe on the main drag of this postage-stamp-size town. "You can't say for certain, but why else would they be coming down?"

Hill's concern over possible collusion between oil companies and the GOP-a charge rejected by mainstream economists-is a sign of just how closely his chances for victory in November, along with those of dozens of other Democrats in competitive House and Senate races, may be tied to voter attitudes about the economy. A former congressman fighting for the seat he lost in 2004 to current Rep. Mike Sodrel in Indiana's Ninth District, Hill insists there is still plenty of evidence of what the Democratic Party has branded the "middle-class squeeze": stagnant incomes paired with rising costs for healthcare, education, and other staples of the American dream. "We're seeing a rich man's economic recovery," says Hill. Supporters at his table, including Mike Marshall, a struggling bar owner, and Karen Snyder, a teacher whose school may begin charging parents to help fuel school buses, nod in agreement.

Robust. But Sodrel, considered one of the most vulnerable Republicans in the House of Representatives, says that signs of the robust national economy abound in his southeastern Indiana district. He points to recently unveiled plans by Honda to build a plant that will employ 2,000 workers just outside the district and an announcement by a barge manufacturer along the Ohio River that it will hire up to 1,000 new workers in coming years: "The economy in the Ninth is doing good, and the outlook is good." The main impediment to such growth, Sodrel says, would be Democratic-backed tax hikes.

While the debate over the Iraq war and national security has absorbed most of the national media spotlight going into the midterms, the question of whether voters share the Democrats' gloomy view of the national economy or the more upbeat Republican assessment is expected to be almost as important in determining which party will control Congress next year. "The war on terror and the economy are the two mega-issues of this election," says Republican pollster Whit Ayres. Democratic pollster Mark Mellman points out that, when voters are asked about the top problem facing the country, Iraq is the most frequent response, but when asked about their top personal concern, healthcare and the economy are more common answers. "No matter what the national media write [about Iraq]," says Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, who is challenging Sen. Mike DeWine in Ohio, "people in Ohio are mostly talking about the 200,000 lost jobs under Bush and college tuition at state universities doubling. It's much more about people's everyday lives."

A Graham But Not Some Cracker (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072851

Sen. Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, seems to be just about everywhere these days. By 4 p.m. one recent Tuesday, the boyish-looking conservative had already led a Republican meeting on a detainee agreement he helped broker, held two press conferences, gone to a hearing on judicial nominations, and conducted several media interviews.

He wasn't always this popular. In fact, Graham has had more than a few moments of loneliness-his parents died when he was in college. But in the four short years he has been in the Senate, this independent-minded military lawyer has quickly become a key player-known both for his willingness to challenge the Bush administration and his ability to work across the aisle. This mix of talents has won him a host of admirers, some of whom think he might someday be presidential timber, as well as a few grumbles from conservatives back home.

Graham insists he's not a maverick, though that term has often stuck to him. Instead, he says, he's just applying life lessons to politics. "I constantly try to prevent myself from getting in a comfort zone of political decision making that would take off the table a boldness that I think our country needs," says Graham.

Breaking ranks. Recently, Graham, 51, has been front and center in the debate over the treatment of suspected terrorists. Graham's 22 years as a reserve Air Force lawyer has put him at odds with the Bush administration over the issue. And he often breaks ranks with Republicans on other subjects too, from Medicare to Social Security. On immigration, he supported President Bush's plan for a guest-worker program, which has angered many House conservatives. But make no mistake, Graham is not a moderate. The American Conservative Union gave him a 96 percent rating for his 2005 voting record; as a House member, he helped lead the drive to impeach President Bill Clinton.

All this has kept his constituents pretty happy. Since filling the late Sen. Strom Thurmond's shoes four years ago, Graham, a Baptist who has never married, has scored approval ratings between 65 and 70 percent. "South Carolinians generally like that he's independent ... and he doesn't lose touch with the little person," says Cole Blease Graham Jr. (no relation), a University of South Carolina political science professor.

Some of that popularity stems from the fact Graham never seems to forget where he came from. He was raised in the back room of a restaurant/bar that his parents ran in the small textile mill town of Central. He was often in charge of the pool hall downstairs. "When you own a bar," he says, "you learn a lot about people."

After Graham's parents died while he was attending the University of South Carolina, his 13-year-old sister went to live with an aunt and uncle, and Graham visited her on weekends. Once Graham finished law school, he legally adopted the sister and joined the Air Force as a judge advocate. He gained notoriety for a case involving drug testing that made the Air Force stop using a flawed urinalysis program. He later transferred to Germany to work as a military prosecutor.

How Will The Clintons Harness The Political Force Of The Blog? (USAT)

By David D. Perlmutter

USA Today, October 2, 2006

Recently, Bill Clinton went to the blogs. Now the political world might never be the same.

While blogging has caught oneverywhere, presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton still does not blog — or at least not much. But her husband's lunch with leftbloggers such as Atrios, MyDD's Matt Stoller, Daily Kos' McJoan and Americablog's John (according to TalkLeft.com) might signal an innovative commitment to blogging for the office of commander in chief.

The attractions of blogging for politicians are many. Blogging directly reaches a national (and even global) audience without the filtering of the newspaper or the price of TV time. Blogging can render an aura of intimacy difficult to attain via traditional mass media. Blogging is also a boon for politicians out of the public eye. Former Democratic vice presidential candidate John Edwards blogs and guest blogs and meets with bloggers.

The disadvantages of blogging for politicians are that it takes up time and that its stream-of-consciousness nature is a minefield of possible gaffes. Bloggers and their readers are high-maintenance. During Howard Dean's effort in 2003-04, the campaign found it hard to keep up with the comments by bloggers on their websites, and thus many felt ignored.

These issues dog Hillary. She has been attacked regularly by leftbloggers for her centrist-to-conservative stances on issues such as the Iraq war and flag-burning. Her poll numbers are holding up, but political professionals understand that wildfires on the edges of public opinion can spread to the center.

What, then, should be Hillary's blog strategy?

Ignore the leftblogs.

Hillary could do nothing with, to or about Democratic blogs, assuming that they end up supporting her if she wins the first few presidential primaries. But bloggers are not a herd to be led. Also, there is the fear-and-loathing factor: George W. Bush and the Iraq war have spurred immense anger and mobilization of leftblogs. It is not clear that the 2008 Republican nominee (say, John McCain) will generate as much antipathy, especially if he promises an eventual pullout from Iraq. Nevertheless, as leftblogger Natasha "Pacific Views" Celine notes, any Republican who is conservative enough to win his party's nomination will be perceived as quite threatening enough to motivate the online Democratic left.

Attack the leftblogs.

An intriguing option for Hillary is to use (or rather abuse) leftblogs to push her appeal to middle voters via a "Sister Souljah" moment, referring to the time in 1992 when Bill Clinton criticized the black, female rap artist. The political implication was that Clinton came off as a moderate Democrat not beholden to an "extremist" of the left and thus was more acceptable to sociocultural moderates and conservatives.

It might be tempting to "dis" a leftblog, preferably one that has made some heated statement about the Iraq war that is beyond the pale of mainstream U.S. public opinion. The danger is that this is not 1992. Sister Souljah could only complain to the media and her friends (by phone), whereas blogs can swarm the world with a mouse click.

Co-opt the leftblogs.

Hillary can meet with leftbloggers, brief them, feign respect for them, make the case that she must attract a majority of the electorate, and ask for help. And she can buy cooperation by hiring a major leftblogger who will sign on as a "consultant." Indeed, she is hiring, among others, Peter Daou, of Salon.com's Daou Report and director of blog operations for John Kerry in 2004.

Hence the significance of Bill's dine-in with the leftbloggers. Has the Clinton machine determined that Bill become the designated ambassador to the blogs? Proclaimed TalkLeft: "It was awesome." Although, to many leftbloggers, affection for Bill does not transfer to Hillary, her perceived opportunism or her policies.

How the Clintons play the blogs, or are played by them, is one of the most important political stories of the next few years. The 2006 and 2008 elections will be the coming-of-age era for political blogging and all the new, interactive, interlinking media technologies they have inspired. The blog political playbook is being written and will map out campaign strategies for generations to come.

10 Years Later, Fox News Turns Up The Cable Volume (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, October 2, 2006

NEW YORK — Roger Ailes, the man behind the curtain at Fox News Channel, says he was at a dinner party recently when one of the guests asked him, "Isn't Fox News too conservative?"

"I said, 'Are you comfortable with CNN?' He said, 'Yes.' How about CBS, ABC, NBC? 'Absolutely.' What about The New York Times, The Washington Post and The Los Angeles Times? 'Fine.' National Public Radio and PBS? 'Very good.' So I said, 'But this little cable channel is making you crazy? If all the media tipped to the right, I'd probably be the biggest liberal. But you've got to have debate.' "

In just 10 years, Fox News — the channel liberals love to hate — has transformed the cable news landscape with its in-your-face brand of news with 'tude. In the process, it has reduced granddaddy CNN to a distant second and NBC's cable news venture, MSNBC, to an also-ran. Fox News' combative Bill O'Reilly has become a household name, drawing more than 2 million viewers a night. Sean Hannity, Shepard Smith and Greta Van Susteren are cable news stars. On-air barbs by them and Fox News correspondents have ignited debates in journalism circles about whether objective news can stay relevant, particularly in an Internet era that gives ordinary Americans the power to vent about anything in blogs.

The ultimate sign of respect: Comedy Central's Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert riff on Fox News on any given night.

“Many Americans had built up a perception that mainstream American television journalism routinely displayed a liberal bias. Roger knew it and tapped into it,” says former MSNBC president Erik Sorenson. “Fox News convinced millions of those viewers that Fox's reporting was indeed fair and balanced, when compared to CNN and broadcast news. That resonated, especially in the wake of 9/11, and was underscored daily with strong, opinionated program hosts in prime time, on their morning show, and even during the day.”

Fox, which went on the air Oct. 6, 1996, “didn't want to be an international network,” says Tom Rosenstiel of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, a non-partisan media research organization. “They were going to be an American network, which is what their audience was looking for.”

Hosts such as O'Reilly and Hannity “bring passion and sincerity to a much-needed discussion of critical issues,” CNN's Lou Dobbs says. “And even though those are usually conservative voices, they are important voices.”

As Fox News begins its next decade, the explosive growth that marked its first has ebbed.

Fox News Channel now draws an average of 840,000 viewers daily (6 a.m. to 11 p.m.) — compared with CNN's 448,000 and MSNBC's 270,000. But Fox's average prime-time viewership dipped 35% in the third quarter of this year compared with last year, when Katrina dominated the news. CNN was down 28%, and MSNBC dropped 22%.

As penetration of cable TV reaches a saturation point and with increased competition from the Web, Fox's “job is going to get harder now, just as it got harder for CNN 10 years ago,” Rosenstiel says. “The big-growth era in cable seems to have come to an end.”

That's why Ailes has been on something of a tear lately. He has been shaking up his daytime lineup some, calling surprise staff meetings, putting more emphasis on Fox News' website by partnering with YouTube in launching “The Blast,” a dedicated page in which Fox News provides online video junkies with the craziest moments in news.

Anchor Shepard Smith says that although the ratings competition “for us is in cable, the Internet is clearly pulling eyes, and anybody who says otherwise is being disingenuous. Ten years ago you couldn't log on to find out what was going on. We need to integrate and use the Internet better. We have a long way to go.”

Beyond new-media challenges, Fox News also has been unable to shake — not that Ailes or anyone at Fox seems to care much — the perception that its coverage leans right and, since 9/11, has become increasingly pro-Bush White House.

That perception was fueled last week when former president Bill Clinton accused Fox News Sunday host Chris Wallace of “doing Fox News' bidding” by asking Clinton whether he had done enough to catch Osama bin Laden.

Never mind that Wallace's program airs on Fox broadcasting, not cable's Fox News, or whether Clinton's outburst was planned or spontaneous.

“Politicians used to be able to come on TV and read a rehearsed answer, and Cronkite and Huntley and Brinkley and those guys had to swallow it,” O'Reilly says. “They couldn't give them the O'Reilly arched eyebrow or tell them they were a pinhead.

“You now have a country that expects analysis on TV, where 10 years ago it only existed on the Sunday talk-show brainiac slot.”

Of the Clinton flare-up, Ailes says, “The only thing Chris didn't do is lay down like some other networks did” when they focused on what Clinton wanted to talk about: humanitarian efforts through his global initiative.

All weekend, Fox News extensively covered the scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., who resigned Friday after news of inappropriate e-mails to a teenage boy became public. On his program Sunday, Wallace discussed it with guests Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., and former House speaker Newt Gingrich.

Fox supporters and detractors agree that credit for Fox's success rests with Ailes, 66, a former Republican Party operative who made his name starting in the '60s in entertainment by producing The Mike Douglas Show.

The success has pleased parent company News Corp. In a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the company said Ailes stands to make $15.8 million in salary, bonus and stock this year.

Sitting in his second-floor office here, Ailes says Fox News has changed the TV news game: “Does anybody think Katie Couric (in her new role as anchor of The CBS Evening News) would have a segment called ‘Free Speech' if it wasn't for Fox News?”

DOJ_NMG_0072854

And Ailes says Dobbs, CNN's formerly staid business anchor, turned to hot-button debates such as illegal immigration after he "took one look at Bill O'Reilly and said: 'This guy is shooting his mouth off about what people really care about. I can do that.' "

(Both CBS and Dobbs say Fox had no role in their decisions.)

Ailes also says Fox News is probably more conservative than other TV news outlets, but only because it has consistently given equal voice to people whom mainstream media traditionally ignored if not disdained: conservatives.

Liberals "hate us for coming on the scene and changing the game and making people look at both sides of issues," he says.

But Robert Greenwald, who produced a film that attacked Fox News, Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism, says objectivity is an unknown concept at Fox.

More times than not, he says, Fox pushes a conservative agenda, albeit with "a wink and a nod. They don't do down-the-middle stuff — in their news or on their opinion shows. By design, they mix the two."

In Greenwald's eyes, Fox News Channel's most significant contribution "has unfortunately been the way news is covered, with the spread of let's-have-a-shouting-match, wrestling news entertainment." But he credits Ailes with "a genius for picking people who can talk to you. He proved that news doesn't have to be homework or spinach."

The accusation that Fox News is on the right-wing bandwagon comes mostly from those who don't watch the channel, says Brit Hume, the former ABC White House correspondent who joined two months after Fox's launch and hosts a daily political news program, Special Report. Some people "look at Fox News and see O'Reilly and Hannity and think, 'That's all they do over there,' " Hume says. "They probably think Bill and Sean are co-anchors and are on 24/7. You'd rather do without the label, but here we're succeeding. We pinch ourselves every day."

Jane Skinner, a daytime anchor, says friends who work at local TV stations around the country are constantly asking her what it's "really like" to work at Fox News — the assumption being that there's a political agenda and that she and others are told what questions to ask or comments to make.

"I laugh," Skinner says. "You can make all the comments about 'fair and balanced,' but they (management) are very much hands-off."

Rosenstiel, who has studied programming of all the cable news channels, says his most recent study shows Fox News journalists "were more likely to offer their opinions about the news, but often those opinions were fairly innocuous, like 'If there's an American victory in Iraq, that's good news.' I don't know anyone who would argue with that, but it's unusual to hear someone say it on TV news."

Besides, Rosenstiel says, "one person's bias is another person's telling the truth on TV. And the way Fox anchors and correspondents talk is very informal, not the stiff, omniscient narrator of traditional broadcast news. They talk like regular people, use plainer language.

"If it's a military conflict, they refer to American troops as 'our' troops. It's hard to argue when an American network does that. It is different from traditional broadcasting, but it's stylistic — not conservative or liberal."

Smith notes that in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Fox was as tough on the Bush administration as any other media outlet: "We were getting fed a pack of untruths and we showed the truth."

Anchoring two hours a day with his afternoon Studio B and then at night with The Fox Report, Smith says the toughest challenge for Fox News staffers is to stay ahead of the pack. "You're constantly trying to reinvent yourself, and when others see things that work, they copy them. You have to be the innovator all the time — and that's hard to do."

Says Van Susteren, who jumped from CNN five years ago: "If you think about it, we all do the same stories. We all did polygamy. We all did the war. Hezbollah. We all do missing people.

"But there's a reason people want to watch Fox — and the reason is we enjoy our jobs more and it pushes out to the screen. It gives us more energy and makes us push a little bit further. I think viewers pick up on it."

The Right Man For Fox News (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

DOJ_NMG_0072855

NEW YORK -- Ten years after he created Fox News Channel, Roger Ailes says he still avoids mentioning his place of employment in certain circles.

"It's just not worth going through the hassle at an elite party," he says. And: "The only reason I know we're doing the right thing is that we're widely criticized." And: "I've never felt out of the mainstream in America. I've felt out of the mainstream at Le Cirque."

If the paunchy 66-year-old executive sounds as though he still harbors sharp resentments toward a liberal-leaning world, that bristling attitude is embedded in his network's genetic code as well. Ailes says he recently considered retiring but rejected the idea because, well, there are too many things that still tick him off.

Never mind that he got a big promotion last year, with owner Rupert Murdoch putting him in charge of Fox's local television stations as well as what has become the top-rated cable news channel. The onetime Republican operative remains acutely sensitive to any slights, pulling out of the National Academy of Television Arts and Sciences after Fox News was repeatedly shut out in Emmy nominations. Ailes wrote the academy head in 2002 that the award-winning stories were "those that reinforce the views and prejudices of your judges. . . . Earth to academy: your bias is showing."

Vanity Fair recently pegged Ailes as No. 44 on its New Establishment list, calling him "the most powerful news executive in America." But it also called him "the man who gives the Bush administration a major media outlet" and described Dick Cheney -- who demands that his hotel TVs be preset to Fox -- as his "big loyal friend."

"Vanity Fair is a left-wing rag," says Ailes, adding a moment later that its editor, Graydon Carter, is a friend. Ailes says the magazine's item is "just blatantly false" because he has met Cheney only a half-dozen times. Responds Carter: "Roger is the smartest guy in TV. Unfortunately, he's working for the wrong side."

The Cheney reference was based on the vice president's decision to grant his only interview after accidentally shooting a hunting companion to Fox's Brit Hume. Ailes says Hume asked all the necessary questions, and "the only thing he didn't do was be disrespectful to him, which is what the left wants."

The liberal view was crystallized last week when Bill Clinton unloaded on "Fox News Sunday" host Chris Wallace, who had pressed him about his record in fighting al-Qaeda. Clinton defended his tenure and accused Wallace of conducting "a nice little conservative hit job."

"I wouldn't want to be a waiter in a restaurant and bring him the wrong dish," Ailes says. "When you lean in and poke at journalists and try to intimidate them, it's a mistake."

While Fox remains No. 9 among all cable networks, some slippage in the ratings over the past year has Ailes concerned. For the last three months, Fox is down 28 percent from the same period last year, compared with declines of 21 percent for CNN and 12 percent for MSNBC.

Ailes responded with a recruitment ad that included such lines as "Can You Work Well With People Without Being a Territorial Jerk?" and "When You're Tired, Can You Keep Going Without Whining or Making Mistakes?" He also summoned executives to a 5 a.m. meeting to critique morning programming. "Sometimes we get ourselves thinking our job is to send memos to each other. I wanted to make them justify their paycheck."

Fox executives have been touting a proposed business channel, but Ailes has resisted the idea unless the new network can get distribution in at least 30 million homes. Fox has now cut a deal with YouTube to provide the Web site with video of "the craziest moments in news."

Despite its "fair and balanced" mantra, Fox is widely viewed as conservative, with nearly seven in 10 national journalists in a 2004 survey citing it as an especially conservative news outlet.

And Fox sometimes puts its thumb on the scale. When Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez was attacking President Bush, the network ran such on-screen graphics as "Chavez Insults U.S.: Where's the Outrage?" "Taking Cheap Oil From Hugo Chavez: Act of Treason?" and "New York Audience Gives Chavez Standing Ovation . . . Why?"

Fox gets its ideological sheen not from its reporters but from its high-profile conservative hosts, such as Sean Hannity, John Gibson and Bill O'Reilly, who regularly complains about the "left-wing press." And while the network has some liberal commentators, none has the prominence of Newt Gingrich.

But Fox may have moderated its journalistic approach a bit in recent years, with Ailes hiring Wallace from ABC News, former CNN anchor Bill Hemmer and Harvard analyst Marvin Kalb.

From where Ailes sits -- he says he gets asked for autographs in the real America, if not at Le Cirque -- the issue is the rest of the media. After the 9/11 attacks, he says, some journalists "ridiculed" him for wearing a flag pin.

"The New York Times had to fire a person for making up news," he says. "We haven't taken down a major story. If we make a mistake, we correct it in an hour."

Ailes believes he has helped discredit the notion that conservatism is "a freak point of view" in the media, noting that Rush Limbaugh, whose television show Ailes once produced, recently did a "Free Speech" commentary on the "CBS Evening News."

"We have forced a dialogue into the news business that didn't exist before we got here," Ailes says.Foley's Showdown With ABC

On Friday afternoon, a strategist for Rep. Mark Foley tried to cut a deal with ABC's Brian Ross.

The correspondent, who had dozens of instant messages that Foley sent to teenage House pages, had asked to interview the Florida Republican. Foley's former chief of staff said the congressman was quitting and that Ross could have that information exclusively if he agreed not to publish the raw, sexually explicit messages.

"I said we're not making any deals," Ross recalls. He says the Internet made the story possible, because on Thursday he posted a story on his ABC Web page, the Blotter, after obtaining one milder e-mail that Foley had sent a 16-year-old page, asking for a picture. Within two hours, former pages had e-mailed Ross and provided the salacious messages. The only question then, says Ross, was "whether this could be authenticated."

The St. Petersburg Times last fall obtained the earlier e-mail, asking the 16-year-old for a picture, and interviewed the boy, who wrote a friend that he considered the message "sick." But the boy would not go on the record.

Executive Editor Neil Brown says the paper's policy against making accusations based on unnamed sources was a factor. "We just didn't feel like we had the story," he says. "We had a lot of stuff implied. . . . If I had it to do over again, I think we probably would have been more organized about pursuing it. But hindsight is 20/20."

The paper did interview Foley, who assured a reporter that the e-mail exchange was innocent, Brown says.Delivering a Verdict?

Linda Greenhouse, the New York Times' Supreme Court reporter for three decades, has no shortage of opinions.

She aired some of them in June when she was honored at Harvard, saying that "our government had turned its energy and attention away from upholding the rule of law and toward creating law-free zones at Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib, Haditha and other places around the world. And let's not forget the sustained assault on women's reproductive freedom and the hijacking of public policy by religious fundamentalism."

Don't those remarks, publicized last week by National Public Radio, go too far for a beat reporter covering such issues at the high court? Greenhouse says her comments were "statements of fact," not opinion, as underscored by the court striking down the administration's policy of holding terror suspects without charges.

"The notion that someone cannot go and speak from the heart to a group of college classmates and fellow alums, without being accountable to self-appointed media watchdogs, means American journalism is in danger of strangling in its own sanctimony," Greenhouse says.

Tom Kunkel, dean of the University of Maryland's journalism school, calls Greenhouse's remarks "ill-advised," saying that while she can "still report objectively on contentious issues before the Supreme Court, the average person can reasonably ask, how can that not color her stories?" But former Times ombudsman Daniel Okrent says it is impossible "to find any trace of her views in her work."

Fiasco In 1936 Survey Brought 'Science' To Election Polling (WSJ)

By Cynthia Crossen

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

President Alf Landon?

In the fall of 1936, the most influential poll in America, run by Literary Digest magazine, predicted that Mr. Landon, governor of Kansas, would trounce the Democratic incumbent, Franklin Roosevelt, with 57% of the popular vote. Literary Digest's poll was massive -- it sent out 10 million ballots that year -- and it had correctly forecast five previous presidential elections. There was widespread concern that the poll might create a bandwagon effect, giving Mr. Landon an even bigger victory.

The poll could hardly have been more wrong. Mr. Roosevelt won the election with more than 60% of the popular vote; Mr. Landon carried only two states, Maine and Vermont. The failure of the Literary Digest and other, smaller polls, "will undoubtedly revive agitation for their abolition or control," wrote the New York Times. Kenneth McKellar, a Democratic senator from Tennessee, called the Literary Digest poll "wicked," and promised to sponsor legislation to put polling under federal supervision.

Although by that time polling was not a young business, it was still operating in the statistical Dark Ages. First used around 1824, straw polls (named for the way farmers threw a fistful of straw in the air to see which way the wind was blowing) were often taken by traveling journalists or private citizens. They might ask everyone on a steamship or train how they intended to vote. One man who traveled around the Northeast in 1856 did 23 polls, interviewing 2,886 people, wrote Susan Herbst in her 1993 book, "Numbered Voices." All of his polls were published in the New York Times.

One reader in 1896 wrote to the Times about a recent poll he had witnessed on a train. "A straw poll of 23 riders showed 18 for McKinley, five for Bryan. ... When the train halted at Ballston, among those who got off were the five Bryan sympathizers, and then it was seen that they were handcuffed together, and were a gang of prisoners on their way to the county jail."

Literary Digest, a general-interest weekly founded in 1890, began doing straw polls in 1916. It mailed ballots to its subscribers, gradually building up a list with publicly available names of people who owned telephones and cars. At its peak, the magazine sent ballots to 20 million people, and employed 400 clerks to tally the returns.

But magazine subscribers and owners of cars and telephones during the Great Depression tended to be more affluent than the average voter -- and more Republican. Indeed, in its 1936 pre-election report, the magazine reported that a skeptic had called its office to ask, "Has the Republican National Committee purchased the Literary Digest?" Commented the magazine, "Absurd and amusing."

In its postelection report, however, the editors acknowledged that the poll undersampled some groups of voters. And whose fault was that? "We wonder why we get better cooperation in what we have always regarded as a public service from Republicans than we do from Democrats. Do Republicans live nearer mailboxes? Do Democrats generally disapprove of straw polls?"

Even among the subset of people who received ballots, there was an element of self-selection. People with ample leisure were more likely to take the trouble to help Literary Digest. But plenty of the "lower strata," as the magazine called them, voted that year.

There was at least one man who relished the Literary Digest fiasco: George Gallup. Mr. Gallup, a market researcher and syndicated columnist, had begun experimenting with so-called scientific methods of polling, and in July 1936, he predicted Literary Digest would call the election erroneously. He himself projected a Democratic victory, although his margin turned out to be way off.

Mr. Gallup, of course, was one of the leaders of the pack that predicted Thomas Dewey would beat Harry Truman in 1948. Pollsters' methods and tools -- and confidence -- had improved so much in the dozen years since 1936 that they decided they didn't need to collect more data after October. In a postelection poll by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan, 14% of Truman voters said they made up their minds in the two weeks before the election, and 3% said they decided on Election Day.

"Everyone believes in public-opinion polls," joked the radio comic Goodman Ace. "Everybody from the man on the street all the way up to President Thomas E. Dewey."

By 1948, Literary Digest was long gone. It had already been facing financial problems when its poll flopped; it suspended publication in 1938 and later merged with Time magazine.

Its editor in 1936, Wilfred J. Funk, derided Mr. Gallup's methodology, saying mockingly that the Digest's poll had never been able to discover "how many rich men, poor men, G-men, racketeers and candlestick makers" voted in any given election. Twelve years later, a reporter asked Mr. Funk to comment on the Truman-Dewey polls.

"I do not want to seem to be malicious," Mr. Funk said, "but I can't help but get a good chuckle out of this. ... I wonder if the word science will continue to be used with this type of public-opinion poll."

Rice Heads To Mideast To Buttress Palestinian Leader (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice departed Sunday for the Middle East, on a trip billed by aides as an effort to bolster the embattled Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, in his struggles with the militant Islamic group Hamas, and to consult with Arab allies on Iran's nuclear program and the turmoil in Iraq.

The State Department sought to play down expectations for Ms. Rice's trip, her first to the region since an agreement brokered by the United Nations ended the one-month war between Israel and Hezbollah this summer.

During her last visit, in July, Ms. Rice was criticized by Arab leaders for failing to move quickly to try to end the violence then raging along the Israeli-Lebanese border.

The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said this week's trip, scheduled to begin in Saudi Arabia and to include stops in Egypt, Israel and the West Bank, was not likely to produce any major steps forward for American policies in the Middle East.

"These meetings are more about consultations, taking stock of where we are," he said.

On her visit to the West Bank, she is expected to meet with Mr. Abbas, his third meeting in less than three weeks with Bush administration officials.

During meetings in New York last month on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly, President Bush praised Mr. Abbas as a "a man of courage" for his efforts to make peace with Israel and bring order to the Palestinian territories.

But the United States has signaled it has no plans to resume financial aid to the beleaguered Palestinians unless Hamas, which won elections in January and controls the government, takes steps to recognize Israel and forswear violence — moves that the group's leaders have rejected, despite pressure from Mr. Abbas.

In remarks last week to the editorial board of The New York Times, Ms. Rice praised Mr. Abbas, saying he needed time "to sort through what he wants to do."

Despite her absence from Washington, Ms. Rice seemed most likely to be dogged from a distance this week about descriptions of her actions in a new book by the reporter Bob Woodward, especially about his report that Ms. Rice rebuffed warnings from the Central Intelligence Agency two months before the Sept. 11 attacks about an imminent strike by Al Qaeda.

Mr. Woodward said the starkest warnings were made in a July 10, 2001, meeting in the White House between Ms. Rice, then the national security adviser, and George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence. Through spokesmen, she has rejected Mr. Woodward's account of the meeting, saying Mr. Tenet did not issue such a blunt warning at the meeting and expressed none of the frustration attributed to him in the book.

Rice Seeks To Revive Stalled Peace Talks (AP)

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is renewing efforts to revive stalled Mideast peace talks, visiting the region this week for the first time since a U.N.-brokered cease-fire halted Israel's war with Hezbollah militants.

Rice planned stops in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Israel and the West Bank to consult with leaders. On Tuesday, she meets with Egypt's president and eight Arab foreign ministers in Cairo with the Israel-Palestinian dispute at the top of the agenda.

During her last visit to the region in August, Rice took heavy criticism for U.S. unwillingness to move for a quicker end to fighting in Lebanon.

This time, Rice's goal will be to move the U.S. democracy agenda forward with a discussion of threats to stability and moderation in the region such as Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah, her spokesman said last week.

Rice's visit comes amid some progress in the U.N.-brokered cease-fire, which took effect Aug. 14. On Sunday, the Israeli army abandoned almost all of its positions in Lebanon, a key step in fulfilling a major condition of the truce.

Still, Israel said it was "now waiting for Lebanon to do its part" — to keep Hezbollah out of the south and disarm it. Israel also plans to continue surveillance flights, which both Lebanon and the U.S. consider a violation of the border.

Rice plans to hold the Bush administration's third meeting in two weeks with Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas. The embattled secular leader was called a "man of courage" last week by President Bush for trying to revive peace talks despite a continued political stalemate with Hamas militants.

The top U.S. diplomat hopes to revive and expand agreements allowing transfer of goods and freer movement for Palestinians in and out of their separate territories in Gaza and the West Bank. The territories on opposite flanks of Israel would form an independent Palestinian state under a U.S.-backed plan for long-term peace.

But prospects for a return to active peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have looked dim this year, partly because the political upheaval in both governments kept leaders' attention focused inward.

Rice Will Try To Get Arab Allies To Join Efforts Against Iran (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 2, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was headed to the Middle East on Sunday night to rally Arab allies against Iran and try to resurrect Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

The trip is Rice's first to the region since a cease-fire Aug. 14 ended 34 days of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Shiite militia that controls much of southern Lebanon.

The centerpiece of Rice's six-day trip is a meeting Tuesday in Cairo with foreign ministers from Arab states that are U.S. allies: Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain and Oman.

Nabil Fahmy, Egypt's ambassador to Washington, said participants will discuss the regional security threat posed by Iran and ideas on how to restart the Arab-Israeli peace process.

“We've been pushing the United States for a while to get re-engaged,” he said. “You won't get the whole package unless you start somewhere.”

Announcing the trip last week, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Rice wants to work with Arab leaders “who have a vision for a moderate, peaceful, democratic, stable and prosperous Middle East.”

Jamal Khashoggi, an adviser to the Saudi ambassador to Washington, Prince Turki al-Faisal, said the Bush administration plans a major push to address the Israeli-Palestinian dispute after U.S. elections in November. In part, the effort is intended to help the United States' Arab allies offset criticism that they have done less to help the Palestinians than radicals such as Hezbollah and Iran, Khashoggi said.

McCormack did not say whether the administration plans a new Middle East initiative. He described Rice's visit as “exploratory” and said she was following up on President Bush's recent pledge at the United Nations to revive peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

“Clearly after the Lebanon war, there has been a reassessment by the Arabs,” said Ziad Asali, president of the American Task Force on Palestine, a Washington-based organization that advocates a Palestinian state alongside Israel. Arab leaders “see Iran as trying to steal the Palestinian issue from them.”

On Sunday, Israeli troops virtually completed their pullout from Lebanon, withdrawing from all but a single village on the border. They entered Lebanon after Hezbollah guerrillas captured two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid July 12.

Also Sunday, rival Palestinian security forces battled in Gaza. The fighting was sparked by disputes over unpaid salaries and the formation of a unity government.

Expectations for quick progress by Rice are modest, given the weakness of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government — blamed for poor performance in Lebanon — and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. Her Palestinian agenda is “pretty minimalist,” said Edward Abington, a former U.S. diplomat who advises Abbas.

Abbas has failed to form a unity government with the militant Muslim group Hamas, which won parliamentary elections in January and refuses to recognize Israel.

Abington said Abbas hopes Rice can pressure Israel to ease freedom of movement for the 1.4 million Palestinians bottled up in Gaza. Israel withdrew unilaterally from the territory last year, and Rice helped negotiate agreements on border crossings from Gaza into Israel and Egypt. Israel has resealed the territory in response to Gaza militants' rocket attacks on Israel and the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier in June.

Rice also plans to visit Saudi Arabia. In the past, she has prodded the Saudis and Egyptians to introduce democratic changes. The focus this time: rallying U.S. allies against Iran and its partners.

Bush's broad push for democracy in the Middle East — a pillar of his foreign policy — "is being underplayed," said Amr Hamzawy, a Middle East expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, a think tank in Washington. "The Bush administration defines 'moderates' as those who support peace with Israel, not confrontation."

Yossi Alpher, an independent Israeli strategic analyst, said Arab leaders have been pushed toward a tacit alliance with Israel as Iran has become more confrontational.

By backing Hezbollah, developing a nuclear program and meddling in Iraq, Iran has made the security outlook "very ugly for all of us," Alpher said. "The only bright spot is that (Israel and its moderate Arab neighbors) realize we are all in it together."

Iran Set On Expanding Nuclear Program (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

Iran's hardline president on Sunday said his country was determined to expand its uranium enrichment program, announcing a plan to produce more nuclear fuel and calling allegations that Tehran was seeking nuclear weapons a "big lie."

Speaking to professors at Tehran University, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reinforced his rejection of demands by the U.S. and its allies to stop enrichment, saying his country was committed to generating nuclear fuel for electricity.

"Allegations or charges by the United States than Iran is seeking nuclear weapons is a big lie," Ahmadinejad said during his speech, which was broadcast on state-run television.

The process of uranium enrichment can be used to produce electricity or build nuclear weapons depending on the level of enrichment. The U.S. alleges Iran is seeking to build nuclear weapons, but Iran contends that its program is for peaceful purposes.

Ahmadinejad said in his speech that Iran will hopefully install up to 100,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material in order to produce nuclear fuel. He did not provide any more details or set a timeline, but installing so many centrifuges could take several years.

In February, Iran announced for the first time that it produced a batch of low-enriched uranium, using 164 centrifuges.

It also has said it plans to intall 3,000 centrifuges by the end of the year at its uranium enrichment plant in the central Iranian town of Natanz. Large-scale production of enriched uranium in Natanz would require 54,000 centrifuges.

The speech Sunday was one of several lately in which Ahmadinejad has said Iran will not give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium to produce nuclear fuel and won't consider suspending it, even for a day.

"Not a single person has a right to give up the rights of the Iranian nation," he said.

Iran has been locked in a battle with the United States and some of its allies over its nuclear program. Tehran defied a U.N. Security Council deadline calling on it to suspend enrichment by Aug. 31 or face possible international sanctions.

But talks between Iranian and European officials have continued over a package of incentives that six countries — the United States, China, Russia, France, Britain and Germany — are offering Tehran in return for suspending its enrichment program and returning to full-scale negotiations.

Last week, envoys ended two days of talks in Berlin with no agreement on the enrichment issue but insisted they had "come to some positive conclusions" on ways to open broader discussions.

An Offer Tehran Can't Refuse (NYT)

By Ted Koppel

DOJ_NMG_0072861

A few days ago, I inadvertently violated United States economic sanctions against Iran. I was paying my hotel bill in Tehran, didn't have enough cash and asked if I could use a credit card.

"I'll need to keep your card for at least half an hour," said the clerk. Since he'd also "needed to keep" my passport for the first couple of days I was in Iran, I thought nothing more of it. Half an hour later, I had my hotel bill and my credit card and left for the airport.

A couple of days later my assistant asked me if I had purchased any clothing in Dubai. "No," I said. "Why?" Someone, it appeared, had used my corporate credit card to do just that. When I heard the amount involved — precisely the total of my hotel bill — I understood.

There had been no purchase of clothing in Dubai, of course; but some Dubai business debited my credit card there (where such a transaction is legal) for the amount of my hotel bill, simultaneously crediting the company that owns the hotel in Tehran with that sum for the purchase of goods or services in Dubai. Similar, much larger loopholes enable the European subsidiaries of American companies to sell sanction-banned American goods inside Iran in limited but still significant quantities.

Even as the United States withholds its goods and technological know-how from Iran, the Europeans, Russians, Japanese and especially the Chinese are offering theirs as quickly as the contracts can be drafted. The likelihood that more restrictive sanctions against Iran will either make it through the United Nations' bureaucratic quagmire or dissuade Iran from darting down the path toward nuclear technology is about as dim as that of a popular uprising among the people under 30 who make up 70 percent of Iran's population.

Many of Iran's young adults — especially the well-educated, English-speaking ones who cross the path of a visiting American journalist — are frustrated by the puritanical nature of Islamic law. They dismiss their president and ours as deserving each other, denounce the corruption of the mullahs and speak with surprising openness about confiscated satellite dishes, blocked Internet sites, the closing of newspapers and the jailing and mistreatment of dissidents. But the young malcontents appear nowhere close to staging a revolution.

On the highway from Tehran to the Mehrabad airport, I witnessed a mind-bending object lesson in the limits of youthful rebellion: two young women on in-line skates, clutching the door handles of a car being driven by a young man at speeds approaching 60 miles an hour. Both women brazenly violated every traffic law known to man, but with their head scarves in place, the loose ends firmly clenched between their teeth. There are certain lines you don't cross.

Trivial acts of rebellion, irrelevant to the Islamic revolution, are tolerated. Anything perceived as a significant challenge is not. One of the men who planned and executed the taking of the American Embassy in 1979, for example, spent nine months in solitary confinement for collaborating on a public opinion poll whose findings were deemed unacceptable.

Iran suffers from chronic underemployment and its social safety nets are flimsy at best. The Revolutionary Guards now resemble Mafia families more than ideological shock troops. They still wield enormous influence, but their clout has corrupted them. In Tehran, I'm told, the Revolutionary Guard dominates the construction industry and its leading members have become exceedingly wealthy as a consequence. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad remains popular among the peasants and the poor, who note that he has failed to deliver on most of his campaign promises but are willing to grant him more time. As long as the price of oil remains above $50 a barrel, Iran can buy what it needs.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's tweaking of the West and his refusal to bow to pressure on the nuclear issue are widely popular in Iran. There was a time, not long ago, when many Iranians genuinely believed that there was a danger of an American military attack, even an invasion. Hardly anyone seems to believe in that possibility any more.

What, then, can the United States do to prevent Iran from developing nuclear technology? Little or nothing. Washington should instead bow to the inevitable.

"You insist on having nuclear weapons," we should say. "Go ahead. It's a terrible idea, but we can't stop you. We would, however, like your leaders to view the enclosed DVD of 'The Godfather.' Please pay particular attention to the scene in which Don Corleone makes grudging peace with a man — the head of a rival crime family — who ordered the killing of his oldest son."

In that scene, Don Corleone says, "I forgo my vengeance for my dead son, for the common good. But I have selfish reasons." The welfare of his youngest son, Michael, is on his mind.

"I am a superstitious man," he continues. "And so if some unlucky accident should befall my youngest son, if some police officer should accidentally shoot him, or if he should hang himself in his cell, or if my son is struck by a bolt of lightening, then I will blame some of the people here. That I could never forgive."

If Iran is bound and determined to have nuclear weapons, let it. The elimination of American opposition on this issue would open the way to genuine normalization between our two nations. It might even convince the Iranians that their country can flourish without nuclear weapons.

But this should also be made clear to Tehran: If a dirty bomb explodes in Milwaukee, or some other nuclear device detonates in Baltimore or Wichita, if Israel or Egypt or Saudi Arabia should fall victim to a nuclear "accident," Iran should understand that the United States government will not search around for the perpetrator. The return address will be predetermined, and it will be somewhere in Iran.

Maybe we could induce Richard Armitage out of retirement to play the Don Corleone part. Apparently he knows the role, having already played it in Pakistan.

At Least 6 Die As Palestinian Movements Clash In Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 1 -- The Palestinian security service controlled by Hamas moved forcefully in the Gaza Strip on Sunday to disperse demonstrators loyal to the rival Fatah movement who were demanding months of back pay from a nearly bankrupt government.

At least six people were killed, including two teenage boys, and more than 100 were injured in day-long clashes that marked the most severe partisan violence between the two sides in months.

The fighting, which erupted in downtown Gaza City and later flared in the West Bank, came after Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas's effort to form a power-sharing cabinet with Hamas collapsed in recent days. The apparent failure has brought mutual recriminations between the two main Palestinian political movements at a time of stifling economic crisis in the territories stemming from international sanctions against the Hamas-controlled government.

Ghazi Hamad, an adviser to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, called the violence "regrettable." He accused the demonstrators, many of them from the Fatah-dominated security forces, of attacking members of the 3,000-member security branch that reports directly to the Hamas-run Interior Ministry. Many of those who serve in that force also belong to Hamas's military wing.

"The protest today was beyond acceptable legal norms and turned truly into lawlessness," Hamad told reporters in Gaza.

Fatah leaders in Gaza called on Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority, to launch a probe into the crackdown and take action against the Hamas government. One of those killed was a member of the Palestinian preventive security forces, a powerful branch whose ranks are filled with Fatah members.

Abbas has so far declined to exercise his authority to fire Haniyeh and dissolve the government. But pressure is building within his party for him to take bold steps to end the political crisis following his apparent failure to organize a so-called national unity government.

Abbas announced last month that his secular-nationalist Fatah party and Hamas, a radical Islamic movement, had agreed to a joint political program that would usher in a power-sharing government. Haniyeh endorsed the agreement, which his aides said would leave him in the position of prime minister. The new government would comprise members of the two major parties, smaller movements with seats in the parliament and technocrats without political affiliation.

The agreement also accepted the 2002 Arab peace initiative that calls for the recognition of the Jewish state once Israel leaves all territory it occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

But the deal has unraveled in the past few days. Haniyeh and other Hamas leaders have said that Hamas as a movement would never recognize Israel's right to exist. Abbas has accused Hamas of reneging on the agreement, saying the talks to form a unity government are "back to square one."

The United States, the European Union and other international donors have demanded that Hamas renounce violence, recognize the Jewish state and accept signed agreements with Israel in return for a renewal of aid, which accounts for nearly half the authority's $2 billion annual budget.

Those sanctions remain in place, and Israel has also kept frozen the roughly $55 million in monthly tax revenue it collects on behalf of the Palestinian government, a sum equal to roughly half the authority's monthly payroll.

The 165,000 Palestinian government employees, nearly half of them in the security forces, have received only a small fraction of their salaries in the past seven months. A civil-service strike across Gaza and the West Bank has kept public schools shuttered, courts closed and the parliament out of action for nearly a month.

The clashes Sunday began outside the parliament building in Gaza, and gunfights quickly spread across much of the city's main commercial area. Witnesses said the Hamas security branch used grenades, antitank weapons and rifles to break up the protesters. There were also reports of violent demonstrations in the central Gaza city of Khan Younis. Later in the evening in Gaza, hand grenades were thrown at a group of Fatah demonstrators, killing one and injuring 30 0thers.

In response to the Hamas crackdown in Gaza, armed Fatah loyalists vandalized and partly burned the empty cabinet building in the West Bank city of Ramallah. Hours earlier, dozens of protesters there marched in the city streets, chanting "Hamas Out!"

Fatal Clashes In Gaza Over Unpaid Salaries (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 1 — Hamas and Fatah gunmen fought running battles in Gaza on Sunday, as Hamas forces tried to disrupt Fatah-organized protests over unpaid government salaries. Six Palestinians were killed and more than 100 were wounded.

The clashes were among the most severe between the Palestinian factions since Hamas won power in legislative elections in January.

After President Mahmoud Abbas, who was traveling abroad, ordered a halt to the demonstrations by members of his Fatah faction, angry protesters turned their rage toward a government building in Ramallah, on the West Bank.

Some offices in the Ramallah cabinet building, which is empty because many of the Hamas cabinet members in the West Bank have been arrested by the Israelis, were set on fire after protesters marched through the city shouting, “Hamas out!”

The fighting came as Israel, which has troops in Gaza, pulled its last soldiers out of Lebanon early Sunday morning, handing off to the Lebanese Army and United Nations peacekeepers under the terms of an Aug. 14 cease-fire. Israel wanted its forces home before the somber Yom Kippur holiday, which began at sunset on Sunday.

A few Israeli soldiers remain in the village of Ghajar, which is divided by the international border between Lebanon and the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights.

The clashes in Gaza were bloody, with Hamas militiamen under an auxiliary command known as the Executive Force, formally now part of the police, trying to break up a large demonstration near Gaza City’s parliament building. The Hamas men, in black T-shirts and camouflage pants, fired guns and antitank grenades after the interior minister, Siad Siam, ordered them to stop what Hamas considers to be a rebellion among the Fatah-dominated security forces.

Then supporters of Fatah, including the preventive-security service and Mr. Abbas’s presidential guard, fired back.

The crowd scattered, screaming. A man and a teenager were killed and 32 were wounded, including three schoolchildren and a cameraman for the satellite station Al Arabiya. The fighting spread through other parts of Gaza, despite the midday call for Ramadan prayers, before subsiding in the late afternoon.

At Al Shifa Hospital in Gaza City, ambulances brought in the dead and wounded. Saqer Ayish, 17, who works in the presidential guard, was wounded, and his mother rushed in wailing. Hassan Abu Hatal, 15, a schoolboy, died from a bullet to the head; later, a boy, 16, was also killed, according to a doctor at Shifa.

At least one member of the presidential guard and one Hamas militiaman were killed. Two more Palestinians died in unrelated family disputes, doctors said.

Sunday evening, the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, said that he had spoken to Mr. Abbas by telephone and that the two had agreed to work together to stop the violence. He defended the actions of Hamas and urged Palestinians to come together "in the face of a serious escalation from the occupation forces," meaning Israel.

Israeli troops on Sunday moved again into northern Gaza to try to stop rocket fire into Israel. Mr. Haniya asked Gazans to "respect the law and discipline and not to go into the streets."

Tensions throughout the Palestinian territories have been particularly high during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, because both Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya had promised that a month's salary would be paid to the 170,000 or so employees of the Palestinian Authority. The employees have been paid less than two months' salary during the past seven months, bringing great hardship, and Ramadan is a time for family gifts and charity to the poor.

But in fact most employees were paid less than a third of a month's salary before Ramadan, and Hamas officials have angered Mr. Abbas by accusing him of trying to undermine them by keeping back the international aid that passed through his office to avoid the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

Mr. Abbas has dismissed those accusations, but his efforts to bring about a national-unity government with Hamas appear to be foundering after the Hamas governing council refused to endorse an earlier agreement he had made with Mr. Haniya.

Mr. Abbas is being pressed by some members of Fatah to dismiss the Hamas government, but it is unclear whether he also possesses the power to call new elections.

Since the election of Hamas in January, Israel has refused to hand over more than $50 million a month in taxes and duties it collects for the Palestinians. And since March 28, when Hamas took over, the United States and the European Union have cut off direct financing to the Palestinian Authority until the government recognizes Israel's right to exist, forswears violence and accepts previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Hamas has been unable to come to terms either with the West, which regards it as a terrorist organization, or with Mr. Abbas, who has been trying to find a way to renew the flow of money to the desperate Palestinians.

There were also clashes on Sunday in Khan Yunis, in the southern part of Gaza, where 23 were wounded, and on Saturday there were smaller clashes in Deir al Balah as Hamas held rallies in Gaza and the police also demonstrated, blocking roads and shooting into the air.

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator and spokesman, blamed Fatah for the clashes, accusing the security services of striking "to weaken Hamas and to topple the government." Hamas said it had arrested up to 25 members of the protesting security personnel.

Tawfiq Abu Khoussa, a Fatah spokesman in Gaza, accused Hamas of "shedding Palestinian blood" and said, "Nothing can justify this violence."

Members of the preventive-security service said they had been attacked by Hamas gunmen, some of them using clubs.

Ghazi Hamas, the spokesman for the Hamas government, called the violence regrettable and insisted that Hamas had acted with restraint. "The protest today was beyond acceptable norms and turned truly into lawlessness," he said.

Hamas-Fatah Gunbattles Cover Gaza (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Gunbattles broke out across the Gaza Strip when heavily armed Hamas militiamen tried to break up anti-government demonstrations yesterday, killing seven persons and injuring dozens in the worst internal Palestinian violence since Hamas took power.

Militants from the opposition Fatah group retaliated by torching the Palestinian Cabinet building in the West Bank. The violence comes amid growing frustration over the parties' failure to form a national-unity government that could end crippling economic sanctions.

The fighting continued throughout the day and sent schoolchildren and other civilians in downtown Gaza City fleeing for cover.

"This is forbidden in Islam. We are in the holy month of Ramadan," said Majed Badawi, 33, who managed to escape after his car was caught in the crossfire. "It's a shame on Hamas, who call themselves real Muslims, and a shame on Fatah, as well. Why are they fighting and over what? We are victims because of both of them."

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, spoke with President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, by telephone and called for joint action to end the fighting, Mr. Haniyeh's office said. But in a televised speech, Mr. Haniyeh also defended the Hamas militiamen, saying they acted lawfully in trying to break up the protests.

Fatah officials blamed Hamas for the chaos. "Nothing can justify this violence," Fatah spokesman Tawfik Abu Khoussa said.

Hamas has been under pressure since its January election victory over the long-ruling Fatah.

Israel and the West, which view Hamas as a terror group, cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid and tax transfers to the Palestinian Authority, making it nearly impossible for the new government to pay its 165,000 workers.

In recent weeks, civil servants -- including members of the security forces, many of them Fatah loyalists -- have held expanding protests against the Hamas-led government to demand back wages.

On Saturday, the Hamas government sent its 3,500-member militia into Gaza's streets to quash the protests.

The fighting started in the southern Gaza town of Khan Younis, where dozens of police gathered to demand back wages, protesters said. The Hamas militiamen ordered them to disperse, then opened fire at the protesters, who responded by shooting in the air, protesters said.

Fighting then broke out between militia members and security officials in northern Gaza, and violence spread to the parliament building in Gaza City, where security officers and civil servants were protesting. The protesters threw stones at Hamas militiamen, who eventually fired on the protesters, according to a reporter at the scene.

Militiamen and security personnel -- including bodyguards for Mr. Abbas -- began trading fire nearby. People scattered, and children covered their heads with their schoolbags for protection.

The clashes later spilled over to an area near the president's residence.

The street battles killed four persons, including a presidential bodyguard and a 15-year-old boy, said Dr. Baker Abu Safia, director of Gaza's Shifa Hospital. Two others were killed in related violence, and at least 75 were injured, hospital officials said.

A seventh person, a member of the preventive security force, was killed Saturday night when unknown gunmen shot at the car he was in, security officials said.

In response to the violence, Fatah protesters in the West Bank city of Ramallah broke into the Cabinet building and set the second floor on fire. A second building in the compound also was set ablaze.

Forced out by the fire, the militants moved to the Education Ministry and torched a car on the way. They then trashed the offices of a Hamas newspaper.

In the West Bank city of Hebron, Fatah-allied militants ransacked the offices of local Hamas lawmakers and set the furniture on fire.

Rival Palestinian Gunmen Clash, Leaving 8 Dead (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

JERUSALEM — Armed men from the governing Hamas movement and its rival, Fatah, clashed Sunday in a series of gun battles in the Gaza Strip that left at least eight people dead and dozens more injured, Palestinian officials said.

It was the deadliest factional violence in months of tension, and came as the two sides appeared to have deadlocked in their attempts to form a coalition government aimed at breaking the international aid boycott against the Hamas-led government.

The outbreak of violence jumped to the West Bank, where gunmen set fire to the offices of the Hamas-run Cabinet in the city of Ramallah and burned a car outside the Education Ministry building.

The hopscotching violence reflected the geographical balance of power between the rival Palestinian groups. Whereas Gaza is the main stronghold of Hamas, a radical Islamic movement, once-dominant Fatah prevails in the West Bank.

The clashes began after 3,000 members of a special Hamas police unit took up positions around the Gaza Strip with orders to use force, if necessary, to break up demonstrations by members of the Palestinian security forces. The security officers have closed roads and burned piles of tires to protest the government's failure to pay them full salaries.

Many of those demonstrators are Fatah members, and Hamas has accused them of seeking to create chaos to undercut the government, of which Hamas gained control after winning parliamentary elections in January.

Late Sunday, officials expressed regret over the clashes, and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas urged calm. But a government spokesman said Hamas forces were justified in trying to keep protesters from going too far.

"We have deployed the executive forces in the streets to maintain law and order and to stop the state of lawlessness and troublemakers," said Ghazi Hamad, the spokesman. "The participation of security service members in riots is a violation of the law which threatens the national security in the Palestinian community."

Fatah leaders accused Hamas of brutality.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who belongs to Fatah and was in Jordan at the time, urged security force members to halt their demonstrations. He pledged a criminal investigation of the shootings.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak ordered a delegation of security specialists from his country who are assigned to Gaza to mediate between the two factions.

By evening, though, the streets in Gaza City were quiet.

The dead included three civilians, one of them a 15-year-old boy, and two members of the presidential guard. An officer in the Palestinian preventive security force was killed, along with a member of the Hamas unit. A Fatah member was killed late Sunday in a confrontation with Hamas forces that also injured at least 20 people in the Bureij refugee camp, south of Gaza City.

Most of more than 80 wounded in the confrontations were civilian bystanders, officials said.

The clashes began when the Hamas units sought to clear demonstrators from a main road near Khan Yunis in southern Gaza, leaving 17 people hurt amid the shooting. A separate confrontation broke out in the Sheik Adwan neighborhood on the northern edge of Gaza City.

A sustained gun battle near the parliament building in Gaza City killed the teenage boy and wounded numerous others. The two members of Force 17, the corps of presidential guards, died during separate skirmishes near Abbas' Gaza City residence.

The gun battles marked the latest dark turn in the Palestinian political situation, and it renewed fears of more widespread civil strife.

Abbas and Haniyeh said they had reached a tentative agreement on a unified government last month, but subsequent talks to solidify the deal were frozen after disputes arose over whether the proposed government would recognize Israel.

Hamas refuses to recognize the Jewish state and has said that it would agree only to a long-term truce. Abbas wants the government to comply with the three conditions set by the West for restoring aid to the Palestinian Authority: recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and honoring agreements between the Palestinians and Israel.

Fatah accused Hamas of backtracking on the initial agreement, which contained wording meant to signal a tacit acceptance of Israel's right to exist. But Abbas, during a speech to the United Nations General Assembly late last month, appeared to demand that the proposed government recognize Israel more explicitly.

The two sides have not met since, stirring rising concern among Palestinians of an impasse that could lead to more violence. Palestinian leaders are under pressure from the 165,000 government employees as well as ordinary residents to find an end to the aid boycott, imposed soon after Hamas came to power.

The Palestinian treasury has been further depleted because Israel has withheld about $50 million monthly in tax and customs revenues it collects on the Palestinians' behalf.

Israel Almost Gone From South Lebanon (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0072867

The U.N. called Israel's pullout from nearly all of south Lebanon on Sunday "significant progress." But sources of friction remained: Israel still holds the Lebanese part of a divided border village and its planes patrol Lebanon's airspace.

Both the Lebanese government and Hezbollah dismissed the withdrawal, which came more than six weeks after a cease-fire ended the 34-day conflict, as "incomplete" and demanded Israel stop what they called its violations of Lebanon's airspace, sea and land.

"What is required is a complete and comprehensive Israeli withdrawal and a halt to Israeli attacks on Lebanon," Information Minister Ghazi Aridi told The Associated Press. "So far, there is no final solution. Israel's pullout today is incomplete."

Senior Hezbollah official Sheik Hassan Ezzeddine warned the Islamic militant group would resume attacks against Israel if it breached the U.N. cease-fire, which went into effect Aug. 14.

"The enemy must bear the consequences of its continued air, sea and land violations in Lebanon," said Ezzeddine , the group's top political official in south Lebanon.

The Israeli army withdrew from the entire south except for the village of Ghajar, said a statement by the commander the U.N. Interim Force in Lebanon, known as UNIFIL.

"Significant progress has been achieved today," Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini of France said. "I expect that they will leave this area in the course of the week, thus completing the withdrawal in line with the (U.N. Security Council) resolution 1701."

The pre-dawn pullout put a formal end to a nearly three-month troop incursion into Lebanon that began after Hezbollah guerrillas captured two Israeli soldiers and killed three others in a July 12 cross-border raid.

It clears the way for the full deployment of UNIFIL's 15,000 soldiers who will police the border with an equal number of Lebanese army troops.

Israel has been gradually withdrawing troops since the cease-fire went into effect, from a peak of 30,000 during the fighting. The Israeli naval blockade of Lebanon ended more than three weeks ago.

U.N. Force spokesman Alexander Ivanko, speaking on Lebanon's privately owned Christian TV station LBC, said a deal on Ghajar was expected next week. He did not elaborate.

But there were no scenes of jubilation Sunday similar to those that greeted the withdrawal of Israeli forces from south Lebanon in 2000 after an 18-year occupation.

In the border village of Marwaheen, the most visible of the 10 vacated positions, the Israelis had held a hilltop position before pulling out early Sunday.

The villagers went about their business in what is perhaps a reflection of the weariness felt by many in south Lebanon after decades of almost continuous fighting with Israel.

It also could be attributed to the uncertainty over the future.

"You can never know whether they will be back again," cautioned Mohammed Musseileh, a 67-year-old farmer from Marwaheen, referring to the Israelis.

Witnesses said Israel began moving tanks and armored carriers out of pockets near the border after midnight. The roar of Israeli tanks could be heard on the Lebanese side as they moved across.

Israeli military officials said the last soldiers returned to Israel around 2:30 a.m. ahead of the onset of Yom Kippur, the holiest day on the Jewish calendar, at sundown Sunday. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity under military guidelines.

An armored column creaked across the border at the Israeli border community of Moshav Avivim, leaving tread marks in the soil and sending a large cloud of dust into the air.

Israeli spokeswoman Miri Eisin said Israel was "now waiting for Lebanon to do its part under the truce."

Israel wants Lebanon to keep Hezbollah out of the south and disarm it, but Beirut has indicated it would not actively seek Hezbollah's weapons. The militant group said it would disarm only when a strong central government was in place.

UNIFIL has said the question of disarming Hezbollah was best left for the Lebanese to tackle, but it would support the Lebanese army if it takes on the task.

Both the U.N. and the Lebanese government consider Israeli overflights as violations of the cease-fire, but the Israeli officials said Sunday there were no plans to stop them.

Ivanko, the UNIFIL spokesman, said the issue of the overflights was raised several times with the Israeli side, which has been asked to halt them.

Another source of tension in Lebanon is the disputed Israeli-held Chebaa Farms area near the borders of Israel, Lebanon and Syria. Resolution 1701 had directed the U.N. secretary-general to come up with a proposal to delineate the borders in the area within a now-elapsed 30 days.

After Israel abandoned its hilltop position in Marwaheen Sunday, some villagers saw a chance to make a little money. A group of men in a pickup truck grabbed some discarded tires. Another villager arrived, and later carried home a roll of electrical cables.

Ghanian peacekeepers in a white U.N. armored personnel carrier photographed the site. Two Lebanese military intelligence officers in plainclothes also surveyed the area before Hezbollah officials arrived in two vehicles, one of which was an ambulance marked as gift from the Iranian Embassy in Beirut.

They blocked the narrow road leading up to the former Israeli position, preventing reporters and villagers from reaching the spot.

Saleh Diyab Mohammed was among those who came to the hill after the Israelis were gone. He planted a Lebanese flag atop his half-finished, two-story house which was apparently used by Israelis soldiers.

"Now, I feel pure and proud," he said. "I feel free again."

India Links Spies, Islamic Militants To Bombay Attack (WT)

By Rahul Bedi

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

NEW DELHI -- India accused Pakistan's spy agency yesterday of colluding with Islamist militants in a series of bomb attacks that killed 186 persons on trains in Bombay in July.

Bombay's police commissioner, A.N. Roy, said the "terror plot" was sponsored by Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI), executed by Pakistani militants and aided by a banned Indian Islamist group.

Commissioner Roy said an intensive investigation, including the use of "narco-analysis tests," or truth serum, showed that at least 12 Indians and 11 Pakistanis were involved in the bombings.

Security officials said the evidence would be handed over to Islamabad in the next few days.

Pakistan's junior information minister, Tariq Azim Khan, said the accusations of ISI involvement were "baseless" and a "knee-jerk reaction."

"India has always chosen this path of pointing fingers at Pakistan without evidence," he said. "If they have any evidence, they should provide us with it, and we will carry out our investigations."

Commissioner Roy said the ISI began planning the attacks in March and provided funding and training for the bombers in Bahawalpur, in Pakistan's eastern Punjab province.

High-grade plastic explosives were smuggled into Bombay, while funds for the attack came from Pakistan through an operative in Saudi Arabia representing the Pakistani extremist group Lashkar-e-Taiba, Commissioner Roy said.

He said the bombers slipped into India from Pakistan, Nepal and Bangladesh and were met by Indian "sleepers" from the banned Students Islamic Movement of India.

On July 11, the day of the bombings, seven two-person teams -- each made up of one Indian and one Pakistani -- took the bombs to the Churchgate terminus in south Bombay, he said. They were put on trains and, within 11 minutes, all seven bombs exploded.

Irbaz Khan, a spokesman for Lashkar-e-Taiba, said: "We reject the allegations. They have named us in an effort to cover up their own failure and security lapses."

Indian Foreign Secretary Shiv Shankar Menon said his government would not judge Pakistan by its "immediate reactions or verbal statements, [but] by what they actually do about terrorism." India has long called on Pakistan to rein in militants operating from its territory and the disputed Kashmir region.

Mr. Menon said New Delhi would test the efficacy of a new joint India-Pakistan agency to tackle terrorism. "It seems logical that the mechanism has to deal with this kind of evidence," he said.

Pakistan Said To Play Both Sides On Terror War (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

NEW DELHI

Indian officials pointed a warning finger at Pakistan this weekend, saying that Pakistan's top intelligence agency masterminded and funded July's train bombings in Mumbai (Bombay).

The accusations continue the neighboring countries' decades-long pattern of blame and denial. This time, however, other nations are joining the chorus.

Last week, a think tank in Britain's Defence Ministry released an incendiary report saying that Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency "has been supporting terrorism and extremism, whether in London ... or in Afghanistan or Iraq."

On top of that, Afghan President Hamid Karzai spent most of the past week condemning Pakistan for ignoring and even abetting extremism, while frustrated American military officials decried Paki- stan's inability to clamp down on the Taliban in its border territories.

Pakistan's contradictions in the war on terror have long been obvious: It is both a crucial American ally and a primary training-ground for terrorists. But events in recent weeks suggest that, for the moment at least, pressure on Pakistan is increasing as the United States and Britain seek solutions to problems in Afghanistan and Iraq.

"The [Pakistani] Army's dual role in combating terrorism and at the same time promoting the MNA [a coalition of Islamist parties], and so indirectly supporting the Taliban through the ISI, is coming under closer and closer international scrutiny," said the British Defence Academy report.

It added: "Indirectly Pakistan, through the ISI, has been supporting terrorism and extremism whether in London on 7/7 or in Afghanistan or Iraq." ISI plans attacks too, says India

But India's claims of ISI involvement break new ground. Indian officials have long accused Pakistan of sponsoring terrorism in India in order to foment communal riots and destabilize the nation. The Mumbai (formerly Bombay) blasts on July 11, which killed 187 people, were no different, say Mumbai police.

Yet Mumbai Police Commissioner A.N. Roy went further when he announced the findings of his investigation Saturday. In the past, Pakistan was accused only of helping terrorists by allowing them to train in the country. In this case, Mr. Roy said the leading July 11 terrorists were Pakistanis, and that ISI plotted the attack before handing over the execution to the terrorist group Lashkar-i-Tayyaba.

So far, police authorities have presented little evidence to support these claims, though officials say they hope their findings are strong enough to win convictions within two years.

Pakistan has denounced the accusations. "The reported statement by [the] Mumbai Police Commissioner is irresponsible and [it is the] repetition of baseless allegations," reads an e-mail statement by Pakistan's Foreign Office.

Yet Pakistan has frequently found itself on the defensive in recent weeks. Pakistan's truce with militant tribes has led to a threefold rise in attacks across the border in Afghanistan, according to US military officials. And Afghan President Karzai's repeated complaints about Pakistan's unwillingness to rein in radicals forced last week's meeting in Washington, where President Bush sought to soothe tempers between America's divided allies Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

Perhaps the most surprising criticism, however, has come from Britain. The report from the Defence Ministry think-tank was so inflammatory that Prime Minister Tony Blair had to personally reassure President Musharraf that the leaked document was merely the work of some government analysts, not government policy.

And in a London court just a few days earlier, an accused terrorist testified that he had attended a terrorist training camp in Pakistan run by the ISI. Thereafter, he refused to give any further testimony, saying ISI agents had threatened his family.

If true, "this is quite sensational, because it is the first official confirmation of the involvement in terrorism of the ISI, an agency of a country which Washington and London has regarded as an ally, and Washington gives $3 billion in aid to," says M.J. Gohel, a terrorism expert at the Asia-Pacific Foundation in London. A history of suspicion surrounding ISI

The Mumbai police report only sharpens scrutiny of ISI, an organization with a well known history of incubating militant outfits. In a bid for greater influence in Afghan affairs, ISI is believed to have helped the Taliban during its rise a decade ago. Indeed, Pakistan was one of only three countries to recognize the Taliban government. The ISI is also widely believed to have become involved with terrorist groups directed toward the conflict in Kashmir.

Islamabad claims it disbanded those groups after 9/11. But many analysts and critics suggest that some continue to operate under different names and fronts, often unofficially supported by factions of the intelligence community.

"Gradually after 9/11 there's been a restructuring of militant outfits," says Ayesha Siddiqa, a defense analyst in Islamabad. "In the process, some have gone, some have been merged, some have been divided, but the phenomenon still remains."

She and others argue that ISI compartmentalizes its policy where it meets Pakistan's strategic goals - for example, by fighting international terrorist groups like Al Qaeda while at the same time unofficially supporting other elements of the militant community.

The dual policy exposes Pakistan's peculiar view of terrorism in the region, analysts say.

"People in Pakistan believe that the conflict in Kashmir is a freedom movement, and that those people should be able to fight," says Kamal Matinuddin, a retired general who is now a military analyst in Rawalpindi. "That is where the difference arises between the people of Pakistan and the rest of the world." Musharraf's next move

Whether the recent criticism of ISI will force Musharraf to take some action is open to question. Bob Ayers of Chatham House, a London think-tank, doubts it will. Blaming "Pakistan is the flavor du jour," he says.

At least Musharraf is playing along with the West, he says. Mr. Ayers and other Western analysts fear that if the US pushes too hard, Musharraf could fall, and someone far more problematic could come to power. "This is just a cycle," says Ayers. "It deflects attention away from our lack of results in the war on terror."

It could have much greater consequences for the eggshell-strong peace process with India, though. Last month, the leaders of India and Pakistan took an unprecedented step - agreeing to share intelligence as part of joint antiterror efforts.

Saturday's announcement will present a new obstacle.

Some see it merely as a blip. "All that will happen is that talks will be delayed by 15 or 20 days," says Pakistani retired General Matinuddin.

But the prejudices among the intelligence agencies on either side of the border are deep, and they indicate how difficult a joint intelligence project could be.

Hamid Gul, a former ISI director dismisses the idea that ISI is a rogue agency working to terrorize India.

"Pervez Musharraf is in complete control of the ISI. To assume or insinuate that there is a cavity in the ISI that is pursuing its own agenda is utterly wrong," says Mr. Gul.

Instead, he suggests that India is blind to its own problems. The realities on the ground in India, including poverty and discrimination against Muslims, provide ample reason for disgruntled Indians to wage war against their own government, he says.

By contrast, a former senior Indian intelligence official says the ISI is just up to its old tricks. "Pakistan uses terrorism as a tactical move to achieve what its Army cannot on the war front and what its bureaucrats cannot on a negotiating table," says Ajit Doval, former chief of India's Research and Analysis Wing (RAW).

India's foreign secretary said Sunday that he will share evidence from the Mumbai investigation with Pakistan. "This will be the test case of the [joint] mechanism," says Mr. Doval. "If they are sincere, they'll act on the evidence."

But he is skeptical. Echoing the sentiments of many Indians - and pointing to the level distrust to be overcome - he asks: "What is the point of sharing evidence with someone who is party to the crime?"

Avian-flu Samples On The Way To CDC (WT)

By John Zarocostas

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

GENEVA -- After 18 months of stalling and repeated calls for cooperation by international health officials, China is expected to deliver a batch of animal virus samples of the lethal avian influenza virus H5N1, senior global health officials say.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) laboratory in Atlanta expects the samples to arrive "in the coming days," said Mike Purdue, head of a team that is studying how influenza moves from animals to humans on behalf of the World Health Organization (WHO).

Dr. Purdue told The Washington Times that the necessary paperwork was completed by Chinese authorities last week, but one carrier did not want to haul the samples, so they will be shipped by another company for WHO.

WHO first asked China to share the samples in the spring of 2005, after thousands of migratory birds died in the province of Qinghai. The 10 samples expected by the CDC are from Qinghai and other regions, Dr. Purdue said.

International health officials and diplomats have long been frustrated by Beijing's failure to send the samples promptly, despite its public pledges of full cooperation after its reluctance to share information aggravated a crisis over severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) in 2003.

The sharing of specimens is essential if researchers are to find a vaccine and more effective anti-viral drugs against bird flu. Since 2003, there have been 251 human cases of the avian influenza virus in 10 countries, of which 148 resulted in deaths.

Some Asian and Western health diplomats attribute the delay to a bureaucratic turf war between China's Ministry of Agriculture, which has been reluctant to share the samples, and the Ministry of Health, which has been more willing to co-operate. The same sources said Chinese authorities were now fully sharing human samples from victims of bird flu and HIV/AIDS.

Despite its dynamic economy and huge foreign reserves, China offered only $10 million at a pledging conference in Beijing in January aimed at strengthening global preparedness against a human avian influenza pandemic.

Senior Western diplomatic sources said China initially offered no contribution at all and only came forward with the $10 million pledge when pressure was put on its political leaders. However, diplomats are cautiously optimistic that China is moving in the right direction on global health issues.

In a significant move, China has put forward Margaret Chan, a senior WHO official, for the top post of the global health agency, which is vacant after the sudden death in May of the incumbent, Lee Jong-wook. This is the first time that China has nominated a candidate for a major global agency.

Dr. Chan, formerly Hong Kong's top health official, played a pivotal role in stamping out an avian-flu outbreak in the city in 1997. In July 2005, she publicly scolded China for stalling on vital cooperation over the outbreak of bird flu.

Another leading candidate in a crowded field is Shigeru Omi, a Japanese national and WHO regional director for the Western Pacific. Asian diplomats described fierce behind-the-scenes lobbying by Tokyo and Beijing for their respective nominees. The outcome is to be decided on Nov. 9.

Brazil's Lula Forced To A Runoff In Reelection Bid (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

SAO PAULO, Brazil, Oct. 1 -- President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva won the first round of Brazil's presidential election Sunday, but fell short of earning enough votes to avoid a runoff later this month against the second-place challenger.

With more than 98 percent of polling places counted, Lula received about 49 percent of the votes -- shy of the 50 percent needed to win reelection outright and avert an Oct. 29 runoff. The runner-up, former Sao Paulo state governor Geraldo Alckmin, received about 41 percent.

Lula, 60, cast his vote Sunday morning in Sao Bernardo do Campo, an industrial suburb of Sao Paulo, where he worked as a lathe operator and developed into an outspoken labor union leader who opposed the country's military dictatorship in the 1970s and '80s. Corruption scandals have hounded him during the past year, including one that surfaced just before the election charging that his campaign staff paid for damaging information about Alckmin.

That controversy, which continued to dominate headlines on election day, served as a last-minute life preserver that kept the conservative Alckmin's political hopes afloat. If the corruption controversy continues to simmer, his supporters say, they believe he might have a chance to unseat Lula.

"Alckmin can win if something else shows up with this scandal. And the way things are going in Brazilian politics right now, I'm confident that something else is going to show up," said JosÃ© Carlos Brandt Silva, 62, a businessman who traveled more than 200 miles to vote for Alckmin in Sao Paulo, where his family is registered.

Six members of Lula's party face arrest warrants for allegedly paying about $800,000 for information that supposedly proved corruption on Alckmin's part. Lula's campaign contends that Alckmin's supporters desperately contrived the scandal just before the election. Lula fired his campaign manager last week after the allegations aired, though he has denied any involvement in the incident.

Overwhelming support from the poor has helped Lula weather the corruption scandals, which also included congressional vote-buying last year in which many members of Lula's Workers' Party were implicated. His support rests on the fact that poverty rates have dipped since he was elected four years ago, thanks in part to increased government social spending, lower inflation and a stable currency.

"The whole Brazilian political system is corrupt, not just Lula," said Fernando Silva, 29, a furniture maker who voted for Lula at a Sao Paulo public school Sunday. "If Lula is involved in corruption, I think another president would have been even more involved than him. So I'd rather vote for Lula, because my life has changed with him. I'm working. I have my own business."

Alckmin, a medical doctor by training, struggled during the campaign to attract excitement among voters, many of whom had not heard of him before he entered the race in March. After serving as vice governor of the state of Sao Paulo, he advanced to the governor's seat in 2001 following the death of his predecessor.

"He doesn't have a history of being involved in competitive elections, and he's not very well known outside of Sao Paulo," said Maria Celina D'Araujo, a political scientist in Rio de Janeiro. "The image he has tried to project during the campaign is that of the doctor who is going to treat the corruption that Brazil suffers from."

The runoff is expected to force the candidates to clarify their agendas. Lula declined to participate in presidential debates during the first-round campaign, and Alckmin has offered few specific policy proposals.

Some of the challenges for the next president are already apparent, and the candidates might have mentioned them only rarely because of their potential to be politically explosive, analysts said.

For example, the social security system is heavily indebted, and many believe that reducing the generous payouts that retirees now receive is necessary to maintain economic stability. Many economists are also calling for changes in Brazil's labor laws, which offer strong protections for workers but are also believed to fuel a vast sector of workers who are not legally registered; about 55 percent of Brazilian workers are not on the tax rolls.

"The next president is going to have to approve some sort of social security reform, and the issue of labor reform is also going to come up," said RogÃ©rio Schmitt, a political analyst in Sao Paulo. "These are unpopular reforms, so the candidates have been very generalistic so far."

If Lula is elected -- and polls put him as the favorite in the runoff -- he will probably have to tackle those issues without much party support from either members of congress members and state governors -- positions that were also on the ballot Sunday.

During his first term, Lula was able to count on support from his party to direct legislation. But the party has been significantly weakened from the scandals, which could make things tougher for him in a second term. He will be forced to build a broader coalition, said Schmitt.

Many affiliated with Brazil's opposition parties are already looking forward to 2010. "Lula will have even more problems in his second term than he did in the first," said Fabio Mazzo, 26, an Alckmin supporter from Sao Paulo.

Brazil's Lula Forced Into Surprise Run-off (FT)

By Jonathan Wheatley

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

Brazilian voters have delivered an unexpected setback to president Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, who had been widely expected to win an outright majority in elections on Sunday and avoid the need for a second-round run-off on October 29.

With a little more than 98 per cent of the vote counted, electoral authorities ordered a run-off between Mr Lula da Silva and Geraldo Alckmin of the centrist PSDB.

Mr Lula da Silva had 48.8 per cent of the valid votes against 51.2 per cent for all opposition candidates combined. Mr Alckmin had 41.4 per cent, well ahead of his showing in recent opinion polls.

Mr Lula da Silva's commanding lead in opinion polls fell away in the days leading up to Sunday's vote after leaders of his campaign team and his left-leaning party, the PT, were caught attempting to smear an opposition candidate.

The president's popularity remained strong for much of the campaign in spite of a series of corruption scandals over the past 18 months that at one point threatened to bring down his government.

But many voters chose to concentrate instead on the low inflation and relative economic stability that have boosted the spending power of the poor – the mass of Brazilian voters. The poor have also benefited from a quadrupling of spending on income-transfer programmes under Mr Lula da Silva.

However, the government has been criticised for failing to produce the "spectacle of growth" promised by Mr Lula da Silva before taking office in January 2003. Growth is heading for 3 per cent this year and is likely to average less than that over the four years of his administration.

The Lula government has maintained relatively orthodox monetary and fiscal policies and in its first year embarked on modest reforms of the bankrupt pensions system for public-sector workers. But it has failed to tackle more politically difficult reforms of the wider pensions system or to cut other spending to release money for much-needed investment in infrastructure and other drivers of growth.

Geraldo Alckmin, of the centrist opposition PSDB – which introduced many of the policies maintained by Mr Lula da Silva during its eight years in power to 2002 – has promised to tackle such issues without achieving much resonance among voters.

While Mr Alckmin's campaign may have failed to attract support away from the president, Mr Lula da Silva's own advisers may have put his long-expected victory in jeopardy.

Lula Forced Into Runoff Election (WT/AP)

By Harold Olmos

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

BRASILIA, Brazil -- Brazil's leftist president faces a runoff for a second term after voters denied him an outright victory yesterday after last-minute accusations that his party engaged in a scheme of electoral corruption and dirty tricks.

Election authorities announced the Oct. 29 runoff after 98 percent of the vote had been counted, with President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva getting 48.8 percent compared with 41.4 percent for center-right candidate Geraldo Alckmin, Sao Paulo state's former governor.

It was a stunning defeat for Mr. Lula de Silva, who polls had predicted less than a week ago would trounce Mr. Alckmin with 59 percent of the vote, far more than the 50 percent plus one vote needed to win the contest in the first round.

Mr. Lula de Silva had been favored to win because of the economic stability and anti-poverty programs he brought to Brazil. Votes in Sao Paulo, Mr. Alckmin's stronghold and Brazil's most populous state, apparently helped force the runoff.

Mr. Lula de Silva's campaign manager, Marco Aurelio Garcia, earlier said a first-round win for the president was still possible because many of the uncounted votes were from Brazil's impoverished northeast, which has benefited handsomely from government social programs.

"We believe that Lula will show solid growth as the vote from the northeast starts showing its weight," Mr. Garcia told reporters. "But I want to reaffirm that we always prepared ourselves for a two-round election."

However, of the 7 million uncounted votes by late yesterday, 6 million were from Sao Paulo state, where Mr. Alckmin was beating the incumbent.

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Lula de Silva said he was confident of a first-round victory after voting in the industrial town of Sao Bernardo do Campo, where he rose to prominence as a labor leader.

For months, polls have shown the incumbent easily winning the race. But Mr. Lula de Silva saw his once-commanding lead plummet on the eve of the vote as his Workers' Party was battered by accusations that party officials tried to buy a mysterious dossier that apparently contained incriminating information about a political rival.

Major newspapers ran front-page photos over the weekend showing piles of money purportedly meant to buy information showing corrupt dealings by an opponent. Local press reported that the photos were leaked by federal police.

Mr. Lula de Silva's party said Mr. Alckmin's supporters were involved and filed a complaint yesterday with a judge demanding that Mr. Alckmin's candidacy be declared invalid because of the leak. The judge has said he would consider the case. Mr. Alckmin's campaign has denied involvement.

Six members of Mr. Lula da Silva's party, including an old friend who ran the president's personal security detail, face arrest warrants on suspicion of involvement in efforts to buy the damaging information. Mr. Lula da Silva fired his campaign manager days before the election but repeatedly has denied knowledge of any wrongdoing.

Mr. Alckmin said yesterday that he was sure "ethics will defeat corruption."

In Brazil, Da Silva Forced Into Runoff (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett and Geraldo Samor

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO -- Turned off by government corruption, Brazilian voters denied President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva the majority of the vote he needed to win re-election in yesterday's first round of balloting, setting the stage for a runoff with centrist Geraldo Alckmin.

With 99.1% of the vote counted, Mr. da Silva had 48.7% of the vote compared with 41.6% for his chief rival, Mr. Alckmin. With Mr. da Silva falling short of the required 50% threshold, the president's aides were acknowledging late last night that there would be a second round of voting Oct. 29.

Mr. da Silva has witnessed an erosion in his once formidable lead in the past couple of weeks following revelations that officials of his Workers Party tried to buy a dossier linking candidates in Mr. Alckmin's Social Democratic Party to an ambulance-procurement scam. Mr. da Silva's failure to convincingly address the scandal -- he skipped a debate with other candidates Thursday -- clearly upset voters, who had seen a host of previous corruption cases in his government.

A runoff would present a win-win situation for investors. Though a leftist, Mr. da Silva has proved in his first term that he is a responsible steward of fiscal policy, and financial markets have enjoyed an extended rally since he took office in 2003. But most investors think Mr. Alckmin, a former governor of the wealthy São Paulo state, has a clearer notion of the overhauls to the pension system and labor law Brazil needs to rev up its slow-growing economy.

Heading into the second round, Mr. da Silva would have the advantages of incumbency. But Mr. Alckmin would have momentum. In pre-election polls tracking a matchup between Mr. da Silva and Mr. Alckmin, Mr. Alckmin had reduced the deficit to just five points from 17 points since Sept. 19, according to the Datafolha agency.

Mr. da Silva would be expected to hammer on the benefits he has brought to poor Brazilians, who are enjoying low food prices and government welfare stipends that go to 11 million families. Mr. Alckmin would continue to challenge Mr. da Silva on corruption.

"Brazilians historically have been indifferent about (corruption), " says political consultant Andre Torretta. "You cannot come to a guy who's making less than the minimum wage and preach to him about ethics."

But the scandals during Mr. da Silva's presidency have been so devastating that Brazilians, especially those in the middle class, seem to be drawing a line. On Saturday, newspapers published photographs of the stacks of cash that police seized from Workers Party operatives alleged to have been involved in the smear campaign against the opposition. That follows a massive scandal last year in which some of Mr. da Silva's closest Workers Party allies are facing indictment for running a slush fund to buy votes in Congress. In a separate incident last year, a Workers Party official was arrested trying to go through airport security with $100,000 stashed in his underwear.

The rhetoric of the runoff is sure to be nasty. To make the point that he was blameless of the scandals involving his party, Mr. da Silva recently compared himself to Jesus Christ betrayed by Judas. In a response, Former President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, a top Social Democratic leader, said that Mr. da Silva "is not Christ, he is the devil, and we have to kick him out."

The campaign styles are also a contrast. The rough-hewn but charismatic Mr. da Silva is viewed with reverence by poor Brazilians; one mayor in the Amazon approached the president on his knees recently.

Mr. Alckmin, a doctor by training, is a much more subdued figure on the stump. Claudio Lembo, the current São Paulo governor, recently likened Mr. Alckmin to "the son-in-law every mother-in-law wanted to have."

Some key trends will work in Brazil's favor when the presidential term starts Jan. 1. Brazil's interest rates, which have been among the highest in the world, are falling and recently hit a 20-year-low. Policy makers hope that prompts consumers to open their wallets. The benchmark interest rate, which has fallen to 14.25% from 19.75% over the past year, is expected to slip further in coming months now that Brazil has succeeded in bringing inflation down to around 4% annually. The government also hopes investors will give the go-ahead to stalled bricks-and-mortar projects once uncertainty over the election ends.

Brazil's leaders also will cross their fingers for continued strength in the global economy. Brazil has been blessed in recent years with low global interest rates and high international prices for the country's agrarian and mining commodities, due largely to demand from China.

But Brazil's economy is beset by structural problems. The country's sprawling public sector is sustained by a highly taxed citizenry, and government bureaucracy stifles entrepreneurial energy. Also, due to higher spending in an election year, the government will struggle to meet its year-end goal of a primary budget surplus of 4.25% of gross domestic product.

In June, Fitch Ratings upgraded Brazil's sovereign debt rating by a single notch to Double B, which is two steps below investment grade. "We think the new government will stick to the macroeconomic policy, but there will be very little action on reform," says Roger Scher, a Fitch managing director. "It's going to be hard for whoever wins to put together a coalition and hold it together."

A Congress that has been historically fragmented would be harder for Mr. da Silva to handle in a second term due to scandals that have weakened his Workers Party and angered the opposition. "At least initially, the atmosphere will remain charged," says Fernando Lattman-Weltman, a political scientist with Rio's Getulio Vargas Foundation. "The opposition will be suffering from a hangover and there will be a runoff in many states."

Most analysts view Mr. Alckmin as more capable of engineering the profound economic changes Brazil needs. There is widespread opposition and sensitivity to changing the public pension system, which costs 12% of GDP, a higher average than wealthy countries with much older populations, says a JP Morgan report. Unions are also protective of Brazil's labor code, which is based on that of Mussolini's fascist government in Italy and results in millions of lawsuits against employers and significant severance charges.

But Antonio Delfim Netto, a congressman who was finance minister during the 1960s and 1970s, has had conversations with Mr. da Silva's aides and says they know what needs to be done to address Brazil's slowing growth. "They have no alternative," Mr. Netto says. "They know Brazilians won't tolerate another tax hike." Brazil's average tax load has climbed to 38% of GDP, comparable with wealthier countries', from 26% over the past 12 years.

Embattled Brazil Incumbent Fails To Win First-Round Ballot (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Monday, Oct. 2 — Brazil's embattled president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, finished first in the presidential vote held here Sunday, but fell just short of the majority he needed to avoid a runoff on Oct. 29.

With more than 99.2 percent of the ballots tabulated early Monday, Mr. da Silva, his momentum checked by a last-minute corruption and ethics scandal, had 48.65 percent of the vote. The most competitive of his seven opponents, Geraldo Alckmin of the Brazilian Social Democratic Party, was running closer than had been expected, with 41.6 percent of the vote.

Mr. Alckmin ended up finishing first in the more industrialized, modern and prosperous states of Brazil's south, including his home state of São Paulo, with 40 million people the largest in this nation of 185 million. Mr. da Silva, a 60-year-old former factory worker and labor union leader, performed strongest in the poorer, more backward states of the country's northeast, his native region, where he ended up polling more than two-thirds of the vote.

Campaigning on a platform of social justice and clean government, Mr. da Silva and his leftist Workers' Party won a landslide victory in a runoff four years ago this month. But his administration has been marked by one scandal after another, ranging from multimillion dollar schemes to buy the support of members of congress to rigging contracts for the purchase of blood products.

Nevertheless, Mr. da Silva had seemed assured of coasting to a first round re-election victory until the eruption of the so-called Dossiergate scandal two weeks ago. That was when Workers' Party operatives were caught trying to pay $792,000 in cash for information they apparently thought would incriminate Mr. Alckmin's party in a scandal at the Health Ministry involving kickbacks on the purchase of ambulances.

Workers' Party leaders tried to put the best face on a result they had hoped to avoid. "I want to reaffirm that we always prepared ourselves for a two-round election," said Marco Aurelio Garcia, who became Mr. da Silva's campaign manager less than two weeks ago, after his predecessor was forced to step down because of the dossier scandal.

Mr. Alckmin, a doctor and former governor whose level of support rose 10 points in the polls after the dossier scandal broke, was jubilant at the sudden turn and predicted that "ethics will defeat corruption" in the second round. "Lula had his chance," he told supporters in São Paulo, using the president's nickname. "A new team can do more for Brazil."

The division of Latin America's largest country into two evenly matched groups, one pro-Lula, the other opposed to him, was reflected at a polling place in Tijuca, a middle-class neighborhood here in Brazil's second-biggest city.

After casting their ballots Sunday afternoon, Etevaldo Mello and his wife, Fernanda Bandeira, found themselves in opposing camps.

"I voted for Lula in 2002, but I won't ever make that mistake again," said Mr. Mello, a 40-year-old systems analyst. "He hasn't done what he promised, and all we've had is corruption. I've lost hope and my faith in him."

But Ms. Bandeira, a 39-year-old social worker, said she was sticking with Mr. da Silva. "There's always been corruption, but at least Lula has brought it out into the light of day and is trying to fight it," she said. "And he's done more for the poor than all of those before him."

Other voters who described themselves as having been undecided during the campaign cited two last-minute developments as persuading them to vote against the president. Several said they were offended because he failed to take part in a candidates' debate Thursday night, while others said they were disgusted by photographs published Saturday of the stacks of dollars and local currency seized from the Workers' Party dirty tricks squad in the dossier case.

"I didn't vote for Alckmin; I voted against Lula and the corruption around him," said Jose Reis, a 39-year-old salesman interviewed in Madureira, a working class neighborhood here. "There are just too many scandals, and it's damaging the country."

As in all previous scandals during the past 18 months, Mr. da Silva said he did not know about the skullduggery of his party's operatives in the dossier case. Those under investigation in the incident include Mr. da Silva's longtime bodyguard and the husband of his personal secretary.

The balloting took place with the country in a somber mood after the crash of a passenger plane with 155 people aboard deep in the Amazon jungle on Friday.

Brazilian Vote Forces Lula Into Runoff (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

SAO PAULO, Brazil — Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva fell short of the votes needed Sunday to avoid a runoff election this month, official results showed.

With 98% of the ballots counted, Lula had 48.8% of the vote compared with 41.4% for his principal challenger, Geraldo Alckmin, the conservative former governor of Sao Paulo state, electoral officials said.

New allegations of electoral dirty tricks appeared to cost Lula crucial support in recent days, experts said, turning a comfortable majority into a showing of less than 50%, and triggering a runoff election Oct. 29 with Alckmin, who had a surprisingly strong showing.

The unexpected setback could set up a contentious month of campaigning as Lula counterattacks and a united opposition seeks further evidence of campaign irregularities by the ruling Workers' Party.

Lula, whose rise from impoverished factory hand to chief executive of Latin America's largest nation won him global acclaim four years ago, had seemed assured of a smooth reelection until a scandal emerged last month to blemish anew the reputation of his Workers' Party.

Lula's 59% showing in polls sank after the "bloodsucker scandal," in which members of Alckmin's party have been linked to alleged kickbacks for the sale of overpriced ambulances to city governments, metamorphosed into a purported plot by Lula's political camp designed to tarnish Alckmin and his Brazilian Social Democracy Party.

Lula has not been directly implicated in the latest scandal, but it has forced him to dismiss several top aides, including his campaign manager.

"I'm confident we are going to win this election today," Lula told reporters Sunday after voting in the industrial suburb of Sao Bernardo do Campo.

Allegations have emerged that operatives of his party were involved in an effort to pay about $700,000 for a dossier of recordings, photos and documents from a family at the center of the "bloodsucker" scandal. The dossier is said to be damaging to Alckmin's party.

Newspapers here ran photos of some of the stacks of money seized by federal police and purported to be the payment for the incriminating material.

"Ethics will defeat corruption," Alckmin said as he cast his ballot in Sao Paulo. "Lula has had his opportunity. A new team can do more for Brazil."

The dossier episode is the latest scandal to batter the image of Lula, 60, who repeatedly denounced Brazil's ingrained corruption in the lead-up to his historic victory in 2002, his fourth run at the presidency.

The string of corruption allegations has clearly drained some of Lula's support, especially among middle-class and elite voters here in Brazil's financial and industrial capital. Many also were upset that Lula skipped a presidential debate last week.

"Lula managed to become just like the other candidates," complained Augusto Silveira, 28, a psychologist here. "He seems like the others, hungry for power and failing to keep his promises to the people."

But the burly, bearded president remains popular among the struggling urban and rural population. His signature "Zero Hunger" program guarantees about $23 a month to poor families, providing a survival cushion in a nation with wide disparities of income and wealth.

"I know everything he is accused of, but I will vote for Lula," said Jose Carlos de Oliveira, 63, a retired professor. "At least he is doing something for the poorest, which those who ruled Brazil for 500 years never did."

Lula, the son of impoverished farmers from Brazil's northeast, became an auto worker in the industrial belt here after his family migrated, following the path of many rural Brazilians. He rose to the position of outspoken union leader and national political figure before being elected Brazil's first leftist president.

When asked "Are you a communist?" Lula famously replied: "No, I am a machine worker."

The former assembly line worker helped defeat a U.S.-sponsored free-trade zone proposal last year in a protest against U.S. farm subsidies, and he has been a critic of the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

Unlike Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, Lula has sought close ties with Washington and has generally avoided strident criticism of the United States. He has governed as a moderate and won praise on Wall Street and in Washington at a time when leftist politicians often antagonistic toward the U.S. are on the rise in South America.

In doing so, Lula has faced criticism on the left from those who say he has betrayed his socialist ideals and caved in to mainstream capitalism.

During the campaign, Lula pledged to bolster social programs, raise the minimum wage, improve educational opportunities for the youth and continue Brazil's steady growth.

Alckmin, a doctor and a longtime politician, has promised to cut taxes, lower interest rates, clean up corruption and streamline the federal bureaucracy. But he lacks Lula's national recognition and charisma.

Presidential candidate Heloisa Helena, a senator who was purged from Lula's party after criticizing his economic policies as too conservative, was getting less than 10% of the vote.

Also at stake were 27 governorships, 27 Senate seats and all 513 seats in the lower house of Congress.

Social Democrats Defeat Governing Party In Austria (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

VIENNA, Oct. 1 — In an election shadowed by fears about immigration, voters in Austria rebuked the governing People's Party on Sunday, handing a narrow victory to the Social Democratic Party and leaving two extreme right parties as players on an uncertain political landscape.

The conservative People's Party, led by Chancellor Wolfgang Schüssel, won 34.2 percent of the vote, a loss of more than eight percentage points from the election in 2002. The Social Democrats won 35.7 percent, raising the prospect that their leader, Alfred Gusenbauer, could replace Mr. Schüssel as chancellor, perhaps in a so-called grand coalition with the People's Party.

While analysts had expected the People's Party to lose ground, the size of the loss was a surprise, and a stinging reversal for Mr. Schüssel, who once reaped credit for Austria's robust economy. "We all underestimated how the common people feel," said Hans Rauscher, a political columnist for Der Standard. "The lesson is that arrogance doesn't pay."

For Jörg Haider, the once-powerful far-right leader whose party has been a fading partner in Mr. Schüssel's coalition, the election was a reprieve from political extinction.

His party, the Alliance for Austria's Future, appeared to have clung to seats in Parliament, winning 4.2 percent of the vote, just above the required 4 percent threshold. If it had fallen below that — as pollsters had predicted — Mr. Haider would have lost his toehold in national politics.

"He is almost finished on a national level, but his ideas are not finished," said Anton Pelinka, a political scientist in Vienna. The Freedom Party, which Mr. Haider led for two decades before quitting last year after a power struggle to start his new party, won 11.2 percent — a result that positions it to play a strong opposition role. It had called for Austria to expel all illegal immigrants and halt new arrivals.

Placards for the party's new leader, Heinz-Christian Strache, depict an Austrian flag above the slogan, "Daham statt Islam," a colloquialism that translates as "Home instead of Islam." A 37-year-old former dental technician, Mr. Strache looks like a younger version of Mr. Haider.

A party official, Harald Vilimsky, said the campaign tapped into the frustration of many Viennese, who find that their German-speaking children are a minority in the public schools. Mr. Schüssel, 61, who is more respected than loved, dismissed fears of an influx of immigrants from Eastern Europe. He was then embarrassed by reports that his mother-in-law was under the care of an Eastern European nurse, who was in Austria illegally.

While the extreme right did not match its best result — 27 percent in 1999 — it remains a force. A sign of that, analysts said, is that the anti-immigrant talk honed by Mr. Haider in the 1990's has become part of the political mainstream.

Although the major parties deplore the xenophobia of the far-right parties, they have strengthened their stance on immigration issues. The People's Party has toughened requirements for Austrian citizenship, while the Social Democrats have promised to crack down on crimes committed by foreigners. "They don't say, 'We're going to be tough on foreigners'; they say, 'We're going to be tough on illegal immigrants,' " said Herbert Lackner, the editor of Profil, a political magazine.

Only the Green Party called for more tolerance, and it finished fourth behind the Freedom Party.

Many Austrians are convinced that the European Union's expansion will flood the country with people bent on taking their jobs. The new twist, since the heyday of Mr. Haider, is that this suspicion now has an anti-Muslim tinge. "In the 90's, anti-immigration rhetoric was focused on rising crime and asylum seekers from the Balkans," said Peter Paul Hajek, a political analyst at the Austrian Marketing Institute, a polling company. "Now it's more about the clash between Islam and Christianity."

With these inconclusive voting results, Austria finds itself in a position similar to Germany after its election last year. The two major parties may be forced into a grand coalition, since the extreme right parties have discouraged talk of a coalition with the People's Party. In a television interview on Sunday, Mr. Schüssel focused on the problems dogging Chancellor Angela Merkel. "Looking at Germany," he said, "one can see it is not so easy."

Schüssel Party Loses Austrian Election (FT)

By Eric Frey And Haig Simonian

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

The conservative People's party of the Austrian chancellor Wolfgang Schüssel suffered a stunning defeat in general elections on Sunday as the rival Social Democrats narrowly beat it into first place.

The result makes it almost certain Mr Schüssel's centre-right government will be replaced by a grand coalition led by Alfred Gusenbauer, the Social Democrat leader.

Mr Gusenbauer has vowed to cancel Austria's controversial purchase of Eurofighter military jets from the aerospace group EADS and reverse the introduction of university tuition fees. The two measures are part of wider social policy measures intended to mark a break from the "unfeeling" People's party liberal economic policies.

However, the broader economic measures that have made Austria one of the European Union's most successful members and prompted growth of more than 3 per cent this year are not expected to change significantly.

The People's party general secretary Reinhold Lopatka blamed the defeat on a low turnout, the emergence of fringe parties and a degree of complacency because of widespread expectations of a win. The chancellor is expected to resign as party leader but may put himself in the running for a European post.

Mr Schüssel, one of Europe's most experienced and longest-serving politicians, appeared to have fallen victim to popular unease with reforms such as overhaul of the pension system. "We tried to do what we could, but it looks as if it wasn't quite enough," he said last night.

Before the election, virtually all pollsters had predicted a Schüssel win, boosted by a scandal involving a trade union-owned bank with close ties to the Social Democrats.

Instead, the People's party lost 8 per cent of its former record vote, ending up with 34.2 per cent, based on preliminary official results.

That was just behind the Social Democrats who, in spite of slipping 0.8 percentage points compared with 2002, won 35.7 per cent.

Mr Schüssel also lost support to two far-right parties and a new protest group led by maverick EU parliamentarian, Hans-Peter Martin.

Exploiting Austria's strong euroscepticism, and especially concerns about immigrants from eastern Europe and Islamic countries, as well as EU accession talks with Turkey, the ultra-right Freedom party boosted its share from 10.2 to 11.2 per cent.

The improvement came in spite of the fact that the party's "moderate" wing split off last year on the initiative of Jörg Haider, once Europe's most successful rightwing leader.

Mr Haider's new group, the Alliance for Austria's Future (BZÖ), scraped past the 4 per cent threshold needed to gain seats in parliament, but is too weak to play a role in the next government.

By Veronika Oleksyn, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

Austria's opposition Social Democrats won nationwide elections on Sunday, swinging the country to the center-left after more than six years of influence by the extreme right, final unofficial returns showed.

With all but absentee ballots counted, the center-left bloc had 35.7 percent of the vote and the People's Party trailed with 34.2 percent, Interior Minister Liese Prokop said.

Although Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel did not formally concede the election, he congratulated the leader of the Social Democrats, Alfred Gusenbauer, who would likely become the country's next chancellor. "We are a democratic country," Schuessel said.

Schuessel said he didn't blame anyone for the disappointing results, saying: "I carry the main responsibility for my party and I do that with conviction."

Gusenbauer, meanwhile, declined to proclaim outright victory, saying he would wait for all the votes to be counted. Officials said there were about 250,000 valid absentee votes to be tallied between now and Oct. 9, when the final results must be certified.

"I never gave up hope. I always said there would be a surprise on Sunday," he said. "The people in Austria are of the opinion that yes, we're a rich and well-off country but it's not all distributed fairly enough and therefore people have the need for a correction."

Among other things, the Social Democrats have promised to lower the number of unemployed by 100,000 and reduce salary differences between men and women. The party had been in opposition since 2000 following more than three decades as the top vote-getter in Austrian elections.

The current governing coalition is made up of the People's Party and the rightist Alliance for the Future of Austria, which had vowed during the campaign to reduce the number of foreigners in Austria by 30 percent over the next three years.

Immigration had been a central theme of the campaign, with bitter debates over how to integrate foreigners into Austrian society.

The far right Freedom Party, which finished third with 11.2 percent of the vote, had pushed for the immediate deportation of all asylum seekers and other foreigners who commit crimes and argued that the number of foreign children whose mother tongue is not German should be capped at 30 percent in certain public schools.

The Greens finished fourth with 10.5 percent of the vote, and the Alliance for the Future of Austria captured 4.2 percent, just over the threshold needed to remain in parliament.

"Austrians have voted for a fairer society. They're looking for a much stronger commitment to the well-being of all citizens," said Paul Nyrup Rasmussen, president of the Brussels, Belgium-based Party of European Socialists.

"It's the start of a new era, and Austria can leave behind the international embarrassment of a coalition with the far right," he said.

In 1999, the Freedom Party's stunning 27 percent win in national elections — and its subsequent inclusion in the government — sparked months of EU diplomatic sanctions because of concerns over statements by then-leader Joerg Haider perceived as anti-Semitic and sympathetic to Nazi Germany's labor policies.

The main parties have ruled out including the Freedom Party in a new coalition.

President Heinz Fischer said he would meet on Tuesday with party heads, though it was unclear when he would ask the winner to form a new government.

Sunday's turnout was about 74 percent of Austria's 6 million eligible voters.

Hungary PM Suffers Big Poll Losses (FT)

By Christopher Condon

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

Ferenc Gyurcsany, Hungary's prime minister, suffered a double blow on Sunday night, when Laszlo Solyom, the president, called for his removal. Later, voters in nationwide local elections gave his Socialist party a beating.

Neither Mr Gyurcsany's position nor his newly introduced austerity measures was immediately threatened as his party continued to rally behind him.

However, the prime minister's ability to press forward with long-term plans for difficult public sector reforms may have suffered.

The opposition Fidesz party, along with thousands who have called for his resignation during recent anti-government demonstrations, received a clear boost from the day's events.

DOJ_NMG_0072881

Sunday's vote comes two weeks after the revelation that Mr Gyurcsany had admitted lying about state finances to win April parliamentary elections.

With more than 80 per cent of precincts reporting, Fidesz looked headed for victory in 18 of 19 counties and in 19 of 23 cities.

The Socialists' were headed for only one significant victory, in Budapest, where they and their liberal coalition looked likely to retain control of the city council and the mayor's office.

Liberal Gabor Demszky, mayor of Budapest since 1990, narrowly led in his bid to win a fifth consecutive term.

The biggest surprise of the evening, however, was as a stunning blow to Mr Gyurcsany from Laszlo Solyom, Hungary's president.

In a televised address shortly after polls closed, Mr Solyom called on the country's parliament to remove Mr Gyurcsany from office.

Mr Solyom said Hungary was still immersed in a "moral crisis" related to Mr Gyurcsany's admissions to lying.

The president condemned recent street violence in Budapest but praised those who have demonstrated peacefully and called for Mr Gyurcsany's removal.

"The peaceful protests across the country showed the healthy moral sense of the people to me. However, the catharsis and purge have not taken place," he said.

Mr Solyom said public finances represented Hungary's most pressing problem and he would support plans for reform. But, he added, reforms would not succeed without public support.

Mr Solyom said only parliament had the constitutional power to solve the crisis. He said: "The parliament decides on the person of the prime minister. The parliament can restore the required social confidence."

Socialist party members reacted to the speech by angrily attacking Mr Solyom for interfering in party politics and declaring their continued support for Mr Gyurcsany.

The news electrified an anti-government demonstration in front of the downtown parliament building that was estimated at 10,000 people.

On June 17, an audio taped leaked to the press revealed that Mr Gyurcsany, while imploring Socialist MPs to support his plans for reforms, said his party had lied repeatedly about state finances and the need to introduce austerity measures.

The resulting unrest did not significantly unsettle financial markets but caused analysts and investors to worry that Mr Gyurcsany's ability to pursue reforms would be damaged.

Moody's Investors Service and Fitch, the credit rating agencies, signalled they may soon downgrade Hungary's sovereign debt ratings.

Hungary is expected to post a 10.1 per cent budget deficit this year and is under heavy pressure to from investors and the European Union to make significant deficit cuts over the next three years.

Hungary's President Urges Premier's Ouster (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

BERLIN, Oct. 1 — Hungary's president, Laszlo Solyom, speaking on national public television Sunday just as the polls closed in local government elections, asked Parliament to oust Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany for lying to the country about the state of the economy.

The surprise announcement by Mr. Solyom, an independent who was elected president last year, came as the voting ended in what was seen as the first test of Mr. Gyurcsany's political future since antigovernment protests erupted in Budapest and other cities over two weeks ago.

Voters cast ballots on Sunday in mayoral races and elections for local representatives in 3,174 cities, towns and villages. According to preliminary results released late Sunday by the National Election Office, with some 76 percent of the votes counted, the main opposition party, Fidesz-Hungarian Civic Union, seemed poised to win mayoral races in 15 of Hungary's 23 largest cities, as well as majorities in the county councils in 18 of the 19 counties, The Associated Press reported.

Mr. Gyurcsany's Socialist Party was seen retaining power in most of Budapest's 23 districts, and Mayor Gabor Demszky of Budapest — supported by the government coalition of Socialists and Free Democrats — was likely to win his fifth consecutive term since the 1990 return to democracy, The A.P. said.

As television viewers were waiting for the first results to trickle in just after the polls closed at 7 p.m. local time, Mr. Solyom, a quiet-spoken former president of the Constitutional Court of Hungary — the equivalent of the Supreme Court in the United States — appeared on screens.

"The prime minister refused to admit that he used inadmissible means to keep power," Mr. Solyom said, adding that the moral fiber of the government was called into question after Mr. Gyurcsany lied to the public during the parliamentary elections last April.

"The Parliament decides who is the prime minister," Mr. Solyom said. "The Parliament can restore society's confidence. The parliamentary majority holds the key to the solution."

Mr. Gyurcsany had told a closed meeting of the Socialist Party's top officials in May that the party had "lied in the morning and lied in the evening" to the electorate. When a tape of that meeting was leaked to Hungarian radio two weeks ago, spontaneous demonstrations erupted in Budapest and other cities, with protesters demanding that Mr. Gyurcsany, a wealthy businessman, resign.

As the demonstrations wore on, the protesters also voiced strong opposition to Mr. Gyurcsany's proposed economic program, which aimed at reducing the budget deficit from 10 percent of the gross domestic product by introducing sharp reductions in the public sector as well as introducing health charges and tuition fees for university students.

Mr. Gyurcsany repeatedly shrugged off the demonstrations, saying that he would not resign and that he was the only one in his party who could introduce bold reforms.

Mr. Solyom said Sunday that Mr. Gyurcsany had brought the office of prime minister — and politics — into disrepute.

Emese Danks, a spokesman for Mr. Gyurcsany's coalition government of Socialists and Free Democrats, declined to comment on Mr. Solyom's announcement. "This is a party issue. This has nothing to do with the government. I have nothing to say," Danks said.

Eszter Pataki, a spokeswoman for the conservative Fidesz party, said her party agreed with "what the president said — this is the right line."

Earlier in the day, Mr. Gyurcsany said the results from the nationwide local government elections would not derail his economic program.

"I do not see any cause to consider this election as a referendum on the central government," he said as he cast his vote in an affluent part of Budapest. "We are continuing our program and I am quite sure that at the end, a significant majority of the people will think it was a successful one."

Serbia Asserts Its Sovereignty Over Kosovo In Legislation (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

SARAJEVO, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Oct. 1 — As the United Nations Security Council looks increasingly likely to grant independence to Kosovo, Serbia's government has adopted a new Constitution that asserts what it considers is its irrefutable right to the province.

The Serbian Parliament voted overwhelmingly on Saturday to pass the Constitution, which includes a provision that defines Kosovo — currently administered by the United Nations — as an "integral part" of Serbia.

Kosovo's fate is the subject of United Nations-led negotiations between the Serbian government and ethnic Albanians in the province. The ethnic Albanians want independence, while the Serbian government and the province's small Serbian community demand that Kosovo remain part of Serbia.

Few Western diplomats say the groups will be able to reach agreement, leaving the decision to the United Nations Security Council, which is expected to grant Kosovo its independence, possibly by the end of the year.

The countries leading the United Nations effort to broker an agreement — a group that includes the United States and Russia — have been trying to get commitments from Kosovo's ethnic Albanians that they would not discriminate against or harm the Serbian minority. The countries hoped that would help Serbia accept Kosovo's independence.

But Western diplomats say Serbia has been intransigent about the possible breakup, and the passage of the Constitution is yet another indication that the country will not accept Kosovo's independence easily.

Diplomats fear that if Serbia does not agree to Kosovo's independence, it will foment trouble, including backing efforts by ethnic Serbs to resist Kosovo's ethnic Albanian-dominated government.

Although officially part of Serbia, Kosovo has been administered by the United Nations since June 1999, when Yugoslav troops were forced to withdraw after months of NATO-led bombing.

In 1998 and 1999, an estimated 10,000 people, mostly ethnic Albanian civilians, were killed as the Serbian-dominated Yugoslav Army and the Serbian police cracked down on an ethnic Albanian insurgency.

The new Serbian Constitution, which was drafted after the breakup of the state of Serbia and Montenegro in May, still must be approved by a popular referendum, set for Oct. 28 and 29, before it can become law. New parliamentary elections would follow in December.

The declaration on Kosovo drew criticism from ethnic Albanian leaders. "This is a unilateral decision, which will create problems in the future in normalizing the relations between an independent Kosovo and Serbia," Lutfi Haziri, deputy prime minister of Kosovo, said Sunday, according to Agence France-Presse. But he added: "I don't think the decision will be an obstacle for the status talks."

Serbs make up less than 10 percent of the population of Kosovo. Most of them live in enclaves spread across the province, where their movements are restricted because they fear attack by ethnic Albanians.

In an address to the Parliament of Serbia on Saturday, Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica said, "By defending Kosovo and Metohija as our crucial national interest, you have unanimously decided to adopt a new Constitution that would confirm that Kosovo and Metohija is simply ours." (Kosovo and Metohija is what the Serbs call the province.)

In a separate development, an important party in Mr. Kostunica's coalition administration announced over the weekend that it was withdrawing from the government.

The pro-European G17 Plus Party said its ministers would resign because of what they said were the government's weak efforts to find and arrest Ratko Mladic, a Balkan war crimes suspect and former commander of the Bosnian Serb Army.

In neighboring Bosnia, voters went to the polls on Sunday, marking the end of a campaign in which major political parties were accused by international observers of promoting tensions among ethnic groups.

The elections will lead to the appointment of representatives to Bosnia's governmental institutions, which were set up by the 1995 Dayton peace agreement. The pact ended the country's three-year civil war.

The institutions include a Parliament and a three-member presidency representing each of Bosnia's main ethnic groups: Orthodox Christian Serbs, Bosnian Muslims and Catholic Croats.

Tension Between Russia, Georgia Heats Up (AP)

By Maria Danilova

AP, October 2, 2006

The Cold War is long over, but the tension between Georgia and Russia revisits many of its issues — allegations of spying by Moscow, suspicions of interference by the United States and concerns that a hot war will start without some sort of compromise.

Last week's arrest of four Russian soldiers on charges of spying pushed a decade of animosity between Russia and Georgia to new heights. Russia recalled its ambassador, called Georgia a "bandit state" and stopped issuing visas to Georgians.

The reactions were far stronger than the tit-for-tat expulsions that usually accompany espionage scandals.

Amid an exchange of angry words, Russian President Vladimir Putin's response on Sunday stood out — likening Georgia's actions to those of Lavrenti Beria, the Georgian who headed the Soviet secret police under Joseph Stalin, and calling them "state terrorism."

But also Sunday, Putin took a step that could keep the tensions from spiraling further by ordering the defense ministry to continue its plans for withdrawing troops from Georgia. A Russian general a day earlier had announced that the plans were suspended.

Georgia's West-leaning government resents Russia for its close contacts with two separatist Georgian regions, for its reluctance to pulling out thousands of troops based in the country as a Soviet-era holdover and for economic pressure including sharply increasing the price of natural gas to banning Georgian wine, one of the country's major exports.

Russia in turn resists Georgia's drive to join NATO, its demands for the withdrawal of Russian forces and President Mikhail Saakashvili's determination to re-exert control over the breakaway regions of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, both of which seek possible annexation into Russia and have Russian forces present as peacekeepers.

It was also annoyed that a major oil pipeline from the Caspian Sea to Turkey runs through Georgia, bypassing Russia, and bristled when Georgia arrested a dozen opposition figures that Tbilisi claimed were plotting a coup with Russian backing.

The Kremlin saw Saakashvili's coming to power as an illegitimate regime change driven by Western governments, and the Western-educated Georgian leader has persistently aggravated Russia.

He went after the Russia-connected leader of the renegade province of Adzharia; then a seizure of Russian trucks in South Ossetia set off skirmishes there. Georgia took control of a small section of Abkhazia this year — and last week renamed it Upper Abkhazia — prompting Russian statements of support for the regions' drive for self-determination.

And last month he told the United Nations General Assembly that Russia was conducting a "gangster occupation" in the separatist regions. But relations were tense even with Saakashvili's predecessor Eduard Shevardnadze, who favored eventually joining NATO and had accepted U.S. troops and aid to buff up Georgia's impoverished army.

"There was already a kind of slowly developing cold war under Shevardnadze ... but when Saakashvili came to power, he sped up the process," said Ghia Nodia, an analyst with the Caucasus Institute for Peace Democracy and Development.

In the view of Sergei Markov, a Kremlin-connected analyst, the spying scandal is the next step in pushing tensions to all-out conflict.

"I think all these actions have, as their final goal, preparation for military operations first in South Ossetia and then in Abkhazia," Markov was quoted as saying by the RIA-Novosti news agency.

"One cannot rule out that there will be military conflicts or military incidents," agreed Georgian analyst Ramaz Sakvarelidze.

To avoid war, Sakvarelidze suggested, Georgia could stop its demand that Russian peacekeepers leave the separatist regions if, in turn, the troops changed their mandate from being "a wall between conflicting sides to a positive role in helping to build up relations." Georgia alleges the Russian troops support the separatists, essentially making Abkhazia and South Ossetia into proxy states.

Russia meanwhile wields significant influence over Georgia with its natural gas supplies. However, if it tried to cut off supplies, that could encourage Georgia to buy gas from Iran, as it did last winter when an explosion disrupted Russian deliveries to Georgia. That could also lead to new complaints from the West that Russia uses gas as a political weapon.

Russia last week tried to exert international pressure on Georgia by proposing a U.N. Security Council statement expressing grave concern at Tbilisi's actions. But the United States balked — potentially increasing Russian suspicions that the United States is behind the latest tensions.

"It's obvious that the Georgian authorities have decided on this step under the dictates of the American special services," Communist Party leader Gennady Zyuganov said last week.

The United States has pursued close relations with Georgia and says its aid is aimed at boosting the country's security and democratic institutions.

Last week, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Matthew Bryza urged Russia and Georgia to negotiate, but Putin echoed Russia's suspicions on Sunday.

"These people think that under the roof of their foreign sponsors they can feel comfortable and secure. Is it really so?" Putin said.

Putin And Georgia Officials Intensify Rhetoric In Dispute (WP)

By Peter Finn

MOSCOW, Oct. 1 -- Russian President Vladimir Putin accused the Georgian government of "state terrorism with hostage-taking" in a blistering attack Sunday that followed the arrests on espionage charges last week of four Russian military officers in Georgia.

Georgian officials, meanwhile, said Putin had met last week with the leaders of two breakaway regions that are inside Georgia's internationally recognized borders. The Kremlin would neither "confirm nor deny" that Putin had met with the separatist leaders of Abkhazia and South Ossetia in the Black Sea resort of Sochi, where he was working last week.

Putin's harsh tone and, if confirmed, a meeting with the separatist leaders would presage a major rupture in relations between Russia and Georgia, which have been at odds since Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili came to power in January 2004 and set the former Soviet republic on a course away from Russian influence and toward membership in the NATO alliance.

Russia has provided quiet support to the two breakaway regions, including extending citizenship to many of their residents. But a meeting between Putin and their leaders would signify an open relationship that would infuriate the Georgians.

"This is an open support of separatism by Russia's leadership," Georgia's foreign minister, Gela Bezhuashvili, told reporters in Tbilisi, the country's capital.

Russia has signaled that any attempt to extend independence to Kosovo, a province of Serbia that has been administered by the United Nations since 1999, would provide a precedent for Abkhazia and South Ossetia to break away from Georgia. Both regions have been effectively independent since they routed Georgian forces in short wars in the early 1990s.

Saakashvili has said he is determined to reassert Georgian sovereignty over the two areas, and scrimmages along the borders in recent years have repeatedly threatened to spark renewed warfare. Russian forces are present in both regions -- as peacekeepers, according to Russia. Georgian officials say the Russian troops are propping up illegitimate governments.

Russia also maintains bases in other parts of Georgia, and Gen. Andrei Popov, head of the Russian military in the Caucasus, said on Sunday that any attempt to enter the facilities would be met with "deadly force." Georgian officials are seeking the arrest of a fifth Russian military officer who they say is in hiding in Russian military headquarters in Tbilisi.

Putin's comment came during a meeting at his country home outside Moscow to discuss the situation with senior ministers, leading legislators, armed forces chiefs and intelligence officials.

"The president described the actions of Georgia's leadership as an act of state terrorism with hostage-taking," the Kremlin said in a statement.

Before the meeting, Putin compared the arrests to the work of Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin's secret police chief, Lavrenti Beria, who, like Stalin, was a Georgian known for bloodthirsty ruthlessness.

"Our servicemen, as is known, have been detained and put behind bars," Putin said, making his first public comments on the crisis. "It is a sign of the legacy of Lavrenti Pavlovich Beria's policy."

On Thursday, Russia recalled its ambassador and evacuated other diplomats and their families from Georgia.

Georgian officials denounced the comments of Putin and other Russian officials as bellicose. "Our opinion is that this warlike rhetoric . . . can be described as an explicit threat to use military force," the Georgian Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

The intensity of the rhetoric has alarmed Western officials, who are calling for a negotiated settlement and privately urging the Georgians to find a quick solution, probably by expelling the Russians rather than putting them on trial, diplomats said.

Some Russian legislators are calling for a military solution, which would put Russia in conflict with a close U.S. ally with a force trained by Americans. Senior Russian officials so far have ruled out that option.

Putin hinted that the Georgians had been emboldened by their ties to the United States.

"By all appearances, those who are doing it believe that this anti-Russian bias in foreign policy meets the interests of the Georgian people," he said. "But I do not think so. These people believe that, being under the cover of their foreign sponsors, they can feel comfortable and safe. But is it really so?"

Putin Accuses Georgia Of Employing Stalinist Tactics (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

MOSCOW — Russian President Vladimir V. Putin used exceptionally harsh language Sunday to criticize Georgia for its arrest last week of four alleged Russian spies, accusing the former Soviet state of resorting to hostage-taking and Stalinist tactics.

In televised remarks made at the opening of a meeting with top security, defense and foreign policy officials, Putin said the Georgian government's actions followed in the path of Soviet dictator Josef Stalin's infamous secret service chief, Lavrenti P. Beria.

"It is absolutely clear that attempts are being made to sting Russia as painfully as possible and to provoke it," Putin said. "And, by all appearances, those who are doing it believe that this anti-Russian bias of foreign policy meets the interests of the Georgian people. But I do not think so."

Relations between Russia and Georgia have grown increasingly tense since the election in 2004 of pro-Western Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili, who came to power after a nonviolent people's revolt dubbed the Rose Revolution. Among the top aims of his administration has been to recover control of pro-Russian breakaway regions and to bring Georgia into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The heated rhetoric raised concerns about the risk of a military clash between Georgia and Russia, which has troops on peacekeeping duty in the breakaway regions. Russia also has two Soviet-era bases in the part of Georgia controlled by the central government.

In an apparent reference to the close ties that Georgia has with the United States and the European Union, Putin said that the Georgian policymakers "believe that, being under the cover of their foreign sponsors, they can feel comfortable and safe."

"But is it really so?" Putin continued. "Today, I would like to hear representatives of both the civilian departments and the military."

Putin then met behind closed doors with members of the country's security council.

After the meeting, the presidential website posted a statement that "the president termed the actions of Georgia's leadership as an act of state terrorism with hostage-taking."

Despite the angry words from Putin, his spokesman, Alexei Gromov, issued a brief statement Sunday evening that the president had ordered the Defense Ministry to continue the pullout of Russian troops from the two Soviet-era bases, in keeping with earlier agreements. The Russian military had announced Saturday that it had suspended closure of the bases in response to the spy dispute.

The four espionage suspects held by Georgia are among five Russian military officers arrested Wednesday. One of the five was released Thursday for lack of evidence. Ten Georgian citizens also were detained. Georgia has demanded that Moscow hand over a sixth officer believed to have taken refuge in Russia's military headquarters in Tbilisi, the Georgian capital.

Gen. Andrei Popov, the commander of Russian forces in Georgia, said Sunday that if provoked, his troops would respond with "any means necessary, including shooting to kill," the Russian news agency RIA Novosti reported.

Various top Russian officials besides Putin also have bitterly denounced Georgia's arrest of the spying suspects. But most of those statements, like Putin's, avoided direct comment on whether the detained officers were in fact intelligence agents.

Russia recalled its ambassador, Vyacheslav Kovalenko, in protest of the arrests, and he told reporters upon his arrival here Friday that the spying charges had "no solid basis at all." The Georgian government has released videotape that shows an exchange of money during a meeting of the alleged Russian spies and their Georgian contacts.

Putin is a former KGB agent, and before becoming president he headed its main domestic successor agency, the Federal Security Service. That personal background opened him to a bitterly sarcastic counterattack from a leader of Georgia's parliament, Giga Bokeria.

"Coming from Putin, it seems that the comparison with Beria is a compliment, because he is a direct successor," Bokeria said in comments broadcast on Georgia's Rustavi-2 television.

"However, of course this is an insult for us," Bokeria continued. "We are not proud of any legacy left by any Soviet executioner."

Incumbent Leads In Zambia Presidential Voting (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Oct. 1 — Zambia's incumbent president, Levy Mwanawasa, surged into the lead on Sunday as vote-counting in that nation's presidential election neared a conclusion, leading angry supporters of the main opposition candidate to riot in some urban centers.

Mr. Mwanawasa's rival, Michael Sata, who led in vote tallies until now, accused the government of withholding results from provinces where he had done well and said the government was "creating tension in the nation" by refusing to acknowledge his victory.

But the nation's largest independent newspaper, The Zambia Post, said the results so far seemed to reflect its own polling of voters around the country. And a leading political historian, Bennett Siamwiza of the University of Zambia, said in a telephone interview that he believed that the vote, on Thursday, had been the most orderly and corruption-free in the nation's history.

With 94 of 150 voting constituencies reporting, Mr. Mwanawasa had almost 734,000 votes, or about 40 percent of the 1.8 million ballots counted. A businessman making his first foray into politics, Hakainde Hichilema, was second with 579,000 votes, and Mr. Sata, a former cabinet minister, trailed with 538,000 votes.

Mr. Sata, a charismatic speaker whose prop-filled campaign stops sometimes drew tens of thousands of supporters, had been pegged by some opinion polls as the runaway leader in the race. He won broad backing among Zambia's millions of poor people with his promises to turn around their lives within three months of taking office.

But some cautioned that it was unclear whether his throngs of supporters were actually registered to vote. Mr. Sata also confined much of his campaigning to Zambia's few big cities, and Mr. Mwanawasa appeared to be doing well in rural areas.

On Saturday, Mr. Sata angrily warned of "ghastly consequences" if election irregularities denied him victory. On Sunday, he declared himself the winner, saying the government was withholding results from his strongholds. "Let them announce the elections from our Lusaka, Copperbelt, Northern and Luapala Provinces, where we have won overwhelmingly," he said. "What criteria are they using in releasing the results?"

In Lusaka, the police arrested dozens of Sata backers after disturbances broke out when the latest vote tallies were announced. Shops closed, because of fear of more election-related violence.

But the government had already relented to Mr. Sata's demands that Chinese-manufactured computers not be used to count the vote — he said the Chinese supported Mr. Mwanawasa — and independent European observers have called the Zambia vote a model for the region.

"These are by far the best-organized elections in Zambia's history," Mr. Siamwiza, the historian said. "They're very transparent."

Webster Malido, the news editor of The Zambia Post in Lusaka, said in a telephone interview that Mr. Sata appeared to have believed that the crowds supporting him in Lusaka and other cities mirrored support elsewhere in the country.

"For Sata, the problem is that Mwanawasa was able to get some votes in every province, even where he did bad," he said. "But Sata only campaigned in urban areas," he added, and so was almost shut out in some rural regions.

Private Firms Eye Darfur (WT)

By Willis Witter

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

Private military companies protecting American diplomats, aid workers and local officials in Iraq and Afghanistan are making a pitch to take over U.N. peacekeeping missions in Darfur and other global hot spots where the United Nations is unable to stop the killing.

Companies such as Blackwater, Triple Canopy, DynCorp and Halliburton have mushroomed in size and number since the 2003 Iraq invasion, serving an increasing need to protect people and projects from terrorist attacks.

With a limited number of U.S. and coalition troops in Iraq, private companies fill a void with up to 100,000 employees, far more than all non-U.S. coalition troops combined. They do everything from serving meals on U.S. bases to protecting diplomats and visiting generals who venture outside the protected Green Zone in downtown Baghdad.

Some companies are looking beyond Iraq and seeking a greater role in peacekeeping, and the largely ineffective deployment of a 7,000-member African Union (AU) force in the Darfur region of western Sudan provides an opportunity.

Blackwater says it could get its people and equipment in Darfur in three weeks, provided U.N. members could agree on a plan. In comparison, it takes an average of six months for a U.N. peacekeeping team to deploy.

Within limits

There's nothing inherently wrong with the concept, said Robert Young Pelton, author of the just-released book "License to Kill," which provides an inside look at a secretive world of private military contracting.

Few people even know about the industry, which is said to bid on $30 billion to $100 billion in annual contracts. One reason is that well-paid private contractors in Iraq and elsewhere typically sign agreements that include fines of up to $250,000 for speaking with reporters.

Shortly after Secretary of State Colin L. Powell visited Darfur in 2004, Blackwater put together a proposal to go in there and stop the two sides from killing each other, Mr. Pelton said.

"The problem is, if you look at the presentation, it includes not only men with guns. They're offering helicopter gunships, a fighter bomber that has the capacity to drop cluster bombs and [satellite-guided weapons], armored vehicles. You say: 'Wait a minute? That's a lot of offensive force. What does that have to do with peacekeeping?'"

Almost everyone agrees that the U.N. peacekeeping system is broken, a view underscored by the humanitarian disaster in Darfur, in which hundreds of thousands of people have been killed and millions driven into squalid refugee camps.

The private sector would not perform offensive operations, said Chris Taylor, Blackwater's vice president for strategic initiatives. But it could provide badly needed backup for the AU force in an area of Sudan roughly the size of France.

"If the AU comes in and performs an intervention in one area, we can follow behind them and relieve them so they can continue elsewhere. We can provide the defensive security and provide a defensive perimeter for the humanitarian organizations to follow. The NGOs can start doing what they do best within a secure environment, and that's what's missing in Darfur," Mr. Taylor said.

"We're having discussions with all the principals, the policy-makers, but as you can imagine, the obstacles to doing this are far more political than operational," he said.

Outside the law

On an ill-defined battlefield, such as in a guerrilla-led insurgency, contractors can quickly become soldiers.

Mr. Pelton's book describes one such battle between a handful of Blackwater contractors and the Mahdi Army militia of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr in Najaf.

In spring 2004, the militia attacked Camp Golf, then the local headquarters of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority.

Fighting lasted all day and night, with Blackwater contractors doing most of the fighting and Blackwater helicopters doing all the resupply and medical evacuations, Mr. Pelton writes.

"The military seemed to fear what was happening -- Blackwater Security versus the Mahdi Army while the U.S. military stood by watching -- essentially an American mercenary militia battling an Iraqi mercenary militia."

U.N. peacekeeping operations make limited use of private companies to move troops and supplies; provide logistical support, medical personnel, portable outhouses; and perform other tasks.

Air transport for the 18 U.N. peacekeeping missions is done by private companies. Guards at many U.N. facilities are supplied by companies that bid for contracts. In Liberia, an entire police force was trained by one of the biggest military contractors, DynCorp, which was hired by the United States as part of a U.N. peacekeeping operation.

But it is situations like the battle in Najaf that worry the United Nations.

"The idea of putting in [peacekeeping] forces that would have the ability to use all necessary means, up to and including the use of lethal force to address a problem, is one that we are not comfortable with," said an official with the U.N. Department of Peacekeeping Operations.

Peter W. Singer, a scholar at the Brookings Institution and author of the 2003 book "Corporate Warriors," views the notion of privatized U.N. peacekeeping with skepticism.

"It would be a great idea if Martians came and acted in Darfur, too," Mr. Singer said. "It's not on the table except in the minds of the companies, or to be kind of honest, journalists looking for an interesting story."

Like Mr. Pelton, Mr. Singer raises the issue of accountability.

"Current international law has been found inapplicable to the actions of the industry, as the firms fall outside of the outdated legal conventions that deal only with individual mercenaries," he wrote in Brookings' Policy Review.

Blackwater's Mr. Taylor disagrees.

"Our professionals are just as accountable to the Geneva and Hague conventions as anybody else," he said, before listing at least a dozen overlapping U.S. laws that would apply to Blackwater employees.

In his book, Mr. Pelton weighs in on the side of Mr. Singer: "As of the spring of 2006, there has not been a single contractor charged for any crime that occurred in Iraq, though hundreds of soldiers have been court-martialed for offenses ranging from minor violations of military code to murder."

Under discussion

Doug Brooks, president of the International Peace Operations Association, a trade group representing 27 private companies, offers another take on a role for a private peacekeeping army in Darfur.

The Sudanese government refuses to accept U.N. peacekeepers because it fears a repeat of what happened in Kosovo, which gained de facto independence from Serbia through a U.N. intervention, Mr. Brooks said.

"What about a private company working under Sudanese law?" he asked.

"You'd have to have some safeguards, but in essence, you would get effective security. It would be neutral, so it would protect against both the rebels and the [government-backed] Janjaweed militia. It would pay taxes to the Sudanese government.

"You'd have to have safeguards to make sure the guys aren't thrown into some kangaroo court for every alleged offense. But it's something that they might be willing to look at."

Mr. Brooks said his organization is attempting to broach the subject with the Sudanese government.

"We've had some informal contacts through go-betweens to see what they think about it and haven't heard back," he said. "But who knows?"

We Saved Europeans. Why Not Africans? (WP)

By Susan E. Rice, Anthony Lake And Donald M. Payne

With Darfur set to be hit by a second wave of genocide, world leaders are shifting into diplomatic high gear. The government of Sudan flatly rejects deployment of a 22,000-strong U.N. force, knowing it would be much more effective than the African Union's, even if augmented by additional personnel as is now planned.

Some 450,000 innocent human beings are already dead, and more than 2.5 million have fled their homes. Now Sudan is launching a major offensive in Darfur. After three years of fruitless negotiation and feckless rhetoric, it's time to go beyond unenforced U.N. resolutions to a new kind of resolution: the firm resolve to act.

Will world leaders continue to give the perpetrators of genocide a veto over international action to stop it? Unless something changes dramatically, the answer seems to be yes.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair proposed bribing the Sudanese with debt relief, aid and trade concessions to get them to admit U.N. peacekeepers. By contrast, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice threatened confrontation, and President Bush declared: "If the Sudanese government does not approve this peacekeeping force quickly, the United Nations must act." But neither said how. Instead, the president appointed Andrew Natsios, a former administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as his special envoy for Darfur. An envoy's role is to negotiate, but the Sudanese have left nothing to negotiate.

Lost in the diplomatic bustle is reality: First, the U.S.-brokered peace deal for Darfur, fatally flawed from its signature, is dead. Second, Sudan has broken every pledge to every envoy to halt the killing in Darfur. Third, China is unlikely to compel Sudan to admit the United Nations -- 7 percent of its oil is at stake, and China may figure we value its help on Iran and North Korea more than on Sudan. Fourth, it's too late for sanctions; even if China miraculously relented, it would take months before their bite was felt. By then, Sudan will have completed its second wave of genocide in Darfur.

History demonstrates that there is one language Khartoum understands: the credible threat or use of force. After Sept. 11, 2001, when President Bush issued a warning to states that harbor terrorists, Sudan -- recalling the 1998 U.S. airstrike on Khartoum -- suddenly began cooperating on counterterrorism. It's time to get tough with Sudan again.

After swift diplomatic consultations, the United States should press for a U.N. resolution that issues Sudan an ultimatum: accept unconditional deployment of the U.N. force within one week or face military consequences. The resolution would authorize enforcement by U.N. member states, collectively or individually. International military pressure would continue until Sudan relented.

The United States, preferably with NATO involvement and African political support, would strike Sudanese airfields, aircraft and other military assets. It could blockade Port Sudan, through which Sudan's oil exports flow. Then U.N. troops would deploy -- by force, if necessary, with U.S. and NATO backing.

If the United States fails to gain U.N. support, we should act without it. Impossible? No, the United States acted without U.N. blessing in 1999 in Kosovo to confront a lesser humanitarian crisis (perhaps 10,000 killed) and a more formidable adversary. Under NATO auspices, it bombed Serbian targets until Slobodan Milosevic acquiesced. Not a single American died in combat. Many nations protested that the United States violated international law, but the United Nations subsequently deployed a mission to administer Kosovo and effectively blessed NATO military action retroactively.

Unthinkable in the current context? True, the international climate is less forgiving than in 1999. Iraq and torture scandals have left many abroad doubting our motives and legitimacy. Some will reject any future U.S. military action, especially against an Islamic regime, even if it is purely to halt genocide against Muslim civilians. Sudan has also threatened that al-Qaeda will attack non-African forces in Darfur -- a real possibility since Sudan long hosted Osama bin Laden and his businesses. Yet, to allow another nation to deter the United States by threatening terrorism would set a terrible precedent. It would also be cowardly and, in the face of genocide, immoral.

Some will argue that the U.S. military cannot take on another mission. Our ground forces are stretched thin. But a bombing campaign or a naval blockade would tax the Air Force and Navy, which have relatively more capacity, and could utilize the 1,500 U.S. military personnel in nearby Djibouti.

Others will insist that, without the consent of the United Nations or a relevant regional body, we would be breaking international law. Perhaps, but the Security Council recently codified a new international norm prescribing "the responsibility to protect." It commits U.N. members to decisive action, including enforcement, when peaceful measures fail to halt genocide or crimes against humanity.

This genocide has lasted three long years. Peaceful measures have failed. The Sudanese government is poised to launch a second round. The real question is this: Will we use force to save Africans in Darfur as we did to save Europeans in Kosovo?

Report Cites Bid By Sunnis In Bahrain To Rig Elections (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

MANAMA, Bahrain, Sept. 29 — Just months before Bahrain is to hold parliamentary and municipal elections, a former government adviser has set off a political firestorm with a report describing what he says is a vast conspiracy to rig the elections, manipulate the country's sectarian balance and ensure Sunni domination over the country's majority Shiites.

The scandal, which is being called "Bandargate" after the author of the report, Salah al-Bandar, reaches to the core of this tiny island kingdom's simmering tensions.

The report includes hundreds of pages of supporting material, apparently authentic, including canceled checks, hotel bills, accounting sheets and notes. The material suggests that at the very least, unusual business dealings were occurring between government officials, Mr. Bandar says, and that it may have amounted to an effort to set off ethnic conflict.

"For the first time the evidence is complete, it's not just allegations," said Mr. Bandar, speaking by telephone from Britain, where he has lived since his deportation in early September. "The evidence is documents, it is signatures, and there is a blueprint for their plans and their strategy. One can see the way in which the discrimination is institutional now, and it is beyond any imagination."

In all, Mr. Bandar contends, the documents indicate that $6 million was spent to plant articles in Bahraini newspapers, organize counterdemonstrations when Shiites held protests, set off cellphone text-message campaigns against opposition figures and even support a program to convert Shiites into Sunnis. Government officials have dismissed Mr. Bandar as a disgruntled employee with ulterior motives, insisting that the report is a fabrication.

Bahrain, with a population of about 700,000, including 200,000 expatriates, is a weekend playground for Saudis. The tiny island just off the coast of Saudi Arabia is a regional business hub and in recent years has become a center for Islamic banking.

But long-simmering sectarian divisions erupted almost to the point of civil unrest during the 1990's. King Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa, who succeeded his father in 1999, headed off the conflict by promising political changes aimed at turning the country into a constitutional monarchy. But when the effort faltered several years ago, many advocates for the Shiite population stepped up their demands for greater rights and more of a say in a government that they say is skewed to the Sunni minority. Shiite groups boycotted the last elections, in 2002, but were expected to take part in the November elections.

At the same time, more militant Sunni groups, alarmed by a Shiite revival in the Middle East, have begun painting Bahrain as the edge of a "Shiite Crescent," increasingly susceptible to Iran's influence. The resulting tensions here have at times boiled over into violent clashes between gangs of young people and security forces.

Mr. Bandar, 52, a Sunni who was born in Sudan and married a Bahraini, was employed as an adviser to the Cabinet Affairs Ministry. He said he began receiving calls in January from other Sunnis inside the government increasingly concerned by what they said was an organized campaign to raise tensions within the government.

Mr. Bandar, who is also the secretary general of a group called the Gulf Center for Democratic Development, said he began investigating the accusations, enlisting the help of accountants and the government whistle-blowers to piece together a picture of a web led by high-ranking government officials.

In early September, he said, he presented a 240-page report to advisers to King Hamad and the prime minister, Sheik Khalifa bin Salman al-Khalifa, as well as to Western embassies and the news media. The report indicates that at the least, payments were made to the news media and other groups to write articles and spread messages. But it contends that the campaign went beyond corruption as a network of officials, religious leaders, government-backed civic groups and even some Jordanian intelligence agents worked to drown out Shiite voices and strengthen Sunnis.

The elections, Mr. Bandar said in the report, were part of a five-year plan to put political control of the country firmly in the hands of a small group of militantly anti-Shiite Sunnis. But he noted in the phone conversation that there was no evidence linking either the king or the prime minister to the scandal. "The strategy of the group is to heighten the tension," Mr. Bandar said.

Much of the scandal centers around Sheik Ahmed bin Ateyatalla al-Khalifa, chief of the Central Informatics Organization, Bahrain's version of the Central Intelligence Agency, who also heads the committee that is overseeing the November elections. Most of the checks appear to be drawn on Sheik Ahmed's personal accounts, and the report includes documents with a detailed accounting of the expenditures.

Shortly after Mr. Bandar issued the report, he said, his contract was terminated. He was taken to the airport, he said, and placed on a flight bound for Britain, where he holds citizenship, his visa canceled when he left. He now stands accused of espionage and of trying to foment a coup and could face charges if he tried to return. He said he was filing his own lawsuit against the government charging wrongful dismissal.

For the most part, the government has remained silent as the scandal has grown. The news media have responded to the accusations that they accepted payments by writing articles critical of Mr. Bandar.

Officials implicated in the report do not dispute the authenticity of the documents in Mr. Bandar's report, but insist that their actions were not illegal and that his conclusions were wrong. Sheik Ahmed, speaking to reporters in Bahrain, said the report was a fabrication intended to undermine the coming elections and "weaken national unity."

The canceled checks, he said, were part of normal business dealings outside his official duties. But opposition leaders say even that would be a violation of the Constitution, which bans ministers from having outside business dealings.

"The checks are true, they are there and signed but they depend on people filling the gaps and getting the wrong impression," said Raed Shams, assistant secretary for cabinet affairs at the Ministry of State, who is described in the report as a major player in the group. "You start creating the whole story in your mind. In the end they are mixing the deck and confusing the issues."

Bahrain's predominantly Shiite opposition groups say the report is a smoking gun and have demanded a full investigation. "All of this fits within our own political reading," said Ibrahim al-Sharif, chairman of the Democratic Action Society. "What he did for us was connect the dots and show the extent of the effort. It's fair to say everyone is shocked by the result."

Global Sludge Ends In Tragedy For Ivory Coast (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen And Marlise Simons

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

ABIDJAN, Ivory Coast, Sept. 28 — It was his infant son's cries, gasping and insistent, that first woke Salif Oudrawogol one night last month. The smell hit him moments later, wafting into the family's hut, a noxious mélange reminiscent of rotten eggs, garlic and petroleum.

Mr. Oudrawogol went outside to investigate. Beside the family's compound, near his manioc and corn fields, he saw a stinking slick of black sludge.

"The smell was so bad we were afraid," Mr. Oudrawogol said. "It burned our noses and eyes."

Over the next few days, the skin of his 6-month-old son, Salam, bloomed with blisters, which burst into weeping sores all over his body. The whole family suffered headaches, nosebleeds and stomach aches.

How that slick, a highly toxic cocktail of petrochemical waste and caustic soda, ended up in Mr. Oudrawogol's backyard in a suburb north of Abidjan is a dark tale of globalization. It came from a Greek-owned tanker flying a Panamanian flag and leased by the London branch of a Swiss trading corporation whose fiscal headquarters are in the Netherlands. Safe disposal in Europe would have cost about $300,000, or even twice that, counting the cost of delays. But because of decisions and actions made not only here but also in Europe, it was dumped on the doorstep of some of the world's poorest people.

So far eight people have died, dozens have been hospitalized and 85,000 have sought medical attention, paralyzing the fragile health care system in a country divided and impoverished by civil war, and the crisis has forced a government shakeup.

"In 30 years of doing this kind of work I have never seen anything like this," said Jean-Loup Quéru, an engineer with a French cleanup company brought in by the Ivorian government to remove the waste. "This kind of industrial waste, dumped in this urban setting, in the middle of the city, never."

The tale of the sludge can be traced to July 2, when a rust-streaked tanker, the Probo Koala, arrived in Amsterdam after a lengthy stay in the Mediterranean. Leased by Trafigura, a global oil and metals trading company, it was pausing on its way to Estonia to unload what the company said was 250 tons of "marslops" or "regular slops." That is the wash water from cleaning a ship's holds, which would normally be laced with oil, gasoline, caustic soda or other chemicals.

Amsterdam Port Services, a waste processing company, took the job, for about $15,000. But as workers unloaded the waste, they found problems, the company said. For one, the volume was much higher, more like 400 tons. For another, the seeping fumes of the waste sickened some of the Dutch workers.

"It was pitch black and had a heavy stench," said Luut Planting, a spokesman for Amsterdam Port Services. "No one had ever seen similar waste."

The company stopped unloading the sludge, ordered analyses and then informed the Amsterdam city authorities of the presence of hazardous waste, Mr. Planting said. The material and test results are currently under seal in the office of the Dutch public prosecutor, which has opened a criminal investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0072893

A statement posted on Trafigura's Web site says that tests performed on material discharged by the Probo Koala in Abidjan by a laboratory in Rotterdam showed that the material was not toxic. "Contrary to speculation in the media and the activist communities about residue washings in a recent shipment to Côte d'Ivoire, tests conducted by the company and others show the washings themselves to have little or no toxicity," the statement says.

As to the deaths and illness, the statement says, "It is still unclear exactly what caused the tragedy."

But the Rotterdam laboratory, Saybolt, has told Dutch news media the samples were not sealed, not properly marked and not wholly reliable.

Lucas Reijnders, a chemist and professor of environmental science at the University of Amsterdam, said he had seen the results of an analysis done in Ivory Coast by a lab there, Ciapol, on samples taken from the Probo Koala before the dumping.

The analysis showed extremely high levels of caustic soda; mercaptans, a kind of sulfur compound; and hydrogen sulfide, he said. The last, he said, is a volatile compound that "smells of rotten eggs, but at high concentrations you can no longer smell it because it paralyzes your nervous system."

"It's very lethal and acts very rapidly," he added. The mix, he said, was suggestive of oil refining.

Exactly where the waste originated remains unclear. A spokesman for Trafigura, Jan Maat, said the Probo Koala had served in the Mediterranean "as a floating storage tank" and had taken on loads from several different ships, but he declined to give details.

Reports in the Dutch press said the Probo Koala had been secretly used as a floating refinery during the summer, when selling gasoline had become unusually profitable.

Mr. Maat denied that. "This is absolutely untrue," he said.

After analyzing the waste, Amsterdam Port Services told Trafigura's London office that the price to treat and dispose of it would now be much more expensive, close to $300,000. Trafigura, which in 2005 had revenue of $28 billion dollars, balked at the cost.

"It was so much higher than the first price," said Mr. Maat. It would also have meant staying an extra day, costing $45,000 in port fees and a penalty of some $300,000 for arriving late in Estonia, he said.

A brief standoff ensued, but the Probo Koala was able to leave Amsterdam two days later after taking back all of its waste with the permission of the Dutch authorities.

"We have never handed back or refused waste before," said Mr. Planting. "But the crux was that Trafigura refused to pay. If they had, the material would have been treated and there would have been no problem."

From Amsterdam, the Probo Koala sailed to Estonia and took on Russian oil products. After delivering them to Nigeria, it continued to Abidjan, where it arrived on Aug. 19.

Mr. Maat said Trafigura's London office had advised the Ivory Coast port authorities and the Transportation Ministry that it was delivering chemical waste requiring special treatment and close supervision, and hired a local company, Tommy. "We were informed that four companies there could handle it," said Mr. Maat. "One of them was Tommy. Clearly this has not been a fortunate choice."

He also said, "We do not acknowledge responsibility for the dumping of the waste without treating it."

French, Dutch and British toxic-waste experts and oil traders said it can be easily ascertained that Ivory Coast has no facilities capable of handling high-level toxic waste.

Tommy hired more than a dozen tanker trucks, into which it pumped the sludge. The trucks fanned out, at night, to at least 18 sites across the city, according to witnesses in several neighborhoods where the material was dumped, as well as the French cleanup crew.

Several tankerloads went to the Abidjan landfill, in a community called Akouedo. Residents there are accustomed to foul odors, but knew something was particularly bad about the new material. They chased and surrounded one of the tanker trucks, forcing the driver to flee on foot, witnesses said. In other places, some trucks were simply abandoned by drivers fearful of being attacked as word of the illegal dumping crept out and public anger rose.

Efforts to reach Tommy by telephone were unsuccessful, and at least one of its executives has been jailed in Ivory Coast.

Last week Jean-Baptiste Giassey, a 13-year-old schoolboy, rooted through garbage piled at Akouedo, near a team of workers from Tredi, the French environmental cleanup company that is gathering up the polluted trash, which is expected to be sent to France for proper disposal.

Stinking mud oozed from the trash under his flimsy sandals, coating his feet and legs. He was looking for scraps of aluminum, which he would sell to traders for less than 25 cents a pound. He said he had been spending five or six hours a day at the dump, trying to earn enough money for new clothes.

"I don't know that it is dangerous," he said. "I come here every day."

At first the Ivorian government did not acknowledge that something was amiss, even though the rank smell was spreading through the streets of Abidjan. Officials say they suspect they will find more dump sites than the 18 identified so far.

The spreading illnesses sparked violent demonstrations from a population convinced that government corruption was to blame for the dumping, and ultimately the furor forced the prime minister and his government to resign in September, though much of the government was reinstated later. Six Ivorians, one Nigerian and two European officials from Trafigura have been jailed so far in Ivory Coast.

The risk of sickness from the waste has abated with evaporation, experts said. But there may be long-term effects of exposure. In Dgibi, a village on the northern outskirts of Abidjan where some of the waste landed, an impromptu clinic set up to examine people exposed to the waste has been seeing 200 patients a day.

Most complain of nausea, headaches, skin sores and nosebleeds, said Stanislaus Dessi, a doctor at the clinic who works for the Ministry of Health.

"People are scared and confused," Dr. Dessi said. "We try to calm them and give them medicine to treat whatever symptoms they have."

The Probo Koala, back in Estonia, has been detained by the government there at the request of Ivory Coast.

Greenpeace has filed criminal complaints in Amsterdam against Trafigura, Amsterdam Port Services and the Dutch environmental authorities. The Dutch government said it could not comment while criminal investigations were under way. There are no fewer than five investigations going on in Ivory Coast.

The city of Amsterdam and the Dutch Parliament have begun their own inquiries.

"The whole procedure was illegal, first allowing the waste in, then pumping it back on board and letting the ship leave without any licenses," said Eco Matser, a chemist and expert in toxic waste at Greenpeace.

Africa has long been a dumping ground for all sorts of things the developed world has no use for. "This is the underbelly of globalization," said Jim Puckett, an activist at the Basel Action Network, an environmental group that fights toxic waste dumping. "Environmental regulations in the north have made disposing of waste expensive, so corporations look south."

U.S. To Cut Guatemala's Debt For Not Cutting Trees (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 1 — The United States government has joined with two environmental groups in a debt-for-nature swap, which will forgive about 20 percent of Guatemala's $108 million in foreign debt to Washington in an effort to help threatened tropical forests there, American and conservation officials said late last week.

In a deal to be announced Monday in Guatemala City, the government of Guatemala has agreed, in exchange for the debt forgiveness, to invest $24.4 million over the next 15 years in conservation work in four nature regions.

This is the largest amount of debt that has been forgiven by the United States under the Tropical Forest Conservation Act, which was enacted in 1998. So far, 10 countries, from the Philippines to Peru, have had part of their debt forgiven in exchange for forest protection efforts.

"You can't just come in as the U.S. and say it's important to protect those forests," Claudia A. McMurray, assistant secretary of state for oceans, environment and science, said in an interview. "You have to give these countries alternatives."

In the latest deal, the United States government contributed about $15 million toward the cancellation of Guatemala's debt, said Clay Lowery, assistant secretary of the Treasury for international affairs. The groups Conservation International and the Nature Conservancy each contributed an additional $1 million. Those funds, and the interest they will generate, will be enough to erase more than $20 million in debt and interest, officials said.

"This is a huge deal for Guatemala," John Beavers, who helped to negotiate the deal for the Nature Conservancy, said in a telephone interview from Guatemala City. "We hope it helps to drive the conservation area in Guatemala."

The country has struggled in recent years to control illegal logging and drug trafficking in its natural areas. Soldiers are deployed in some areas to stem the destruction.

There is also a legal threat to Guatemala's parks. A business confederation has filed a suit contending that the law establishing the protected areas is unconstitutional, because it did not receive a two-thirds majority when the legislature approved it almost 20 years ago.

The bulk of the money generated by the debt forgiveness will go to private organizations working to preserve the country's nature areas. A $4.9 million conservation trust fund will also be set up to generate interest income for future grants.

The money will be spent in four of Guatemala's premier reserves, which include tropical and subtropical forests and coastal mangrove areas. The areas are home to many rare and endangered species.

"The areas protected in this agreement lie in the heart of Mayan civilization, and they are home to jaguars, scarlet macaws, harpy eagles and countless other species," Steven J. McCormick, president of the Nature Conservancy, said in a statement.

The protected areas are the Cuchumatanes region, the Maya Biosphere Reserve, the Motagua/Polochic System and the Western Highlands volcanic chain.

To qualify for the program, Guatemala had to meet a series of political and economic criteria. Eligible countries must have democratically elected governments and a suitable economic reform program in place, and they must cooperate with the United States on drug enforcement and counterterrorism efforts.

An agreement under the program with Belize set aside 23,000 acres of new forest preserves and has helped to manage an additional 270,000 acres. One of two deals in Panama helped preserve the Chagres River Basin, which is a major source of water for the Panama Canal.

European Agenda (WSJ)

By Nicolas Sarkozy

Next year's 50th anniversary of the EU's founding Rome treaty should be celebrated with pride, for it marks an historic achievement: Half a century of reuniting a divided Continent. But there is also cause for concern. The forces driving the Union's political momentum have run out of steam and Europe's citizens are either doubtful or indifferent to its aims and lack any real collective hope for the future.

Whether we like it or not, the referendum results on the EU constitution in France and the Netherlands were unequivocal and binding. Yet the need for EU constitutional reform remains strong. A new reference text will have to define Europe's geopolitical boundaries, establish the Union's long-term political aims, correlate EU policies with EU projects and set out the means to move forward. An ambitious agenda of this sort calls for a large-scale democratic debate. But all this takes time, and time is something we do not have. I would suggest that the most urgent priorities for institutional reform could be covered in a mini-treaty that would modify the treaties of Nice and Amsterdam. We should aim to draft this mini-treaty under the German EU presidency next year and to ratify during the French presidency in 2008 in time for the European Parliament elections in 2009. * * *

First, the mini-treaty should extend the scope of qualified majority voting in the Council and co-decision with the European Parliament and empower the European Parliament to elect the European Commission president. It should respect the principle of subsidiarity and to this end strengthen the role of national parliaments by adopting the EU constitution's proposed "early warning" system, enabling national legislators to challenge Commission proposals. There can also no longer be any dispute about the value of a stable European Council presidency. The mini-treaty should also create an EU foreign minister and increase participatory democracy, especially to empower groups of a million citizens or more to request that the Commission make proposals in a specified area. Finally, if the mini-treaty were to confer a legal personality on the Union this would allow it to participate in some international organizations as a single political entity.

But root-and-branch reforms nevertheless remain essential in the longer-term.

Choosing EU commissioners solely on the basis of their nationality prevents effective team-building. At the same time, though, the Commission is often a scapegoat for public opinion. So what would happen when it takes a major decision affecting, say, a large company from a country without its own commissioner to represent its national interest? To break this stalemate, we need to consider whether the Commission president should not select fellow members.

I am also convinced that Europe must change its rules on unanimous decision-making. How can we believe, or make others believe, that we can fight terror by bringing together a learned assembly of 50 justice ministers, giving each one the floor for two minutes and then demanding unanimity from them? I have already suggested the idea of a "super-qualified" majority voting system of 70% or 80% support for particularly sensitive policy areas. We also need a new motor to drive important decisions forward, with those countries most concerned by a specific topic getting together to set out an action plan. Such ad hoc groups could explore new possibilities for collective action, while leaving the door open for other states to join later.

Now is the time, too, to face up honestly to the issue of Europe's borders, and accept that the French and Dutch referendum results were partly provoked by a Europe "sans frontiers." Establishing a new geographic and political framework for EU enlargement is a prerequisite of renewed popular support for the European project. And this framework must recognize that the Union's capacity to absorb new members is finite. I want this capacity to be quantified. The decision to accept each new applicant should be taken in light of the EU's internal objectives, its institutional limitations and the level of popular support. Such decisions should not be based upon foreign policy goals or a desire to encourage neighbors to reform.

So who is European and who is not? Clearly, some non-member countries are part of the European continent and have the right to full EU membership. This group includes Switzerland, Norway and -- eventually -- the Balkans. Then there are other countries whose right to join the Union is debatable or who, although neighbors, are clearly non-European.

For this latter group in the Euro-Asian and Mediterranean areas we should avoid presenting them with overly stark choices: Full membership or nothing at all. Our first step should be to establish preferential partnerships so we can work together while still observing our different interests and values.

Countries that want to participate in prosperous European markets should adopt all the internal market regulations needed to protect our product quality and controls. But preferential partnerships can also go beyond trade, allowing non-member countries to participate in certain European policies so that the Union can encourage their economic and social development. We could also perhaps even secure new defense arrangements that would help to build our collective security. * * *

Of all the countries with which the EU should have preferential relations there is Turkey, our neighbor and friend, sharing many of our security concerns and many of our values. These are good reasons for strengthening our ties with Turkey, without going so far as offering full membership.

However, no candidate for EU membership has the right to ignore that the Union has 25 members, including Cyprus. Despite the customs union between Turkey and the EU, Turkey continues to deny access to its ports and airports to boats and airplanes that have stopped in Cyprus. This is not acceptable. I say again and again that the EU must suspend any new accession negotiations with Turkey until Ankara has ratified and implemented, in good faith, its agreed trade protocols.

Turning to questions of EU finance, we must undertake an ambitious reform of the European budget. Under the current system, national budgets support European expenses. This is illogical, unfair and intolerable for the net contributor countries and incomprehensible for citizens. European expenses must be financed by European resources, just as local taxes finance local expenses. Financial reform will be an important issue for the coming French EU presidency.

Finally, I want to consider how to modernize political life in Europe. In each member state, the issues at stake in European election are still primarily national. My answer would be to allow European political groups to combine national lists of candidates and present a united program during European parliamentary elections. This would create genuine Europe-wide campaigns on European political agendas. If affiliated groups also declared their preferred choice for Commission president, this would give European citizens a direct say over the direction of Europe.

The world has changed tremendously since the Treaty of Rome and perhaps we have now reached the end of the road for that model of European integration. The new Europe must recognize new realities and adapt to them, not try to impose artificial systems upon its decision-making. Here is a revolution for the Union, a rupture with the past. What we need now is for all of the EU's member states to rediscover a desire to take Europe forward instead of being preoccupied with their national interests. Failing that, those nations which want to seize the initiative should be able to do so without being constrained by the reluc tance of the others.

Mr. Sarkozy is France's interior minister. This essay is an edited version of one to appear in the fall issue of Europe's World.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Sept. 11 Panel Wasn't Told Of Meeting, Members Say (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — Members of the Sept. 11 commission said Sunday they were alarmed that they were told nothing about a July 2001 White House meeting at which George J. Tenet, then director of central intelligence, is reported to have warned Condoleezza Rice, then national security adviser, about an imminent attack by Al Qaeda and failed to persuade her to take action.

Details of the meeting on July 10, 2001, two months before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, were first reported last week in a new book by Bob Woodward. The White House disputes his account.

The final report from the Sept. 11 commission made no mention of the meeting, nor did it suggest that there had been such an encounter between Mr. Tenet and Ms. Rice, now secretary of state.

Since the release of the book, "State of Denial," the White House and Ms. Rice have disputed major elements of Mr. Woodward's account. Ms. Rice has said through spokesmen that there had been no such exchange in a private meeting with Mr. Tenet and that he had expressed none of the frustration attributed to him in Mr. Woodward's book.

"It really didn't match Secretary Rice's recollection of the meeting at all," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to President Bush, in an interview on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "It kind of left us scratching our heads because we don't believe that's an accurate account."

Passages of the book suggest that Mr. Tenet was a major source for Mr. Woodward. The former intelligence director has refused to comment on the book since its release.

There has also been no comment on the book from J. Cofer Black, who was Mr. Tenet's counterterrorism chief, and who, the book says, attended the July 10 meeting and left it frustrated by Ms. Rice's "brush-off" of the warnings.

Mr. Black is quoted as saying, "The only thing we didn't do was pull the trigger to the gun we were holding to her head." He did not return calls left at Blackwater, the security firm he joined last year.

The book says Mr. Tenet hurriedly organized the meeting, calling ahead from his car as it traveled to the White House, because he wanted to "shake Rice" into persuading the president to respond to dire intelligence warnings about a possible terrorist strike.

Mr. Woodward writes that Mr. Tenet left the meeting frustrated because "they were not getting through to Rice."

The disclosures took members of the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission by surprise last week. Some questioned whether information about the July 10 meeting was intentionally withheld from the panel, the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

In interviews Saturday and Sunday, commission members said they were never told about the meeting despite hours of public and private questioning with Ms. Rice, Mr. Tenet and Mr. Black, much of it focused specifically on how the White House dealt with terrorist threats in the summer of 2001.

"None of this was shared with us in hours of private interviews, including interviews under oath, nor do we have any paper on this," said Timothy J. Roemer, a Democratic member of the commission and a former congressman from Indiana. "I'm deeply disturbed by this. I'm furious."

Another Democratic commissioner, the former Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste, said the staff of the Sept. 11 commission was polled in recent days on the disclosures in Mr. Woodward's book and agreed that the meeting "was never mentioned to us."

"This is certainly something we would have wanted to know about," he said, referring to the meeting. "We asked broad questions which should have elicited this information."

He said he had attended the commission's private interviews with both Mr. Tenet and Ms. Rice and had pressed "very hard for them to provide us with everything they had regarding conversations with the executive branch" about terrorist threats before Sept. 11.

Philip D. Zelikow, the executive director of the Sept. 11 commission and now counselor to the State Department, agreed that no witness before the commission had drawn attention to a July 10 meeting at the White House or described the sort of encounter portrayed in Mr. Woodward's book.

Mr. Zelikow said it was “entirely plausible” that a meeting occurred on July 10, during a period that summer in which intelligence agencies were being flooded with warnings of a terrorist attack against the United States or its allies.

But he said the commissioners and their staff had heard nothing in their private interviews with Mr. Tenet and Mr. Black to suggest that they made such a dire presentation to Ms. Rice or that she had rebuffed them.

“If we had heard something that drew our attention to this meeting, it would have been a huge thing,” Mr. Zelikow said. “Repeatedly, Tenet and Black said they could not remember what had transpired in some of those meetings.”

Democratic lawmakers have seized on Mr. Woodward’s book in arguing that the Bush administration bungled the war in Iraq and paid too little attention to terrorism threats in the months before Sept. 11.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on CBS that there had been “rumors” of such an encounter between Mr. Tenet and Ms. Rice in the summer of 2001.

Mr. Woodward’s book, he said, raised the question of “why didn’t Condi Rice and George Tenet tell the 9/11 commission about that? They were obliged to do that, and they didn’t.”

Bush Critic Hits Clinton's Claims About Bin Laden (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

Michael Scheuer, whose 2004 book "Imperial Hubris" won hosannas from liberals as an indictment of the Bush administration's conduct of the war on terror, turned his sights on former President Bill Clinton yesterday.

In an appearance on "Fox News Sunday," the former CIA counterterrorism official denounced as "lies" Mr. Clinton's contentious defense last week of his efforts against Osama bin Laden, saying the administration passed up at least 10 chances to capture or kill the al Qaeda leader.

"Mr. Richard Clarke, Mr. Sandy Berger, President Clinton are lying about the opportunities they had to kill Osama bin Laden. That's the plain truth, the exact truth," Mr. Scheuer said of the former president and, respectively, his administration's top anti-terrorism adviser and national security adviser.

Mr. Scheuer also disputed Mr. Clinton's assertion that he did not have the necessary authorization to kill bin Laden, pointing out the president is the person who issues authorizations, not the person who needs them.

"It's not a simple, dumb bureaucrat like me; that's not my decision. It's his," Mr. Scheuer said. "For him to get on the television and say to the American people he did all he could is a flat lie, sir. This is not a question of interpretation or judgment. This is a question of fact. And the documents will show the president had the opportunity."

Mr. Scheuer was part of a "Fox News Sunday" panel that debated the Clinton administration's efforts in fighting terrorism, one week after Mr. Clinton caused a stir by getting visibly angry at Fox interviewer Chris Wallace's questions on the topic.

The Scheuer comments were disputed by Daniel Benjamin, a former Clinton National Security Council counterterrorism official, who said intelligence officials never had enough reliable information to capture or kill bin Laden.

"I have the greatest respect for Mike Scheuer, but on this case, I think he's wrong," Mr. Benjamin said. "Quite simply, we never had enough information to do this with confidence, knowing that we would get the target. And it doesn't help your deterrence and it doesn't help your case if you fire and you don't hit the right person."

When pressed by Mr. Wallace, Mr. Scheuer said he remains a critic of the Bush administration's record on combating terrorism and the decision to invade Iraq.

"I think that this administration has led us into a tremendously difficult long-term problem, which will be very bloody and costly for Americans," he said.

However, Mr. Scheuer defended the Bush administration against accusations from Clinton supporters that the Bush team could have eliminated bin Laden in the eight months before the September 11 attacks.

"Mr. Clarke, Mr. Berger, Mr. Clinton did have opportunities that were delivered by the men and women of the CIA to kill Osama bin Laden," Mr. Scheuer said. "In the first eight months of the Bush administration, there were no such opportunities."

Journalist Lawrence Wright, who also appeared on the "Fox News Sunday" panel, said the real blame for failing to capture bin Laden and eliminate al Qaeda has more to do with the government's inability to hire a competent national security intelligence team at all levels -- agents, analysts and officials.

"They were both poorly served by their intelligence agencies," Mr. Wright said. "In each of these cases, the intelligence was not great. And the reason the intelligence was not great is they didn't have people that were capable of getting inside the tent."

Tape Shows 2 Hijackers In Year Before 9/11 (AP)

LONDON, Oct. 1 (AP) — Mohamed Atta, the ringleader of the Sept. 11 attacks, smiles and jokes with another hijacker before the two turn serious and speak to a camera in a video that surfaced on Sunday.

For more than 30 minutes, the video shows Mr. Atta, who later took over the controls of American Airlines Flight 11, which hit the north tower of the World Trade Center, and Ziad al-Jarrah, who took over United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania, alternately alone and together.

The Sunday Times, which originally reported on the video and posted it on its Web site, said it was made in Afghanistan and dated Jan. 18, 2000, for release after the men's deaths.

The newspaper said the hourlong video was made at a training camp for Al Qaeda in Afghanistan. It includes images of Osama bin Laden. It has no sound.

At times, the two men look relaxed, laughing and chatting before they grow serious and speak directly into the camera. At one point, they study a document the newspaper identifies as a will.

American intelligence officials in Washington said Sunday that the tape was being analyzed, and one confirmed the men's identities.

9/11 Hijacker Video Surfaces (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 1 -- Mohamed Atta, the ringleader of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, smiles and jokes with another hijacker before the two turn serious and speak intently to a camera in a newly released video.

For more than 30 minutes, the video shows Atta, who flew one of the planes that brought down New York's World Trade Center, and Ziad Jarrah, who piloted United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed into a Pennsylvania field, sitting in front of a bare white wall, alternately alone and together.

The Sunday Times, which originally reported the video and posted it on its Web site, said it was made in Afghanistan and dated Jan. 18, 2000 -- about a year and a half before the attacks against the United States -- for release after the men's deaths.

The newspaper said the hour-long video was made at an al-Qaeda training camp in Afghanistan. It includes images of Osama bin Laden speaking to supporters in Kandahar, Afghanistan. A time stamp indicated that this footage was shot on Jan. 8, 2000.

At times in the video, which has no sound, the two men look relaxed, laughing and chatting together before they grow serious and speak directly into the camera. At one point, they lean over a document the newspaper identifies as a will, studying it intently and sometimes pointing to specific sections and commenting to one another.

The Sunday Times said it had obtained the video "through a previously tested channel" but gave no further details. It said sources from al-Qaeda and the United States had confirmed the video's authenticity on condition of anonymity.

Look Past The Tortured Distortions (WSJ)

By John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham

WASHINGTON -- Negotiating a complicated piece of legislation with wide-ranging implications is always a difficult endeavor, and the Military Commissions Act of 2006 was no exception. We worked with the administration to achieve a fair system for the prosecution and conviction of suspected terrorists. The proposed legislation also reaffirms and underscores our nation's commitment to the Geneva Conventions, which we must uphold as a matter of principle and to protect our service members in this and future wars. We believe that we have succeeded in this effort.

We also believe that the American people deserve to have this important legislation properly described. Some recent reports, in our view, have not reflected accurately the bill we negotiated. The following points deserve clarification in order that this important legislation may be fully understood by the American people. * * *

Criminal Waiver: A number of recent articles state that in our compromise with the president, we included a waiver for crimes Americans may have committed in interrogating detainees. In fact, our bill contains no waiver for such crimes, nor immunity for any individual. Anyone who has committed a crime may be prosecuted under the torture statute or the War Crimes Act. This legislation actually makes it easier to win a prosecution, because the War Crimes Act as currently written is so broadly worded that a prosecution would likely fail on grounds of vagueness.

Enemy Combatants: Other reporting asserts that the definition of "illegal enemy combatant" in the bill could subject a broad category of people to arrest and indefinite detention with no hope of appeal. Actually, the proposed legislation simply establishes the jurisdiction of military commissions. That jurisdiction extends solely to aliens who have engaged in hostilities against the United States or who have purposefully and materially supported hostilities against us.

We make no apology for wanting to try by military commission both the people who shoot at us and those who aid and abet the trigger-men. Because we believe in the American system of justice, we also do not apologize for giving these individuals the right to appeal their convictions, all the way up to the Supreme Court.

The Geneva Conventions: Another misunderstanding is that the bill gives the president the power to reinterpret unilaterally the Geneva Conventions. In fact, the president, under this legislation, has no power beyond that already given him in the Constitution: the authority to interpret treaty obligations binding on the executive branch. From the beginning, we stood with the five former chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the 50 other general and flag officers who strongly resisted any legal redefinition of the Geneva Conventions.

Some critics state that any determinations made by the president could stay secret. In fact, this legislation requires the president to publish his determinations as to what offenses constitute "non-grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions in the Federal Register. His interpretations will have the force of administrative regulations, and so can be trumped by congressional action at any time.

Habeas Corpus: Another myth is that, under our bill, detainees would lose the basic right to challenge their imprisonment. Actually, both the Detainee Treatment Act and the Military Commissions Act allow an individual to challenge his status in administrative and judicial fora. These challenges are in excess of what our soldiers would be afforded as prisoners of war.

Judicial Review: Other critics claim that our civilian courts would have no power to review any aspect of the military tribunal system, except verdicts by military tribunals. The truth is that our federal courts today already have the right to review the decisions made by military Combatant Status Review Tribunals.

Coerced Evidence: A number of articles state that coercion is defined so as to exempt anything done before the passage of the 2005 Detainee Treatment Act. This, also, is incorrect.

The bill excludes any evidence obtained through illegal interrogation techniques, including those prohibited by the 2005 act. Any evidence obtained before the 2005 law would have to pass a legal reliability test -- and, as applied in practice, the greater the degree of coercion, the more likely the statement will not be admitted. To admit any such evidence, the judge would have to make an additional finding that doing so serves the interest of justice.

Secret Evidence: Some argue the bill weakens the legal standard against withholding evidence from the defendant. In fact, under this legislation, any evidence shown to the jury must be shared with the defendant. This was a key change from the administration's proposal.

Offenses: Finally, there is some confusion about the definitions of torture and rape within the bill. As is made explicit in the legislation, these definitions are for the purposes only of enumerating war crimes -- offenses so serious that they are all potentially punishable by death. They do not affect other legal definitions for the same terms (including torture and rape) contained elsewhere in law. The bill's definition of rape is based on the meaning used in the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. * * *

It is axiomatic that a compromise makes no one happy. Our mission was to help our nation in the war on terror and to give protection to our men and women in uniform, particularly if they are captured. Anyone may disagree with elements of the final product, but an accurate understanding of the legislation is essential to all sides of the debate.

Messrs. Warner, McCain and Graham are Republican senators for Virginia, Arizona and South Carolina, respectively.

In Fog Of War On Terror, Some Rules Set (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

War is rarely kind to civil liberties. From the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 to the suspension of habeas corpus during the Civil War to the forced internment of some 120,000 Japanese in the US during World War II, the nation has repeatedly grappled with how to balance security and rights.

Now - in the middle of a war on terror and nearing critical midterm elections - Congress has taken another stab at achieving that balance. In historic votes last week, lawmakers banned torture, rape, and murder in the interrogation of terrorist suspects. But they left to the president to determine what techniques short of "serious" physical or mental pain or suffering are still allowed.

They also voted to give immunity to those involved in secret interrogations before last year's torture ban and to allow evidence obtained by "cruel and inhuman treatment" before that date to be used in military trials.

And in the most tightly contested decision of the week, lawmakers denied detainees in the war on the terror the right to challenge their detention in US courts. That means that anyone that the president or the secretary of Defense determines to be an enemy combatant - including noncitizens living legally in the United States - can be held indefinitely without trial.

In a wrap-up of the week's votes - including $448 billion for defense spending and $35 billion for homeland security in fiscal year 2007, as well as a mandate to build 700 miles of fence along the southern border - Republican leaders said the US will be "safer, stronger, and more prosperous" because of these laws.

"The specificity that the bill provides to the War Crimes Act - and its retroactive effect - will actually make prosecuting war criminals a realistic goal. None of my colleagues should object to that goal," said Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, who led the drive to ban torture in 2005, in a statement after the vote.

But critics say that, unlike the torture ban, the Military Commissions Act of 2006 is one that the nation will come to regret, just as it has regretted other lapses of civil liberties during times deemed national emergencies.

"This is a debate about whether we are willing to preserve the fundamental protections our nation has fought for centuries to maintain," said Rep. Doris Matsui (D) of California, who cited her family's personal experience in the Japanese detentions in the US during World War II.

The debate is hardly new.

In July 1798, President John Adams signed into law the Alien and Sedition Acts, allowing him to deport any foreigner he deemed dangerous and to ban any spoken or written criticism of the president.

The four laws aimed to protect the nation from security threats from France, but the votes in Congress broke along party lines. The Federalist-controlled Congress aimed to mute criticism from Jefferson's Republicans.

"Wartime is traditionally a period of infringement of civil liberties. The Alien and Sedition Acts took place in a quasi-war with France, but the incoming [Republican] administration allowed the law to expire when the crisis was over," says Donald Ritchie, a Senate historian.

When President Lincoln suspended the writ of habeas corpus in 1862, rioters in Baltimore were threatening to destroy train tracks to block Union troops from reaching the capital and the Maryland legislature was threatening secession. The Constitution allowed suspension of the writ "in cases of rebellion or invasion," he said.

But critics of last week's vote say the decision to suspend a right as fundamental to Western law as habeas corpus was not justified by the facts on the ground. There is no rebellion or imminent invasion, they say.

"I'm not going to support a bill that's blatantly unconstitutional ... that suspends a right that goes back to [Magna Carta in] 1215," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. He sponsored an amendment to delete the ban on habeas corpus from last week's bill that narrowly failed on a near party-line vote.

"I'd be willing, in the interest of party loyalty, to turn the clock back 500 years, but 800 years goes too far," he added, although he did vote for the final version of the bill.

In the end, all but one Democrat voted to preserve habeas corpus for military detainees and all but four Republicans - Sens. Specter, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Gordon Smith of Oregon, and John Sununu of New Hampshire - voted to suspend that right for those deemed enemy combatants.

"People deeply interested in the issue are the exception rather than the rule," says Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska, the lone Democrat to vote with Republicans to approve the suspension of habeas corpus for military detainees. "People respect Senator McCain on the issue, and he's reflecting a lot of views in Nebraska," he adds.

In final votes on the Military Commissions Act of 2006, the House passed the bill by a vote of 250-170, with seven Republicans voting against the bill and 32 Democrats voting for it. In the Senate, where the bill passed by a vote of 65 to 34, one Republican and 12 Democrats broke with their party. Many of the Democrats voting for the bill face tight midterm elections this fall, as does Senator Chafee, the lone GOP dissenter.

"The Constitution is not a suicide pact," says Senator Sununu, who also voted for the final bill after opposing suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

"We're trying to strike a balance between those rights and processes we should afford everyone, even if they're suspected of grievous acts, with need given the scope of the threat to have very robust tools and very efficient procedures for detention and prosecution," he adds.

A Last-Minute Deal On Detainees (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

After weeks of fighting, Congress passed a bill last week governing the treatment and prosecution of terrorism suspects, marking a victory for President Bush and the GOP-at least momentarily-in the run-up to the midterm elections.

Following House approval of the bill on Wednesday, the Senate voted 65 to 34 to approve the measure on Thursday, with 12 Democrats crossing party lines to vote for the legislation. But even though the president is expected to sign the bill shortly, some lawmakers warned that the Supreme Court might still overturn part of the law, just as the high court overturned the president's original concept for military tribunals back in June.

The bill would prohibit several kinds of abuses of detainees, as defined under the Geneva Conventions, but leave it to the president to say exactly what interrogation techniques are allowable. The bill also sets up military tribunals that allow some use of evidence obtained through coercion but gives defendants partial access to classified evidence being used against them. In addition, the measure expands the definition of "enemy combatants" to include noncitizens living legally in the United States and those who provide weapons, money, or support to terrorist groups.

Differing views. "This bill will help keep Americans safe by creating military commissions to prosecute terrorists for war crimes and by preserving an intelligence program that has disrupted terrorist plots," said Sen. Majority Leader Bill Frist, reflecting the view of many on Capitol Hill.

But others wondered whether the measure could survive judicial review. They said the Supreme Court might object to provisions that eliminate a detainee's ability to challenge detention. "This bill," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, "is not a check on the administration but a voucher for future wrongdoing."

Letting The President Say (TIME)

By By Michael Duffy

Time, October 9, 2006

A few days afterÂ terrorists toppledÂ the World Trade Center in 2001, Vice President Dick Cheney said the U.S. would have to "work ... the dark side" in order to destroy Osama bin Laden's network. Just what the dark side could mean became clearer last month when George Bush suddenly announced that 14 suspected al-Qaeda terrorists had been shipped from mysterious overseas locations to the U.S. detention center at GuantÃ¡namo Bay, Cuba. It was the first White House confirmation of a secret CIA-operated network of overseas prisons, places where unorthodox methods of interrogation were not unknown. "Were it not for this program," Bush said, referring to the secret prisons and the things done there, "al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland."

When Congress adopted legislation last week to establish military commissions to try terrorist suspects, it also gave approval to that program and then some. By allowing coerced testimony to be entered as evidence in trials, Congress potentially legitimized torture as a means of obtaining information. It left the President in charge of filling in the details of what the allowable methods should be. The clearest limit to what might be done was actually not so clear. The new methods could not constitute "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions. But after all the huffing and puffing from Republican Senators John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, the Executive Branch kept control over what exactly could happen to an "enemy combatant." It was allowed to decide who an enemy combatant might be. The package of measures widened the definition to include any person determined to be one under criteria defined by the President or the Secretary of Defense.

More than that, the measures adopted by Congress last week stripped defendants of the ancient habeas corpus right to challenge their detention in court--a step that makes it possible that the Supreme Court will strike down some portion of the law and send everybody back to the drawing board. "The Supreme Court has made clear on three recent occasions that those whom the White House labels enemy combatants are entitled to challenge their detention before a federal judge," says Eric Freedman, a law professor at Hofstra University who is a legal consultant to GuantÃ¡namo detainees. "This new law was passed in outright defiance of those rulings."

What the legislation is likely to do even sooner is put the CIA's secret-prison program back online. That's right: back online. Although when he revealed its existence, the President left the impression he had suspended the program in response to a June Supreme Court ruling, that's not so. What neither he nor Congress nor the CIA has publicly acknowledged is that the agency halted the "special interrogations" in its secret prisons more than nine months ago. People briefed on the matter tell TIME that the agency backed away from its program in December 2005 as Congress passed an amendment to the 2006 defense bill banning "cruel, inhuman or degrading" treatment of prisoners in U.S. custody. According to other U.S. officials, then CIA Director Porter Goss feared that the amendment, sponsored by McCain, might undercut the legal authority for CIA interrogations. So Goss put those procedures on hold while seeking a legal opinion from the Justice Department.

For the next nine months, says a person briefed on activity in the program, some at the agency developed a bias for killing its targets instead of bringing them in for questioning, though sources add that ground conditions make capture impossible anyway. Goss's suspension order left officers in the agency's directorate of operations, says the source, repeatedly asking the question, What are we going to do with these guys if we capture them? So far in 2006, as government sources and public reports indicate, few if any terrorist suspects have been captured by the CIA. But at least four--including bombmaker Abu Khabab al- Masri, on the FBI's most-wanted list--have been killed, in most cases by remotely fired missiles from Predator drones.

The rules adopted last week may mean a return to the practice of capture and question. But question how? Just what interrogation methods are off the table now? Depends on whom you talk to. McCain, who along with Graham and Warner had fought the Administration on some of the most coercive methods, insisted to reporters last week that the harshest techniques--such as waterboarding, stress positions, extreme sleep deprivation and hypothermia--could now be illegal. "For all the gloating from the Administration," says Tom Malinowski of Human Rights Watch, "they are not getting what they want on torture." And what methods are O.K.? No one inside or outside the CIA will say. Which may mean we're going to be fighting on "the dark side" for some time to come. With reporting by Timothy J. Democrats On Al Qaeda (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

Democrats keep insisting that, whatever their opposition to the war in Iraq, they'd be as tough as anyone in fighting al Qaeda. We'd love to believe this for the country's sake, but then what are Americans to make of last week's Congressional vote on detainee interrogation and military tribunals?

The bill was a compromise between the White House and three GOP Senators who Democrats had been hailing as voices of independent courage only days earlier. But rather than endorse this deal that put limits on interrogation methods (see nearby), Democrats in both houses voted overwhelmingly no. In the House, only 34 Democrats supported the bill, most of those from the South or rural areas, while the entire leadership and 160 Democrats voted no.

Over in the Senate, 32 Democrats opposed the bill, including the leadership and everyone who's been mentioned as a potential Presidential candidate in 2008: Hillary Clinton, Evan Bayh, John Kerry, Joe Biden, Chris Dodd, Russ Feingold. The dozen who voted yes are either up for re-election or from swing states. If an election weren't coming, we doubt there'd have even been that many. The Democratic "ayes" included Senate candidates Sherrod Brown of Ohio and Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, both partisan liberals on all issues except, suddenly, this one.

This amazing vote only reinforces the Republican argument that, given the chance, Democrats would return to the pre-9/11, law-enforcement model of fighting terrorism. In voting "no," they were opposing aggressive interrogation of even the worst al Qaeda captives. If Democrats fall short of regaining Congress this year, votes like this will be the reason.

'The More Subtle Kind Of Torment' (WP)

By Joseph Margulies

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

In these uncertain times, it's worth recalling that the threat posed by weapons of mass destruction in the hands of madmen is not new. Nearly 50 years before Sept. 11, 2001, the American public learned that a group of prisoners in military custody confessed to being part of an elaborate conspiracy to bomb civilian targets with bacteriological weapons.

The first prisoner to crack said the goal was "the mass annihilation of the civilian population." As often happens, his confession led to others, and before long, three dozen prisoners had coughed up page after page of chilling, meticulously detailed admissions.

But it was all a lie. Thirty-six American airmen, shot from the sky during the Korean War, falsely confessed to a vast plot to bomb civilian targets. How did this happen? With Congress having approved a "compromise" that gives the president authority to determine the meaning of the Geneva Conventions and redefines the War Crimes Act to protect CIA interrogators, we should revisit this all-but-forgotten moment in U.S. history.

During the Korean War, thousands of American POWs were forced to endure grotesque and sadistic physical torture. But the downed airmen were treated differently. The senior officer among them was Col. Frank Schwable, the highest-ranking Marine captured in the conflict. "I want to emphasize," Schwable said later, "that I did not undergo physical torture. Perhaps I would have been more fortunate if I had, because people nowadays seem to understand that better. Mine was the more subtle kind of torment."

The airmen were subjected to something new: touchless torture. They were kept isolated from all human contact, apart from their interrogators. One prisoner spent 10 months in solitary confinement, another 13. Schwable did not learn of the armistice until after he confessed.

They were made to stand or sit in awkward and painful positions for hours at a time. One prisoner had to sit at attention on the edge of a stool for 15 hours per day for 33 days. Another time he had to stand for 30 consecutive hours, until he collapsed. Schwable was required to sit at attention every day for almost 10 weeks.

They were demeaned, taunted and treated like animals. Schwable said the guards "growled" or "barked" at him, slopped food at him, and made him defecate in public. "Every effort was made to degrade and humiliate me," he said.

And of course they were interrogated. Grueling interrogations that lasted hours and hours, repeating the same material they had gone over the day before, and the day before that, until the past became a confusing whirl of fact and fantasy suggested to them by their relentless interlocutors. At last, exhausted and demoralized, their resistance overcome, they confessed. They all confessed in the end. And they all lied.

Maj. William Harris later tried to explain to an incredulous public how he could falsely accuse his country of something so barbaric as a conspiracy to bomb civilians, especially if he wasn't "tortured." "They don't have to lay a hand on you to make you the most miserable person in the world," he said. "I would rather take a beating any day than be subjected to their type of questioning and treatment."

After the war North Korean atrocities were roundly condemned by the United States, which complained to the United Nations that the Koreans had not complied with the Geneva Conventions. One institution, however, was not repelled but intrigued. The experience led the CIA to accelerate its research into the theory and science of coercive interrogation.

Between 1950 and 1962, the CIA poured millions of dollars into studies that tested different interrogation techniques, hoping to learn from and refine the lessons of Korea. The research culminated in the top-secret KUBARK manual, a 1963 primer on how to conduct coercive counterintelligence interrogations. The manual was finally disclosed in 1997 and is now available online.

KUBARK operates on the premise that a prisoner will divulge what he knows once he realizes that resistance is pointless. The prisoner must believe his captors are "all-powerful." Confusion, fear and isolation are the interrogator's stock in trade, since they "create and amplify an effect of omniscience."

Interrogators must create a menacing and ominous environment that destroys the prisoner's capacity to function as a "civilized man." Prisoners should be kept disoriented because "the capacity for resistance is diminished by disorientation."

The prisoner's environment must be manipulated to produce a "regression of the personality to whatever earlier and weaker level is required for the dissolution of resistance." This usually doesn't take much. "Relatively small degrees of homeostatic derangement, fatigue, pain, sleep loss, or anxiety" are generally sufficient.

When in doubt, the interrogator should always keep in mind this useful advice: In order to achieve " the maximum amount of mental discomfort ," (emphasis in original), your prisoner must be instilled with a sense of "debility, dependence, and dread." "When this aim is achieved, resistance is seriously impaired." The prisoner enters "a kind of psychological shock or paralysis." At that moment, "the source is far more open to suggestion [and] far likelier to comply."

Will mild "homeostatic derangement" be deemed acceptable under the legislation just passed by Congress -- a little sleep deprivation here, some extended standing there, perhaps a few more hours in the cold room, a wee drop of solitary confinement now and again, extended isolation from the outside world? Nothing like "real" torture, since everyone knows that's unreliable.

Regrettably, we may not hear the answer in the sad, distant voices of three dozen American airmen. There is a lesson in their cries, if only we'd listen.

The New York Yankees feature large in upstate Republican Rep.Sherwood Boehlert's life. And for the first time in 24 years, that's a good thing. Because this post-season-and World Series, to hear "Sherry" brag on-he'll have a chance to sit in Yankee Stadium instead of campaigning in Utica and Cooperstown for re-election. He's retiring. "Just to give you an example of how this year's been different," he tells our Bret Schulte, "September 3 in an election year, I usually have two or three chicken barbecues and maybe a walk in a Labor Day parade. This September 3, I was sitting in the front row behind the dugout in Yankee Stadium with two of my daughters and grandkids."

You could say he's a rare example of congressional retirement. While others hang around Washington to lobby, Boehlert's giving back to his family. "What about us?" they asked him. So he's obliging, as long as they like baseball. And how could they not? His district includes the Baseball Hall of Fame, which he's already hit up for playoff tickets. "They're the best seats in the house," he says of Cooperstown's front-row dugout spots. He knows: At that September 3 game, centerfielder Johnny Damon rolled a ball to his grandson. Then third base coach Larry Bowa rolled one to his granddaughter. "They thought I was 10 feet tall," he says with a grin. And for the record: He predicts a 27th world championship. Sorry, Mets fans.

Make No Mistake: Bush Wants OBL

All this recent talk about whether President Bush tried as hard as former President Clinton to nail Osama bin Laden had us wondering just how bad the prez wants the terrorist. Real bad, it seems. One key insider says that Bush is nearly obsessed with "OBL," as he's called. "He's very taken with the hunt, and it is very much a priority on his mind," says terrorism adviser Frances Townsend. "He has an extraordinary memory for detail. He has an extraordinary ability to recall particular details, plots, individuals, to ask questions about it. And I will tell you that he asks very specific questions on the hunt for bin Laden on a regular basis."

Just Don't Say Iran Caved In-Please

Good news on those Iran-European Union talks over stopping Tehran's bid to build a nuke: Iran's likely to suspend its uranium enrichment program if nobody really calls it that. Insiders say they want some face-saving language in any deal that makes it look like they didn't cave in to western pressure. "They can call it whatever they want," a U.S. official says, "but they have to stop the work" before formal talks including Washington can begin.

Q&A Pervez Musharraf

Pervez Musharraf knows how to make a splash with a book tour. In the week that his new memoir, In the Line of Fire, hit stores, the Pakistani President feuded publicly with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, had tea and Twinkies on The Daily Show with Jon Stewart, ate dinner at the White House, and was greeted in London by Tony Blair and a leaked British defense document accusing Pakistan's intelligence agency of having ties to al-Qaeda. Somehow, he also managed to squeeze in a chat with TIME in New York.

The Afghan government says Pakistan is responsible for the resurgence of the Taliban.

The U.N. Secretary-General's report says that the foot soldiers of the insurgency are Afghans. I've been saying that for the last three months, even though President Karzai and everyone else says they're from Pakistan. Today Karzai said [Taliban leader] Mullah Omar is in Quetta. This is a ridiculous assertion. Mullah Omar has never come to Quetta. Not since 1995 has he come to Pakistan. He is based in Kandahar and is still there.

There have been recent reports that Osama bin Laden may have died. Do you believe them?

I have no such information. I spoke to my intelligence chief, and he did not substantiate this point.

Do you believe bin Laden is in Pakistan?

These are things that agitate me. I could say he could be in any country. But I never say that because I don't know. We have excellent intelligence sources, so if we don't know where he is, I don't know how anyone else knows. We don't know where he is. We are guessing.

If you sent in a larger number of forces, would you have a better chance of finding him?

We'll go anywhere if we have any indication that he is there. We are trying to look for him. But we're dealing with mountainous areas. There are no roads. These are fiercely independent people--they are all armed, everyone carrying a weapon. This is the kind of terrain we're dealing with. It's not easy.

The Black Hole Of A U.N. Blacklist (WSJ)

By David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

LONDON -- Governments around the world have drawn criticism for some extrajudicial steps taken to corral suspected terrorists, from secret prisons to surreptitious abductions to deportations that could lead to torture or execution.

Meanwhile, a program overseen by the United Nations Security Council has stripped hundreds of people of assets and international-travel rights -- and even the right to earn a salary or buy groceries -- without so much as a hearing, let alone trial or appeal. Apart from suspects' lawyers and a European human-rights watchdog, the program has drawn little scrutiny.

Today, 359 people are on this blacklist created by Security Council Resolution 1267. No court process is involved in adding someone to the list, nor is it debated by the council's member states. Those added have no right to present exculpatory evidence to Security Council members, nor any right of appeal.

Cutting Off Funding

The U.S. and other governments say these sanctions are an important weapon in the fight against international terrorism, cutting suspects off from the money they need to communicate and operate, either from jail or when the law would otherwise let them go free.

Opponents say the program has lost its original purpose and is used by governments to evade due process in pursuit of alleged terrorists and their accomplices. Critics also decry the opportunity for governments to abuse the system by framing dissidents and others who draw official disfavor.

"This isn't about preventing terrorism. This is punishment without trial," says German lawyer Gül Pinar, who represents several people in Germany who are on the U.N. list.

A Security Council report in March aired concerns about how effective the program has been against terrorism. In a letter to the panel's president, the chairman of the committee that oversees the list cited inconsistent enforcement among nations, noting many suspects continue to cross borders.

Resolution 1267 was passed in 1999 to pressure Afghanistan's Taliban rulers to hand over Osama bin Laden after Washington accused him of masterminding the 1998 bombing of U.S. embassies in Africa. Rather than impose broad economic sanctions, which would hurt the Afghan population, the Security Council aimed to isolate and punish Taliban leaders. A year later, the restrictions were applied to Mr. bin Laden and some of his associates.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the U.S., Resolution 1267 has been used against a much wider group, including suspected and convicted al Qaeda operatives and their networks. Some people on the U.N. list have been tried and convicted of terrorist-related offenses and are in jail. Some, like Mr. bin Laden, are or were fugitives. Others inhabit a grayer zone.

Take Saad al-Fagih, whom Saudi Arabia accuses of complicity in an attempted assassination and of helping to buy the satellite phone Mr. bin Laden used to direct the embassy bombings. Mr. Fagih has never been charged with a crime in the United Kingdom, where he lives. His designation on the U.N. list "is a critical part of the international campaign to counter terrorism," according to a U.S. Treasury Department statement.

Two cellphones chirp constantly as Mr. Fagih, a Saudi citizen, pilots a Honda Civic through busy London traffic en route to a four-bedroom townhouse in a tony neighborhood of northwest London. The home, like the car and the phones, is in his wife's name. Mr. Fagih denies any ties or past dealings with Mr. bin Laden: "If it were true, why haven't I been charged?" he asks.

Heino Vahldieck, the head of intelligence in Hamburg, Germany, says administrative pressure, such as 1267 sanctions, is used against men like Mr. Fagih when circumstantial evidence tying them to terrorism is considered overwhelming but criminal prosecution is difficult or impossible. "We need to be creative," he says.

Although most of the list's designated Taliban supporters are Afghan nationals, those accused of al Qaeda links are more diverse, including at least one U.S. citizen, three Britons, two Germans and five Saudi Arabian citizens. The blacklist includes at least 35 Tunisians, five Moroccans, 10 Egyptians and 77 individuals of indeterminate nationality, according to the U.N.'s official 1267 sanctions list.

Sanctions Survive Acquittal

Last year, a court in Hamburg found Abdelghani Mzoudi -- a Moroccan student and former roommate of three Sept. 11 pilots -- not guilty on all charges of logistical support for those hijack attacks. Despite the acquittal, Mr. Mzoudi, who returned to Morocco after his trial, remains sanctioned under 1267 for his alleged support of al Qaeda.

Mamoun Darkazanli, who lives in Hamburg, was designated under 1267 in October 2001, shortly after he told police he spent Sept. 11 watching television with a man who later admitted -- under interrogation in Syria -- that he recruited three pilots for the attacks. Mr. Darkazanli, whose lawyer notes her client has never been convicted of a crime, was left destitute when banking restrictions made it impossible to run his import-export business. He survives on welfare payments authorized by the Security Council.

This year, the Council of Europe, an intergovernmental human-rights watchdog, said in a report requested by the U.N. that the 1267 process doesn't comply with Europe's convention on human rights because it provides no protection against arbitrary decisions and has no mechanism to review the accuracy of allegations governments make. Those targeted have no recourse against national governments, which can simply say they are bound to follow the dictates of the Security Council.

The procedure to designate someone an al Qaeda or Taliban supporter is simple. A government submits a name to the Security Council's 1267 committee, which circulates it among the 15 council members, along with supporting details. There are no formal standards of evidence required for designation, a diplomat involved in the process said, adding, "The 1267 committee is not a court. This is a political process."

Delistings Are Few

If no objection is made within five days, the person is added to the list. Their assets -- from bank accounts to private debts to prison-canteen funds -- are frozen and they lose the right to travel internationally. "Silence means, 'Yes, the sanction is confirmed,' " a U.N. spokeswoman said. Most sanction requests have been approved without challenge, although nine people have been delisted. Individuals don't get a hearing and can't submit evidence to refute the allegations. Nor can they apply to be delisted -- only a government can on their behalf.

Mr. Fagih says "nobody contacted me about the allegations" when his name went before the 1267 committee in 2004. He eventually learned of Saudi Arabia's charges, and the Security Council sanctions, from the British foreign office. His name was proposed by Saudi Arabia, which alleged that in 2003 Mr. Fagih received $1 million from a man who later confessed to plotting the assassination of the Saudi crown prince, according to the Treasury Department. Mr. Fagih denies involvement in the alleged plot and says he was targeted for organizing peaceful human-rights demonstrations.

Nawaf Obaid, a Saudi security adviser at the kingdom's London embassy, says he investigated Mr. Fagih's case for three years and the charges against him are "rock solid." Saudi Arabia hasn't applied to extradite Mr. Fagih, because the U.K., like other European Union countries, refuses to extradite suspects to countries where they would face the death penalty, Mr. Obaid says.

Despite the U.N. sanctions, Mr. Fagih continues to broadcast from London for Al-Islah TV, a Saudi dissident television station that aims to overthrow the royal family. He says the impact of the U.N. sanctions on his life has been negligible.

"Nothing has changed," says Mr. Fagih, while serving tea and cakes from a silver tray in his office. Joking, he adds: "Except I can't buy a tank."

FBI Worries About An Osama-mobsters Link (USAT/AP)

By Pat Milton, Associated Press

USA Today, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — The FBI's top counterterrorism official harbors lots of concerns: weapons of mass destruction, undetected homegrown terrorists and the possibility that old-fashioned mobsters will team up with al-Qaeda for the right price.

Though there is no direct evidence yet of organized crime collaborating with terrorists, the first hints of a connection surfaced in a recent undercover FBI operation. Agents stopped a man with alleged mob ties from selling missiles to an informant posing as a terrorist middleman.

That case and other factors are heightening concerns about a real-life episode of the Sopranos teaming with Osama bin Laden's followers.

VIDEO: Osama and the Sopranos?

"We are continuing to look for a nexus," said Joseph Billy Jr., the FBI's top counterterrorism official. "We are looking at this very aggressively."

The new strategy involves an analysis of nationwide criminal investigations, particularly white collar crime, side by side with intelligence and terrorist activity.

"We have developed an ability to look harder and broader in a greatly enhanced way to see if there is any crossover," Billy said in an interview with the Associated Press.

Organized crime syndicates could facilitate money transfers or laundering, human smuggling, identification fraud or explosives and weapons acquisitions, officials said.

The options are many for terrorists groups.

There are the five reputed La Cosa Nostra families in New York, Russian criminal enterprises from Brighton Beach in the New York borough of Brooklyn to Moscow, and the emerging Asian crime syndicates that operate in many Islamic countries with al-Qaeda offshoots.

A contract study produced recently for the Pentagon and obtained by the AP warned that the potential for organized crime assisting terrorists is growing.

"Although terrorism and organized crime are different phenomena, the important fact is that terrorist and criminal networks overlap and cooperate in some enterprises," the study said. "The phenomenon of the synergy of terrorism and organized crime is growing because similar conditions give rise to both and because terrorists and organized criminals use similar approaches to promote their operations."

The traditional mafia has highly developed networks for acquiring goods and services and money, all for a price.

The mob's potential interest in helping a terrorist has nothing to do with ideology or sympathy but with greed, said Matt Heron, head of New York FBI's organized crime unit.

"They will deal with anybody, if they can make a buck," Heron said. "They will sell to a terrorist just as easily as they would sell to an order of Franciscan monks. It's a business relationship to them."

"If the mob has explosives and a terrorist wants them and they have the money, they could become instant friends," he said.

Pat D'Amuro, a retired senior FBI official and now chief executive of Giuliani Security, said a Mafia boss once acknowledged that the mob would help terrorists.

"I am aware of a high-level Mafia figure, who was cooperating with authorities, being asked if the Mafia would assist terrorists in smuggling people into Europe through Italy," D'Amuro said. "He said, 'The Mafia will help who ever can pay.'"

Officials said they have no specific evidence that such a relationship has been cemented. But concerns were heightened last year after an Armenian immigrant was arrested in New York for allegedly leading a plot to sell military weapons to an FBI informant posing as a middleman for terrorists.

Arthur Solomonyan had claimed to be able to deliver shoulder-fired missiles from his connection in Russian organized crime to the informant, who claimed to have ties to al-Qaeda, federal prosecutors said. Solomonyan and 17 others in New York, Florida and California were charged in the case.

Solomonyan is scheduled for trial this month. His lawyer, Seth Ginsberg, said he plans to "vigorously contest" the charges and call the government's confidential informant to the stand to challenge his motives. The Italian, Russian, and Asian mafia remain active, particularly in New York, even though the government has successfully prosecuted numerous figures in recent years.

In the past three years, well over 100 associates from all five La Cosa Nostra families have been arrested in New York, Heron noted.

While the potential of a gangster-terrorist marriage is on the FBI's radar, homegrown terror cells and weapons of mass destruction are also big concerns for those in the FBI given the job of stopping the next terrorist attack.

"We are not only aware that they want to come across the ocean to attack us but they may be physically here developing in our own homeland," Billy said.

The Internet has become the new Afghanistan, allowing terrorist sympathizers to promote their radical ideas and to recruit and train followers right their home computers. That makes it far more difficult for investigators to identify them.

Billy said his biggest concern remains weapons of mass destruction. While Hezbollah and Hamas are more defined terrorist groups, with a territorial focus and a political platform, al-Qaeda is more unpredictable.

"We know they were trying to acquire it prior to 9/11, bin Laden's own words said that," said Billy. "What makes us think they are still not trying?"

Wait Ends For Father And Son Exiled By F.B.I. Terror Inquiry (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 1 — Two American citizens of Pakistani descent returned to the United States on Sunday, five months after they were denied permission to fly home to California unless they submitted to an interrogation by F.B.I. terrorism investigators.

The men, Muhammad Ismail, 45, and his son, Jaber, 19, of the Northern California farming town of Lodi, returned from Pakistan on a flight that landed at Kennedy Airport in New York around 3:30 p.m. Eastern time. They were scheduled to arrive in California on Sunday night or early Monday on a connecting flight, their lawyer said Sunday.

The Ismails are an uncle and cousin of Hamid Hayat, a Lodi man who was convicted in April in federal court of providing material support to terrorists. Mr. Hayat told investigators he had attended a terrorism training camp during a long stay in Pakistan and intended to carry out unspecified attacks in the United States. Mr. Hayat's father, Umer, was convicted on a lesser charge of lying to investigators about the amount of cash he carried to Pakistan on a 2003 trip, but a jury deadlocked on terrorism charges.

The Ismails were not charged in the case. They attributed their predicament to being related to the Hayats, the only people to have been charged in what federal prosecutors have described as an investigation into possible terrorism links in Lodi.

Julia Harumi Mass of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California, who is representing the Ismails, said the pair had no terrorism connections. In a complaint in August to the Department of Homeland Security, she urged the authorities to explain any accusations against them and why they had been denied permission to fly home.

Legal experts said the matter raised questions about balancing terrorism investigations against American citizens' right to travel freely without having been charged with a crime or detained as a suspect.

On Sept. 6, nearly a month after Ms. Mass's complaint, the Homeland Security Department notified her in a letter and telephone call that unspecified records had been modified "to address any delay or denial boarding" the pair had encountered. Ms. Mass said she took that to mean they were cleared to fly, and the Ismails arranged financing and bought tickets home.

"I never imagined that the country I was born in would stop me from coming home for five months and separate me from my family, especially when I was not charged with a crime," Jaber Ismail said in a statement released through the A.C.L.U.

Hamid Hayat had told investigators he believed that Jaber, who was born in Lodi, attended a terrorism camp, but he lacked details. Mr. Hayat's lawyers attacked the investigators' questioning of Mr. Hayat as vague and coerced. Muhammad Ismail, a naturalized citizen who was born in Pakistan, said in the statement that they had traveled to Pakistan so Jaber Ismail could pursue religious study there.

On April 21, as juries were weighing the Hayats' cases, the Ismails were not permitted to board a connecting flight to San Francisco from Hong Kong and returned to Pakistan, where Jaber Ismail was questioned by F.B.I. agents at the American embassy in Islamabad. The agents, Ms. Mass said, requested further interviews with him and his father and a polygraph, which the Ismails refused.

The United States attorney's office in Sacramento, which prosecuted the Hayats, has declined to comment on the investigation other than to acknowledge that agents wished to speak with the Ismails. A Homeland Security spokesman said he had no information about the case.

Publisher To Offer Inside Account Of Al Qaeda Operative (NYT)

By Julie Bosman

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Basic Books says it will soon publish what it calls the first inside account of life as an Al Qaeda operative.

"Inside the Jihad: My Life with Al Qaeda, A Spy's Story," by Omar Nasiri, is a first-person narrative of Mr. Nasiri's time in an Al Qaeda training camp in Afghanistan in the 1990's, followed by a stint as a spy for a Western intelligence service.

The book, which is expected to be announced today and is scheduled to be published on Nov. 20, is a "detailed portrait of a complex man" with a "unique and chilling perspective," the publisher said in a press release.

But promoting "Inside the Jihad" will be tricky. "It will not be a traditional book tour," said David Steinberger, the chief executive of the Perseus Books Group, whose imprints include Basic Books, Da Capo Press and Running Press, among others. "There will be no author signings and no Oprah appearances and no morning shows."

Omar Nasiri, after all, is a pseudonym for someone who lives in hiding at an undisclosed location abroad, where he wrote the book over the last year. Mr. Nasiri will give only a few interviews, timed to the book's release, and given his ties to Al Qaeda will be unable to enter the United States. One of the interviews is expected to be with the BBC television program "Newsnight," but his face and voice will be digitally altered to protect his identity.

In the absence of an author able to speak for his work, the publisher is depending on other sources to lend credibility to "Inside the Jihad." Michael Scheuer, the former head of the Osama bin Laden unit within the Central Intelligence Agency, read the manuscript before publication, Mr. Steinberger said, and key facts in the book were vetted by members of various European security agencies.

Some consumers may be squeamish about buying a book written by a former Al Qaeda member, reformed or not, Mr. Steinberger acknowledged.

Still, he added, "There's only one way to get an accurate inside view of what goes on in Al Qaeda. The value of understanding what goes on there outweighs any other consideration."

Cash advantage

"The president's fund-raising sure helps," U.S. News & World Report reports in its White House Week column.

"Republicans in key congressional districts have now accumulated a big cash advantage over their Democratic rivals. Sources says that House Republican incumbents on the party's endangered list each have an average of $200,000 more on hand than their opponents," the magazine said.

"In the past, that kind of cash advantage has meant victory for more than 90 percent of candidates. Another good sign for the GOP: some of the most endangered Republican incumbents appear to be gaining momentum in their campaigns, according to GOP surveys."

Coming home

"If you have any doubts about the confusion of the Democrats, just look at the party's midterm strategy," Mark Halperin writes in the New York Times.

"On the one hand, Democrats are reluctant to push for liberal policies that would motivate their base. But the core of their enunciated message -- both vowing to stop the president's right-wing policies and blurring their differences with Republicans on highly charged issues -- has in recent elections been a recipe for defeat. Such equivocation is the kind of themeless pudding that does not match up well with the conviction of the White House message and is uninspiring to both the Democrats' base and the center," said Mr. Halperin, who is the political director of ABC News and co-author of "The Way to Win: Taking the White House in 2008."

"For months, the president was in severe political peril, with approval ratings regularly hovering around 30 percent, in large measure because he was missing the support of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents that is essential to his majority. Despite conservative disaffection with the White House over the past year on issues like spending (and even, in some cases, on Iraq), the latest polls show the GOP base is coming home -- and just in time. Base support is headed toward 90 percent, just about where it was before the 2002 and 2004 elections."

Ashcroft book

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft is to publish a memoir of his time in office, lashing critics of the Bush administration's strategy in the war on terror.

Advance copies of "Never Again: Securing America and Restoring Justice," which is to be published this week, were not available, but one person close to Mr. Ashcroft told Shaun Waterman of United Press International that he "hits out hard at critics of the administration" and its war on terror.

He has particularly harsh words for some of the members of the September 11 commission, especially Democratic former Justice Department senior official Jamie Gorelick, the source says.

The publisher's blurb says Mr. Ashcroft's position as the administration's most senior law-enforcement official gave him "a uniquely comprehensive -- and uniquely chilling -- view of the threats to American security," adding that Mr. Ashcroft discusses "the enactment and defense of the Patriot Act, the Robert Hansen spy scandal ... and the recently discovered domestic surveillance program authorized by President Bush."

Mr. Ashcroft, a conservative who became a lightning rod for criticisms of the administration's aggressive interpretation of the limits of presidential power, is slated to appear this morning on NBC's "Today" show to discuss his book.

Poll results

Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. is running even with Republican Bob Corker in Tennessee, while Democrat Jon Tester has edged ahead of Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana, according to polls released yesterday.

A Mason-Dixon poll found that Mr. Ford had the backing of 43 percent in Tennessee, while Mr. Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, was backed by 42 percent. Mr. Corker had a lead in midsummer polling matching the two.

Another Mason-Dixon poll found that Mr. Tester has pulled ahead of Mr. Burns in Montana, by 47 percent to 40 percent. They were tied in August polling.

Moving over

Robert Knight, who started the Culture & Family Institute at Concerned Women for America (CWA) in 2001, will be heading the new Institute on Culture and the Media (ICM) at the Media Research Center in Alexandria, beginning today.

"ICM will study how the media portray faith and traditional values, and how skewed media coverage undermines personal responsibility," Mr. Knight says.

Mr. Knight's relationship with CWA will continue this week, when he speaks Saturday at CWA's Leadership Conference in Arlington. He also will address a CWA event in Arizona later this month.

Myth-wrecker

"While Al Gore drifts into deeper darkness on the other side of the moon, propelled by such revelations as cigarette smoking is a 'significant contributor to global warming,' Sen. James Inhofe is becoming a one-man myth-wrecking crew," Investor's Business Daily says in an editorial.

"Inhofe, a Republican from Oklahoma, took to the Senate floor two days [recently] to expose the media's role in the global warming hype. This is a man who more than three years ago called the global warming scare 'the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people' and has made a habit of tweaking the left-leaning environmental lobby," the newspaper said.

"One member of the media, Miles O'Brien of CNN, responded ... to Inhofe's criticism of the media with a piece criticizing Inhofe and challenging his arguments. If anything, it seems that O'Brien's reply simply motivated Inhofe to continue his effort to undress the media's complicity and bring light to the issue.

"We hope so. The 'science' on global warming and the media's propaganda campaign need to be picked apart.

"The assumptions made by gloomy theorists should be revealed for what they are: mere conjecture.

DOJ_NMG_0072915

"The lies and carefully crafted implications, many of them discharged like toxic pollutants by a former vice president, deserve a thorough and lasting deconstruction.

"What the public needs -- and deserves -- is a credible voice to counter the sermons from Gore, on whose behalf cigarettes were distributed in 2000 to Milwaukee homeless people who were recruited by campaign volunteers to cast absentee ballots. Inhofe could be that voice."

Book review

In a series of appearances on the talk-show circuit yesterday, White House counselor Dan Bartlett dismissed parts of Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," saying the veteran reporter had "already formulated some conclusions even before the interviewing began" for the book.

During an appearance on ABC's "This Week," Mr. Bartlett described as a "grossly misleading characterization" that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice dismissed warnings from intelligence officials about the threat of al Qaeda before the September 11 attacks.

However, Mr. Bartlett did confirm Mr. Woodward's report that White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. approached President Bush after the 2004 election and suggested he replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. However, he denied rumors Mr. Bush was seeking to replace Mr. Rumsfeld. "The president has confidence in Don Rumsfeld," Mr. Bartlett said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Testing Foreign Air Marshals (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

EGG HARBOR, N.J. -- Eighteen Chinese air marshals were recently put to the test -- the same test faced by their U.S. counterparts. They learned to subdue an armed hijacker, leap down evacuation slides and deal with a bomb found aboard a plane.

The 18 Chinese security officers were part of an international exchange program that brings foreign air marshals to the high-tech and sprawling training compound here that is used by U.S. air marshals. Beijing requested the training because the air marshals will soon be patrolling flights by Chinese carriers that are bound for the United States, authorities said.

Since July 2005, more than 100 air marshals from seven countries -- including Mexico, Poland and Japan -- have participated in the program, which lasts one to two weeks. Foreign governments finance most of the training.

U.S. officials said that the exchange program allows air marshals to study advanced techniques at the high-tech training center. It also gives them an idea of U.S. laws and use-of-force requirements when dealing with suspects.

The U.S. government will not disclose the exact number of air marshals but says it has thousands on the payroll -- up from 33 on Sept. 11, 2001. Joseph J. D'Angelillio, special agent in charge of the training center, said that other countries have rushed to put more air marshals on flights since the 2001 attacks.

"Basically, we are trying to find commonalities, to get the best practices, and get this patchwork quilt put together so we have a very even and transparent aviation security system," D'Angelillio said of the exchange program.

U.S., EU Hit Snag In Air-Data Talks (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Negotiators for the U.S. and European Union failed to reach a deal for sharing confidential airline-passenger information, setting the stage for a possible showdown over U.S. plans for greater security data-mining.

Department of Homeland Security officials said in the absence of a deal, the U.S. would use European airline-passenger information as "we deem necessary to protect the American people."

European officials fear attempts by U.S. officials to share the data with law-enforcement officials in violation of EU law could spark lawsuits and a diplomatic standoff that could ground commercial flights between Europe and the U.S.

Airlines refusing to provide passenger lists to the U.S. may lose landing rights in the country, but those that do provide the lists risk facing legal action under EU member states' data-protection legislation. European Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said attempts to resolve the deadlock would continue.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has called the sharing of passenger-name record, or PNR, data on incoming flights from the European Union a vital tool to identify possible terrorists before they reach the U.S. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the U.S. demanded that all airlines provide passenger data -- including information such as credit-card numbers, travel itineraries, addresses and telephone numbers -- for all inbound flights. But a subsequent U.S.-EU agreement was ruled illegal by the highest European court in May, giving the EU until midnight this past Saturday to reach a new arrangement.

A total of 34 pieces of information about each individual passenger must be transferred to American authorities within 15 minutes of a flight's departure to the U.S. under the lapsed agreement.

Some airlines have more than 60 pieces of information about passengers, to which U.S. officials have sought access.

According to U.S. and European officials close to the talks, a deal was almost finalized Saturday when Mr. Chertoff introduced new demands and the Europeans balked. Officials provided no details about those demands, but Mr. Chertoff has said publicly on many occasions that Homeland Security wants to share European PNR information with investigators from other U.S. law-enforcement agencies as well as with U.S. allies. Under European law and the lapsed EU deal, however, the department can't share the data beyond U.S. Customs and Border Protection, which checks the data against U.S. terrorist watch lists.

After the EU negotiators left Washington, Mr. Chertoff spoke several times with Franco Frattini, the European commissioner for justice, freedom and security, and a Homeland Security spokesman said the two were "confident" an agreement could be reached soon. Mr. Chertoff then sent what he called a draft agreement to EU representatives that he initialed for "final ratification."

EU officials called the move a "diplomatic ploy." "Chertoff is attempting to create a unilateral agreement where there is none," said one EU official.

Homeland Security officials denied the charge, saying it was an attempt by Mr. Chertoff to present European ministers with a document the U.S. was prepared to sign. The EU's interior and justice ministers are due to take up the issue Thursday.

Australian Suspect At Gitmo To Be Tried (AP)

By Rod Mcguirk

AP, October 2, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia -- The only Australian held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, will be among the first terror suspects tried by the overhauled U.S. military commission system within months, Australia's attorney general said Sunday.

With domestic pressure mounting on the center-right government over how long alleged Taliban fighter David Hicks has spent at the U.S. naval base in Cuba, Attorney General Philip Ruddock met with his U.S. counterpart Alberto Gonzales last week to press for a speedy resolution. He returned home Sunday.

"It ought to be a matter that can be dealt with quickly. We've said it should be dealt with quickly and they've said to us it will be among the first cases to be heard," Ruddock told Australian Broadcasting Corp. television.

"They don't think it will be within weeks _ obviously the process of regulations, choosing those who will serve on the commissions will take perhaps even some months _ but they're very conscious of our view that this needs to happen very expeditiously," he said.

Hicks, a 31-year-old former kangaroo skinner, was arrested by the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan in December 2001 and was later charged with attempted murder, conspiracy to commit war crimes and aiding the enemy.

Congress last week approved legislation that addressed a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that the commissions were illegal. But regulations have yet to be put in place and new charges would need to be drafted, Ruddock aid.

The legislation Congress sent President Bush Friday endorses his plan to interrogate and prosecute terror suspects and sets the rules for court proceedings. It would only apply to those selected by the military for prosecution and leaves mostly unaffected the majority of the 14,000 prisoners in U.S. custody, most of whom are in Iraq.

The Pentagon had previously selected 10 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay prison to be tried and Bush is expected also to try some or all of the 14 suspects held by the CIA in secret prisons and recently transferred to military custody at Guantanamo.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

5 Years After Anthrax Attacks, Investigators Still Have No Answers (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 2, 2006

When Bob Stevens, a photo editor in Boca Raton, died of anthrax poisoning five years ago, he became the first U.S. casualty in a new era of bioterrorism threats.

In the days and weeks to follow, four others who contracted anthrax from tainted mail died -- two postal workers in Washington, D.C., a New York City hospital stockroom employee and an elderly Connecticut woman. At least 17 others fell ill but survived during that uneasy autumn after the 9-11 attacks.

Whoever devised the deadly letters slipped back underground -- there have been no anthrax mailings since. The unknown attacker transformed the American consciousness, in part because a potential biological attack seemed remote, until it became a reality.

Hoax letters once tossed in the trash without a thought now merit a full hazardous materials response. Biodefense is a government priority, with billions of dollars dedicated to it. Even as some experts say anthrax would be the easiest biological weapon for terrorists to deploy, others say the threat is low because of the difficulty in obtaining, producing and effectively dispersing it.

What disturbs some bioterrorism experts is the lack of positive signs the FBI will ever solve the mystery.

"Every year that passes, the probability of solving it becomes less and less," said Bill Patrick, a former military anthrax researcher. "It's been five years now. I don't see a solution forthcoming."

That uncertainty hangs over Maureen Stevens, who lost her husband of 27 years. Bob Stevens, 63, fell ill and was hospitalized on Oct. 2, 2001. He died three days later, and Maureen Stevens has no more answers today than she did then.

"I just want to know how it could happen, as much as how it happened, how easy it was for someone to do this," she said recently. "I would really like to know how they did it, why they did it, and what they hoped to achieve."

Though the investigation appears stalled, the FBI says the "Amerithrax" investigation remains a priority, with 17 agents and 10 postal inspectors assigned to the case.

"Despite the frustrations that come with any complex investigation, no one in the FBI has, for a moment, stopped thinking about the innocent victims of these attacks, nor has the effort to solve this case in any way been slowed," Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director of the FBI's Washington Field Office, said in a recent statement.

The FBI initially focused on scientists who worked within U.S. biodefense programs with access to government strains of Ames anthrax and sophisticated labs.

It now appears the person or group behind the attacks didn't require highly specialized scientific training to manufacture the anthrax, potentially opening up a much larger pool of suspects. Some experts previously characterized the anthrax as "weaponized" to make its spores smaller, lighter and more deadly.

An FBI scientist, Douglas Beecher, recently published an article in Applied and Environmental Microbiology saying the spores didn't get special coatings to make the anthrax disperse more effectively.

"A widely circulated misconception is that the spores were produced using additives and sophisticated engineering supposedly akin to military weapon production," Beecher wrote in the journal's August issue.

The FBI's first public comment on the nature of the anthrax is drawing attention from a scientific community that at times has been divided on how technologically accomplished the attacks were.

Patrick says the perpetrator knew his business, at least to the degree that an effective, deadly spore was produced.

"It was good material, not weapons grade -- highly concentrated and small particles," he said. "I don't think it's something you can go into your basement laboratory to do."

The first batch of letters went to media outlets -- the three major television networks and the New York Post in New York City, and to tabloid publisher American Media Inc. in Boca Raton, which publishes the Star and National Enquirer, and where Bob Stevens was a photo editor at the now defunct The Sun.

That anthrax was not as refined as the spores in two letters postmarked Oct. 9 and sent to U.S. Sens. Tom Daschle and Patrick Leahy. The Senate letters had higher concentrations of anthrax -- experts think the perpetrator got better at producing the spores. The FBI's Beecher wrote that even microbes left in a cruder state than weaponized spores can be dangerous.

"You can use fairly simple methods to make a fairly sophisticated powder," said David Siegrist, a bioterrorism expert at the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies in Virginia. "I think everybody believes it was very sophisticated powder, but it didn't use traditional routes [of weaponization] to get there."

For a time, the FBI focused on a former biological weapons researcher, Steven Hatfill, whose apartment was searched twice in the summer of 2002. Former Attorney General John Ashcroft called him a "person of interest," but no charges were filed. Hatfill is now suing the government.

The anthrax mailings radically changed some government priorities, increasing biodefense spending from roughly $150 million in the late 1990s to an estimated $7.5 billion last year, according to one study.

The increased biodefense spending is being used to study the threat, the biological agents that could be used and the best ways to respond to an attack. Almost $1 billion is earmarked for a new anthrax vaccine and an antitoxin, and an older vaccine and antibiotics are being stockpiled. Shipments of the new vaccine were to start this fall, but problems have pushed back delivery until at least 2008.

The first-responders to any biological threat -- the police, paramedics and firefighters -- now receive more specialized training specifically for such an event. Training is coordinated between local, state and federal agencies.

"The resources are in place for the state. South Florida in particular has the largest number of hazardous material technicians in the state," said Mike Jachles, a spokesman for Broward County Fire-Rescue.

Palm Beach County Fire-Rescue Capt. Don DeLucia says not every contingency can be anticipated.

"A large event is going to be difficult to manage no matter how much you prepare for it. You cannot possibly prepare 100 percent for everything."

But there are some bioterrorism specialists who think the threat is overblown.

Milton Leitenberg, a senior research scholar at the University of Maryland's Center for International and Security Studies, says government officials and others are deliberately exaggerating the biological threat, even though no terror organizations have demonstrated the ability to carry out such attacks. He has been critical of the $7 billion yearly biodefense budget. "I don't believe there is any great threat," he said.

While progress has been made in preparing the nation for a biological attack, many experts say the country still is not ready for a small-scale attack, let alone an effective release of biological agents in an urban center.

"What we saw in 2001 was a minuscule attack with anthrax. A large attack would involve tens or hundreds of thousands of people," said Dr. Eric Toner, a senior associate with the University of Pittsburgh's Center for Biosecurity who specializes in medical emergency preparedness. "We have accomplished a lot in five years, but we have lot more to be done. I'm not satisfied that if we had an attack today we would be able to respond effectively."

DHS Reviews Claims Of Contract Conflicts (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The Homeland Security Department is reviewing whether managers with ties to Oak Ridge National Laboratory improperly influenced the decision to give $20 million to the laboratory since 2004 to help develop a list of the nation's top potential terrorist targets, according to DHS officials.

Officials are examining the roles played by two former Energy Department employees who were working for DHS as well as an Idaho National Laboratory employee who was on assignment to the department, said Undersecretary for Preparedness George W. Foresman.

Among Homeland Security's concerns is whether the men's relationships with the Energy Department inappropriately influenced funding decisions. There is little in the way of records to show how funding decisions were made, officials said.

The national labs are owned by the Energy Department and independently managed.

One of the staffers has been reassigned, nearly $40 million more destined for the lab has been placed on hold, and a team was sent Sept. 15 to Oak Ridge, Tenn., to scrutinize its work and determine whether to refocus its efforts, department officials said.

Foresman said the department is acting in an abundance of caution because of recent complaints by Congress and watchdog groups about potential conflicts of interest among DHS contractors awarding research to their home institutions. In June, the DHS inspector general issued a sharply critical review of the target list program.

"There is no indication of any type of misconduct, but this is very much about making sure in the context of everything that we're doing we reflect the highest ethical standards," Foresman said.

The department created the target list, formally known as the National Asset Database, in 2003 and named Oak Ridge to host it, with little or no paperwork. A Congressional Research Service report this month warned that the 77,000-item list remains incomplete and is of limited value.

The scrutiny comes during infighting over poor financial management and budget cuts at Homeland Security's infrastructure protection office, which oversees the database, and which Secretary Michael Chertoff recently reorganized. The unit has been criticized for being slow to complete priorities such as securing chemical plants, helping first responders prevent bomb attacks and finalizing industry plans to protect vital facilities.

At least twice in the past nine months, critics have warned of potential ethical lapses in how DHS awards research grants. Congressional auditors reported in December that such grants lacked adequate documentation and could pose conflicts of interest.

Short of staff after its troubled 2003 launch, DHS placed employees loaned by the national laboratories in charge of five of 16 research programs. Auditors found that in 2004, 23 percent of DHS's $761 million science and technology directorate's research budget went to national laboratories.

James F. McDonnell, former head of the DHS risk management division and one of the former Energy Department employees under scrutiny, said the actions he and others took "were perfectly appropriate."

The department faced an urgent need to identify targets and lacked the computer capacity to do the job, said McDonnell, a career officer in the Navy and now a senior fellow at George Washington University's Homeland Security Policy Institute. McDonnell said he approached Oak Ridge National Laboratory and asked "if they would take it on and we would fund them to do it, and they said, 'Sure.' "

DHS can award work to national labs as if they are part of the department, skipping formal contracting requirements, McDonnell said, and the lab produced high-quality classified work. But private vendors have long wanted a bigger share of federal research, Foresman said.

Frank H. Akers Jr., a retired Army brigadier general and Oak Ridge associate lab director for national security, said, "We have followed federal guidelines for securing these work contracts."

The shuffle comes amid tension at the department's infrastructure protection and information system's unit, headed by Assistant Secretary Robert B. Stephan since April 2005 and placed under Foresman last fall.

The Homeland Security inspector general in June castigated the division's slow progress at identifying critical facilities and producing a national plan to secure them despite two presidential security directives since 1998. The database has grown from 160 items in 2003 to nearly 80,000 today, but it contains such entries as petting zoos and popcorn stands, doughnut shops, small-town parades and rural bean festivals. DHS officials said the list is only a reference source for a more selective list of 600 critical assets.

WAR NEWS:

White House Aides Take To Talk Shows To Dispute Book (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The White House intensified efforts yesterday to limit the political damage caused by a new book portraying the Bush administration as divided to the point of dysfunction over the war in Iraq, as top officials took to network talk shows to rebut the book's suggestion that President Bush has misled the nation about how dire the situation is there.

Counselor Dan Bartlett, a top aide to Bush, said that despite assertions in "State of Denial," by Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward, the president has been forthright with the public about the challenges in Iraq.

"What's interesting about this book is that he doesn't connect his own dots," Bartlett said of Woodward on ABC's "This Week." In fact, "he references throughout the book time after time after time where the president was being presented with the bad information, was pushing the internal process to make sure we were adapting to the enemy, and he was sharing this news with the American people."

Bartlett appeared on three network news shows as part of a larger administration effort to push back against criticism being generated by the book, which draws a portrait of Bush growing increasingly isolated in his determination to stay the course in Iraq while his inner circle rejects recommendations to change direction.

Five weeks before the Nov. 7 midterm elections, and days after the disclosure of a National Intelligence Estimate that concluded that the Iraq war has increased the global terrorism movement, Democrats have seized on the book's disclosures to underscore their position that the administration has clung to its strategy regardless of the facts it faces.

"I think there's an evidence-free zone in the White House and the top levels of the Pentagon," Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, said on "Fox News Sunday."

The White House has issued long news releases disputing assertions made in the book, while current and former White House aides have taken to the airwaves to dispute or play down the significance of incidents reported in the book.

Bartlett took issue with the book's assertion that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was then national security adviser, failed to take action after then-CIA Director George J. Tenet warned her, during a meeting on July 10, 2001, of intelligence pointing toward an impending al-Qaeda attack. The book reports that Tenet and his counterterrorism chief, J. Cofer Black, left the meeting feeling brushed off.

The previously undisclosed meeting was not mentioned to members of the Sept. 11 commission, who did an exhaustive investigation of the events leading up to the deadliest terrorist attack in the nation's history. The White House acknowledges that the meeting occurred but disputes the book's depiction of it.

"I spoke to [Secretary Rice] this morning," Bartlett said. "She believes that this is a very grossly misaccurate characterization of the meeting they had."

Speaking on Fox News, former chief of staff Andrew H. Card Jr., who is reported in the book to have suggested twice that Bush fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, acknowledged that he sat for long interviews with Woodward "more than a handful of times." He did not dispute that he recommended Rumsfeld's removal, although he added, "I did not start a campaign."

Card added that it is an "overstatement" to say that first lady Laura Bush joined any effort to oust Rumsfeld. The first lady's office has denied the assertion.

Bartlett added that Rice proposed a turnover of Bush's national security team before his second term began, but that the president decided against making wholesale changes.

The book depicts Rumsfeld as a difficult and alienating figure. At one point, he would not return Rice's phone calls, Woodward reports, an assertion that White House spokesman Tony Snow said Rice dismissed as "ridiculous."

Asked whether things were truly that bad, Card said on Fox: "Well, I would not describe that as bad. We are all human beings. There are Type A personalities running around in this government, and that's good. And sometimes a chief of staff or somebody else has to help bring people together to provide counsel to the president."

Despite the controversy that follows him, Rumsfeld continues to have the backing of Bush. "The president has full confidence in Secretary Rumsfeld," Bartlett said. He "is doing an enormously difficult job fighting a war. . . . We recognize he has his critics."

Traveling in Nicaragua yesterday, Rumsfeld said that he is not considering resigning and that the president had called him personally in recent days to express his continued support, the Associated Press reported.

White House Accuses Reporter Bob Woodward Of Bias (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - The White House on Sunday attacked investigative journalist Bob Woodward, accusing the reporter of pursuing an agenda in researching his new book "State of Denial," which portrays the Bush administration in an unflattering way.

Appearing on the ABC news program "This Week with George Stephanopoulos," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Woodward had "already formulated some conclusions even before the interviewing began" with current and former top administration officials.

Excerpts from the book were published Sunday in The Washington Post, where Woodward is an assistant managing editor. They included allegations that President Bush gave rosy public reports about Iraq despite intelligence reports that expressed concern about the rise of the insurgency and the ability of the United States to bring stability. The book also alleged that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was warned about Osama bin Laden just months before the Sept. 11 terror attacks.

Two earlier Woodward books, "Bush at War" and "Plan of Attack," were widely considered sympathetic to the White House. But Woodward's third book on Bush's conduct of the war on terror alleges that the president and his team deliberately mislead the public about the on-the-ground reality in Iraq.

On Friday, White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the book as cotton candy, suggesting it was light and just repeated old news and views. Sunday, Bartlett took a decidedly more hostile tone, cautioning, "I'm not going to use the word agenda," but then suggesting just that.

Bartlett, special counselor to the president, complained that Woodward wouldn't listen to what he was being told during interviews with administration officials, noting that "their points weren't getting across."

The White House aide also challenged the veracity of one of the book's most controversial assertions. Woodward reported that former CIA Director George Tenet and Cofer Black, the State Department's former anti-terrorism chief, went to Rice on July 10, 2001, in an unscheduled meeting, with intelligence that showed that bin Laden planned to attack the United States.

At the time, Rice was the president's national security adviser. Woodward reports that she gave the two intelligence leaders a brush-off.

Rice, said Bartlett, "believes this is a grossly misleading characterization of the meeting," adding that such a forceful appeal "in her mind didn't happen."

In recent weeks President Clinton, angered by Republican suggestions that he didn't do enough to thwart bin Laden, accused the Bush administration of doing nothing during eight months in office to prevent the terror attacks on New York and Washington.

Bartlett confirmed Woodward's assertions that former chief of staff Andy Card went to the president after re-election and suggested he replace the unpopular defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld. And, he confirmed more recent news reports that others are urging Bush to fire Rumsfeld. Critics accuse Rumsfeld of using too few troops and bungling the post-war period in Iraq.

"The president has confidence in Don Rumsfeld," said Bartlett, during another Sunday morning interview on the CBS program "Face the Nation."

White House On Defensive Over Book's Revelations On Iraq (AFP-Y)

By Claire Gallen

AFP, October 2, 2006

An explosive new book by star journalist Bob Woodward alleging President George W. Bush hid the truth of the deteriorating Iraq situation has rocked the White House just five weeks before key US congressional elections.

Woodward's "State of Denial" says Bush told Congress and the public that US efforts to establish a democratic government in Iraq were progressing steadily, even as internal White House reports detailed a growing threat of civil war.

It also says that Bush rejected pressure from White House officials to sack Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on the grounds that his policies were contributing to the worsening security situation in Iraq.

"There was a vast difference between what the White House and Pentagon knew about the situation in Iraq and what they were saying publicly," Woodward said Sunday in a Washington Post article adapted from the book.

"In memos, reports and internal debates, high-level officials of the Bush administration have voiced their concern about the United States' ability to bring peace and stability to Iraq since early in the occupation," he said.

The book's official release is Monday, but details were reported by US media days earlier from leaked copies. More excerpts were published Sunday by the Washington Post, where Woodward works, and Newsweek magazine.

The book threatened to damage efforts by Bush's Republican Party to maintain control of the Congress in November elections, in which the ongoing US occupation of Iraq is an important issue.

On Sunday, White House counselor Dan Bartlett insisted Bush had been candid about the war.

"I know the president has been very blunt with the American people about the challenges we face in Iraq. We've given that information," he told CBS television.

And on Friday, White House spokesman Tony Snow insisted that "Nobody's tried to mislead anyone about (Iraq)," in response to the charges by Woodward, whose reporting on the early 1970s Watergate scandal helped force the resignation of president Richard Nixon.

Citing interviews with top officials and internal documents, "State of Denial" portrays Rumsfeld as running rough-shod over the advice of the country's top generals and ignoring advice against US policies since seen as contributing to instability in the country.

Rumsfeld said Sunday that Bush had given him his personal support and that he will not resign despite the new wave of criticism set off by the book.

"No, no, no," Rumsfeld said on a trip to Nicaragua when asked if he had considered resigning. "How many times do I have to answer?"

The Woodward book also shows that some senior government advisors were unwilling to argue over US policies with Bush in White House meetings, viewing Bush as not open to advice contrary to existing policies.

In one episode recounted by Woodward, Rumsfeld flatly rejected pleas by Jay Garner, the first US administrator in Iraq following the March 2003 invasion, to reverse "tragic" decisions to disband Iraq's military and to ban members of the former ruling Baath party from government service.

That rebuff left Garner too timid to raise the same points in a meeting with Bush.

"In my thinking, the door's closed," Garner later told Woodward, who noted the decisions left hundreds of thousands of unemployed, armed Iraqis to join the insurgency.

After Condoleezza Rice became secretary of state in January 2005, her personal emissary reported that Iraq "remains a failed state" beset by violence and that Washington had no comprehensive, articulated policy for it.

Yet, Woodward shows, the White House steadfastly maintained publicly that the United States was progressing toward defeating the insurgents.

He contrasts positive public remarks by Bush over the past three years with concurrent, candid secret reports and memos in the White House that showed the Iraq situation worsening.

For instance, on November 11, 2003, Bush said in a speech that the United States was "not only containing the terrorist threat, we are turning it back."

On the same day, a senior CIA official told Bush, "We are seeing the establishment of an insurgency in Iraq."

Should He Stay? (WP)

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

After President Bush won reelection in 2004, White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. got out an 8 1/2 -by-11 spiral notebook, half an inch thick, with a blue cover. He called it his "hit-by-the-bus" book -- handy in case someone in the administration suddenly had to be replaced. He had intentionally used a student notebook, something he had bought himself, so it wouldn't be considered a government document or presidential record that might someday be opened to history. It was private and personal.

A second term traditionally leads to personnel changes. The question was whether one of them would involve Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Card had to approach the issue with delicacy. Iraq was the centerpiece of everything now, and the president was clearly predisposed not to do anything that would disrupt the war effort. If Rumsfeld left, what would the impact be on overall momentum and on the morale of those who were doing the fighting? Rumsfeld had a virtual monopoly on defense contacts with the president, so there was no way the president could get independent information to answer those kinds of questions.

The champions of change at the Defense Department included Condoleezza Rice, the national security adviser who would soon be nominated to become the new secretary of state; her replacement as national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley; and Card himself.

Card had the names of 11 possible Rumsfeld replacements in his "hit-by-the-bus" book, among them Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), who had been Al Gore's vice presidential running mate in 2000 and was a staunch defender of the Iraq war, and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

But Card thought the best replacement for Rumsfeld would be James A. Baker III, who had been White House chief of staff and Treasury secretary under President Ronald Reagan, then secretary of state and chief political adviser to the president's father.

Card floated the names to Bush over the course of several weeks, all the while underscoring the advantages of change. But his focus was on Baker.

"Mr. President, this is my quiet counsel," Card said. "Put a diplomat in the Defense Department."

The president seemed genuinely intrigued.

"You don't have to rush to make a decision," Card advised.

Card spoke with Rumsfeld, who talked as if he presumed there would be no change. One of Rumsfeld's minions told Card, "Nothing will happen until the war is over."

Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser, weighed in with the president. A contentious session with Congress was coming up. As he saw it, the Democrats were in no mood for a honeymoon. With Rice's confirmation hearing to replace Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, and with the expected nomination of White House counsel Alberto R. Gonzales to be attorney general, would another Senate confirmation overload the system?

"I've got Powell going. I'm going to have to replace Condi," the president told Rove. "Do I have to have some continuity in all of this?" And, clearly, the conduct of the war in Iraq would be the subject of confirmation hearings for anyone Bush nominated to be the new secretary of defense.

Rove agreed they did not want to do anything that would prompt hearings on the war.

"If we need to do it, we need to do it. But if we don't need to do it, you know," Bush said, deciding nothing but sounding reluctant to make a change.

With Card's knowledge and encouragement, Michael Gerson, the chief White House speechwriter, also lobbied the president. Gerson said he believed that Rumsfeld should be replaced, as a symbol of change. The president should talk to Lieberman about taking over for Rumsfeld, Gerson recommended. What better symbol of change could there be than to bring in Gore's running mate?

Knowing how important loyalty was to Bush, he said, "Mr. President, it's not disloyal to have someone in for four years, four and a half years, in a job like this, and then for a variety of reasons, many of them not of his own doing, okay, to say that it would be advantageous to have a change."

Interesting idea, Bush said.

Card kept pushing, at one point raising the possibility of change at the Pentagon with Vice President Cheney.

No, Cheney said, he was predisposed to recommend that the president keep Rumsfeld right where he was. Card was not surprised.

In private conversations with Bush, Cheney said Rumsfeld's departure, no matter how it might be spun, would be seen only as an expression of doubt and hesitation on the war. It would give the war critics great heart and momentum, he confided to an aide, and soon they would be after him and then the president. He virtually insisted that Rumsfeld stay.

DOJ_NMG_0072923

In mid-December 2004, the president made his final decision. Rumsfeld would stay, he indicated to Cheney and Card. He couldn't change Rumsfeld.

"That didn't mean he didn't want to," Card later said.

Earlier this year, I asked Rumsfeld whether there was ever a moment when Bush asked him to stay.

"I don't recall that there was," he said. But on the other hand, he added laughing, "I'm quite confident there was never a moment where he said, 'I want you to leave.' "

Doubts From the Start

Cheney had suggested Rumsfeld to Bush in late December 2000. Rumsfeld was so impressive, Bush told Card at the time. He had had the job in the Ford administration a quarter-century before, and it was as if he were now saying, "I think I've got some things I'd like to finish."

But there was another dynamic that Bush and Card discussed. Rumsfeld and Bush's father, the former president, couldn't stand each other. Bush senior didn't trust Rumsfeld and thought he was arrogant, self-important, too sure of himself and Machiavellian. Rumsfeld had also made nasty private remarks that the elder Bush was a lightweight.

Card could see that overcoming the former president's skepticism about Rumsfeld added to the president-elect's excitement. It was a chance to prove his father wrong. And Rumsfeld fit Cheney's model of a defense secretary who could not only battle things out with the generals but who also had as much gravitas as the rest of the new national security team.

Bush would nominate Rumsfeld, he told Card. Cheney had been selected for his national security credentials. He was the expert, and this was the sort of decision that required expertise. Still, Bush wondered privately to Card about pitfalls, if there was something he didn't see here. After all, his father had strong feelings.

Is this a trapdoor? he asked.Disdain for the Process

During the long run-up to the war, Rumsfeld made little attempt to disguise his disdain for what was called "the interagency process" -- coordinating policy with the State Department under Powell and the National Security Council under Rice.

By the start of 2003, Frank Miller, the NSC's senior director for defense, who was coordinating the Iraq issue among the different federal agencies, felt that Rumsfeld had made his job almost impossible.

There was constant tension between the NSC and Rumsfeld's Pentagon, and Rumsfeld went to extra lengths to keep control of information. Often, when Rumsfeld came to the White House with Gen. Tommy R. Franks to brief the president, the NSC and some of the staff on the Iraq invasion plans, he would see that the slides and handouts were distributed just before the meeting and taken back immediately after.

Sometimes there would be a handout for the president with 140 pages, and the lesser beings like Miller would only be allowed to see 40 of them. On one occasion, Rumsfeld came to a meeting without enough briefing packets for all the principals, so Rice wound up looking on with the person next to her.

Sometimes, Rumsfeld would point across the room in the middle of a briefing. "People shouldn't be taking notes," he scolded. "People should not be taking notes in here."

When the generals came over to the White House with him, Rumsfeld spoke first, introducing everyone and explaining what they were going to talk about. It was worse for Gen. Richard B. Myers, then the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Miller and Myers were longtime friends, and Miller could see that Myers was suffering.

At times Rumsfeld would not return Rice's phone calls when she had questions about war planning or troop deployments. She complained to Rumsfeld, who reminded her that the chain of command did not include the national security adviser.

Rice complained to the president.

Bush's response was to try to be playful with Rumsfeld.

"I know you won't talk to Condi," Bush once teased Rumsfeld, "but you've got to talk to her."

At the Pentagon, Rumsfeld built a "kitchen cabinet" of special assistants and consultants within the Office of the Secretary of Defense. It grew into a fortress of old friends and retired military officers.

Perhaps the most important of these was Stephen Herbits, a lawyer and longtime Rumsfeld friend going back to 1967. Herbits had been one of Rumsfeld's civilian special assistants during his first Pentagon tour. Rumsfeld made him a consultant with a license to analyze current problems, and he functioned as a management fix-it man, somewhat as Karl Rove did for Bush.

Herbits, who was also a gay rights activist and occasional contributor to Democratic candidates -- and thus highly unusual among Republican defense experts -- was known for his incisive, provocative, slashing dissections of personnel and institutions. Rumsfeld appreciated his style and skill at cutting through the normal fog of Pentagon paperwork and lowest-common-denominator analysis.

On December 5, 2002, in the middle of the most intense invasion planning for Iraq, Herbits walked into Rumsfeld's office.

"You're not going to be happy with what I'm going to tell you," he said, "but you are in the unique position of being the sole person who could lose the president's reelection for him if you don't get something straightened out."

Rumsfeld flushed.

Herbits continued. "Now that I've got your attention, you have got to focus on the post-Iraq planning. It is so screwed up. We will not be able to win the peace."

Herbits warned Rumsfeld that policy Undersecretary Douglas J. Feith was screwing up. The fighting between the State and Defense departments was so bad that interagency meetings were at times little more than shouting matches. Postwar planning was so fiercely off track that it required the secretary's personal intervention.

Rumsfeld didn't say much but soon called a surprise Saturday meeting with Feith and others involved.

"What's going on here?" he asked. "We've got to get this on track."

It later became clear that one of the root causes for troubles in postwar Iraq was the lack of security, and that that was the result of the chronic shortage of troops faced by U.S. commanders.

The record showed that the plan for invading Iraq had a top number of 275,000 ground combat troops, including about 90,000 who were scheduled to flow into Iraq in the weeks and months after March 19, 2003, when the war began.

Earlier this year, I asked Rumsfeld about the troop levels.

He said it is one of the great "canards" that he had decided or unduly influenced the decision to not bring in the 90,000. It was all on Franks's recommendation, he said. "He made a judgment that he had what he needed, or would have as this played out, and that he would not need the additional ones that were in the queue. . . . And he made that recommendation and I made the recommendation to the president, and we agreed with it." So the 90,000 additional ground troops were not sent for the war or stabilization.

The critics -- or the "opiners," as Rumsfeld called them, "the people who don't have responsibility for making the decisions" -- don't understand, he said. "Many of them say, 'Oh, it's Rumsfeld,' as though I'm sitting around with a black box figuring all this out. And anyone who knows me or watched me do anything knows that I don't do it that way. I come here to this job knowing that there's no one smart enough to do this job." So he relied on "smart people," he said, and on "advice from multiple sources."

But half a dozen of the generals and civilians who worked most closely with Rumsfeld made it clear in interviews that it was Rumsfeld who was making the decisions.

By this summer, Rumsfeld had softened his position on the issue of whether there were enough troops.

"It's entirely possible there were too many at some point and too few at some point, because no one's perfect," he said in another interview. "All of us that were trying our best to make these judgments were doing it in a context of concern about having enough to get the job done, and enable a process, political and economic process, to go forward, and not so many that it persuaded people that we were there to steal their oil and occupy their country and disrupt and cause disturbances in the neighboring countries that cause the overthrow of some of those other regimes. And so we made the best judgment we could.

"In retrospect I have not seen or heard anything from the other opiners that suggests to me that they have any reason to believe that they were right and we were wrong. Nor can I prove we were right and they were wrong. The only thing I can say is they seem to have a lot more certainty than my assessment of the facts would permit me to have."

One of the harshest critics of what happened in Iraq as the security situation deteriorated and the insurgency intensified was Rumsfeld's own aide, Herbits.

On July 15, 2004, Herbits sat down at his computer and wrote another memo, a scathing seven-page report titled "Summary of Post-Iraq Planning and Execution Problems." Though he discussed the postwar planning and policies, and the tenure of L. Paul Bremer III as head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, his real target was his friend of 37 years. The memo listed a series of tough questions:

Â· "Who made the decision and why didn't we reconstitute the Iraqi army?"

Â· "Did no one realize we were going to need Iraqi security forces?"

Â· "Did no one anticipate the importance of stabilization and how best to achieve it?"

Â· "Why was the de-Baathification so wide and deep?"

"Rumsfeld's style of operation," Herbits wrote, was the "Haldeman model, arrogant" -- a reference to President Richard M. Nixon's White House chief of staff, H.R. "Bob" Haldeman.

"Indecisive, contrary to popular image," Herbits wrote of Rumsfeld. "Would not accept that some people in some areas were smarter than he. . . . Trusts very few people. Very, very cautious. Rubber glove syndrome -- a tendency not to leave his fingerprints on decisions."

Herbits reached his crescendo: "Did Rumsfeld err with the fundamental political calculation of this administration: not getting the post-Iraq rebuilding process right within 18 months?"A Worried General

Rumsfeld's relationship with his own generals only worsened.

DOJ_NMG_0072925

In the summer of 2005, Marine Corps Gen. James L. Jones, the NATO commander, paid a call on his old friend Gen. Peter Pace, then the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs. It was virtually certain that Pace was going to move up to replace Myers as chairman, the top position in the American military.

Jones expressed concern that Pace would even want to be chairman. "You're going to face a debacle and be part of the debacle in Iraq," he said. U.S. prestige was at a 50- or 75-year low in the world. He said he was so worried about Iraq and the way Rumsfeld ran things that he wondered if he himself should not resign in protest. "How do you have the stomach for eight years in the Pentagon?" he finally asked.

Pace said that someone had to be chairman. Who else would do it?

Jones did not have an answer. "Military advice is being influenced on a political level," he said. The Joint Chiefs had improperly "surrendered" to Rumsfeld. "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder."

Pace became chairman, and later flatly denied that Jones had told him that Iraq was a debacle. "He's a good friend. He was in my wedding," Pace said, noting they had known each other for 36 years. "If Jim felt that way he would tell me."

I called Jones at NATO headquarters in Belgium. He said that he had made all those comments to Pace in their meeting in 2005. "That's what I told him," he said.The First Lady's Concerns

Every six weeks or so, Card tried to have a private, candid session with first lady Laura Bush to hear her concerns.

The first lady was worried that Rumsfeld was hurting her husband, and her perspective seemed to reflect Rice's concern about Rumsfeld's overbearing style and tendency to dominate. Card knew that the first lady and Rice often took long walks together on the Camp David weekends.

"I agree with you," Card said. On one level he was trying to educate and explain, but he was also lobbying. So he outlined his problems with Rumsfeld and said he believed it was time for a change.

"Well, does the president know about that?" she asked. Was Card being candid with her husband?

Card said he was. "That's why I'm arguing." He said, however, that so far his advice on the Rumsfeld situation had been considered and rejected.

"He's happy with this," the first lady said, "but I'm not." Another time she said, "I don't know why he's not upset with this."

Card's relationship with Rumsfeld was always difficult. Last year, in the days after Hurricane Katrina hit New Orleans with devastating effect, Bush decided more troops were needed and asked Card to relay the message to Rumsfeld.

"You know I don't report to you," Rumsfeld said.

"I know you don't report to me," Card replied. "You report to the president. But believe me, he would like you to do this."

"I'm not going to do it unless the president tells me," Rumsfeld told the chief of staff. Too many strains and obligations were being placed on the National Guard.

Card protested that he had just talked to the president, who had made an absolute decision.

"Then he's going to have to tell me," Rumsfeld said.

"Hey," the president said to Card later. "Rumsfeld called me up. I thought you were going to handle that."One More Try

After Thanksgiving 2005, Card made another concentrated effort to get the president to replace Rumsfeld. He didn't want the president to have blinders on. Many Republican and Democratic leaders were telling Card privately that they just could not deal with the secretary of defense. He was arrogant and unresponsive.

Card was also hearing from members of the old foreign policy establishment connected to the president's father -- the Gray Beards, he called them -- who were complaining more and more.

"Who's going to do the job?" the president asked Card.

Card again mentioned Baker.

"How do we get Roger Clemens back into the game?" Card asked, comparing Baker to one of the all-time great pitchers, who had retired from baseball only to come back for another year with his hometown team. "He can still pitch," Card said about Baker.

Bush reminded him that they were at war. Rumsfeld was transforming the military, hadn't been insubordinate and needed to get the new Pentagon budget approved. Replacing him would be disruptive to the upcoming Iraqi election on Dec. 15.

"Interesting," the president said nonetheless. "Interesting."

But the president would not even authorize Card to send out feelers or to enter into any discussion with Baker. Rumsfeld would stay.

Rumsfeld Says He Won't Resign (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072926

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, coming under renewed fire for his management of the Iraq war, said Sunday he is not considering resigning and said the president had called him personally in recent days to express his continued support.

Speaking to reporters en route to Nicaragua for a meeting of defense ministers, Rumsfeld said he was not surprised by reports in a new book that White House staff had encouraged President Bush to fire him after the 2004 election.

"It's the task of the chief of staff of the White House — and having been one, I know that — to raise all kinds of questions with the president and think through different ways of approaching things," Rumsfeld said. "So it wouldn't surprise me a bit if that subject had come up."

Asked by reporters if he had recently considered resigning, Rumsfeld said, "No."

In the new book "State of Denial," Washington Post assistant managing editor Bob Woodward writes that former White House chief of staff Andrew Card twice sought to persuade Bush to fire Rumsfeld.

Card on Friday did not dispute that he had talked about a Rumsfeld resignation with the president but said it was his job to discuss a wide range of possible replacements, including his own.

Rumsfeld on Sunday also denied any rift with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and said the ongoing debate doesn't detract from his work with other international leaders.

He said he had spoken to Bush since the book's contents were made public. Bush "called me personally," said Rumsfeld, to voice support.

Rumsfeld has previously acknowledged that he twice offered Bush his resignation, but it was not accepted.

The defense secretary and Bush have faced growing criticism for their handling of the Iraq war as violence there has escalated, U.S. casualties have mounted and public support for the conflict has declined. Fueling the debate in recent days was the release of a classified intelligence report that concluded that the Iraq war has helped fuel a new generation of extremists and increased the overall terrorist threat.

Just back from a five-day trip to the Balkan region, which included a NATO defense ministers meeting in Slovenia, Rumsfeld arrived in Nicaragua Sunday afternoon for two days of meetings with defense officials from more than 30 South and Central American countries.

The talks here — in one of the Western Hemisphere's poorest countries — are expected to focus on counter-narcotics and counterterrorism efforts, peacekeeping missions, humanitarian and disaster relief and the removal of land mines from the region.

The meeting of the region's defense ministers follows a tense period in which Venezuela's leaders lashed out at the U.S. and President Bush during a U.N. meeting in New York City. Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez called Bush "the devil" and slammed U.S. leaders for trying to block his country from taking a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Rumsfeld said Sunday he did not expect to meet privately with the Venezuelan defense minister, although he will see him during the regular meeting.

U.S. officials have long considered Chavez a destabilizing force in Latin America. And they have suggested that Venezuela would make the U.N. Security Council unworkable if the nation were to win its bid against U.S.-backed Guatemala for a rotating council seat.

Also of interest to U.S. leaders is the possibility that Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega, whose socialist government was a major antagonist of the United States in the 1980s, has been leading in the polls for the upcoming Nicaraguan presidential election.

Ortega led the overthrow of dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979 and fought the U.S.-backed Contra rebels as Nicaragua's president from 1985-90.

Aide: Bush Backs Rumsfeld, Disputes Book (USAT)

USA Today, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush has full confidence in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and his management of the war in Iraq, a top White House official said Sunday in responding to a critical new book.

Dan Bartlett, White House counselor, denied that Bush was misleading the American public about the level of violence against U.S. troops in Iraq, an assertion made in Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward's book, State of Denial.

Appearing Sunday on ABC's This Week, Bartlett said Bush continues to believe that Rumsfeld is “the right man to do the job that he's doing,” dismissing critics who say the administration failed to adequately plan for the war in Iraq or send enough troops.

“We recognize that he has his critics,” Bartlett said of Rumsfeld. “Some people don't like his bedside manner.”

Rumsfeld said Sunday that he will not resign and that Bush had called to offer support. He spoke to reporters on a flight to Nicaragua.

Bartlett also disputed the assertion in Woodward's book that then-White House chief of staff Andrew Card twice tried to have Rumsfeld fired, the second time with the support of first lady Laura Bush. Bartlett, on CNN's Late Edition, said Card had presented options to Bush that included replacing the secretary.

In addition, he said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "suggested to the president maybe he ought to bring in a whole new national-security team starting the second term."

"The president decided that's not the approach he wanted to take," Bartlett said.

Card told MSNBC that he discussed with Bush replacing Rumsfeld on at least two occasions but said "There was never an orchestrated campaign to remove the secretary of Defense that I was party to."

Woodward also wrote that while Bush spoke publicly of progress in Iraq, a secret intelligence report in May said the insurgency was growing.

Bartlett said Bush has been "blunt" with the U.S. public about the violence in Iraq.

Bush has consulted with Henry Kissinger, who was an architect of the Nixon administration's strategy in the Vietnam War, about Iraq, Bartlett acknowledged. But he said the former secretary of State is not "a driving influence behind the president's policy."

Aide: Bush Confident In Rumsfeld (AP-Y)

AP, October 2, 2006

President Bush has full confidence in Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld even if others dislike the Pentagon chief's "bedside manner," a top White House official said Sunday.

Bush counselor Dan Bartlett did not directly respond to questions about whether the White House has considered possible replacements for Rumsfeld, as reported in Bob Woodward's new book on the Bush administration's Iraq war policy.

Bartlett said "every Cabinet member serves at the pleasure of the president," but that Bush believes Rumsfeld is the right man to run the Pentagon.

"We recognize that he has his critics," Bartlett said on ABC's "This Week." "We recognize that he's made some very difficult decisions. Some people don't like his bedside manner. But what President Bush looks to in Secretary Rumsfeld is to bring him the type of information he needs to make the right decisions in this war."

In his book "State of Denial," Woodward writes that former White House chief of staff Andrew Card twice sought to persuade Bush to fire Rumsfeld, the second time with the support of first lady Laura Bush.

Card has rejected any suggestion that he led a campaign to dump Rumsfeld but said he did discuss with the president Rumsfeld's role in Bush's second term. Card said it was his job to discuss a wide range of possible replacements.

Rumsfeld Says Bush Affirmed His Support Amid New Criticism (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Oct. 1 — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Sunday that President Bush had called to affirm his support in the midst of an uproar over a new book raising questions about Mr. Rumsfeld's management of the war in Iraq.

The president "made some comments in a larger group, by secure video, and then he called me personally," Mr. Rumsfeld told journalists traveling with him to a meeting here of defense ministers from the Western Hemisphere.

Asked if the president had expressed his support, Mr. Rumsfeld said, "Oh, my Lord, yes."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he had no intention of resigning. And he denied that he had had a feud with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The book, "State of Denial," by Bob Woodward, describes deep divisions within the administration over American policy on Iraq, and quotes former Pentagon officials and some former military officers who describe Mr. Rumsfeld as arrogant and brusque. Mr. Woodward says that Andrew H. Card Jr., as White House chief of staff, tried on two occasions to persuade the president to name a new defense secretary.

Mr. Rumsfeld said he took the report in stride.

"It's the task of a chief of staff at the White House — and having been one, I know that — to raise all kinds of questions with the president," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "It would not surprise me a bit if that subject came up." Mr. Rumsfeld was chief of staff for President Gerald R. Ford in 1974-5.

Asked if he considered resigning as criticism of his performance increased in recent weeks, Mr. Rumsfeld said: "No, no, no, no. How many times do I have to answer?"

Asked if there had been a time when he and Ms. Rice were not talking, Mr. Rumsfeld said, “There’s nothing I can recall over the last five or six years.”

Mr. Rumsfeld said he had not read the book by Mr. Woodward, an assistant managing editor of The Washington Post. “Everybody seems to be saying that the things he said aren’t so,” Mr. Rumsfeld said. “I wouldn’t know.”

The defense secretary said he seriously doubted that the White House had withheld any data on Iraq from him or the Pentagon.

“I can’t believe any charge that data is being kept in the White House,” Mr. Rumsfeld said. “I just can’t conceive of that.” It would be “near-impossible and unhelpful,” he added.

Some Democrats in Congress have called for Mr. Rumsfeld’s resignation. They say he did not provide enough troops to prevail in Iraq and severely underestimated the strength of the insurgents who attacked American troops after the fall of Saddam Hussein.

But Mr. Rumsfeld said the criticism did not erode his ability to represent the United States in dealings with foreign officials like the defense ministers here.

“They don’t seem to pay a lot of attention to it,” Mr. Rumsfeld said.

Mr. Card has acknowledged that he and Mr. Bush had discussed the possibility that the president might replace Mr. Rumsfeld. But Mr. Card said it was in the context of larger discussions about possible personnel changes.

“It’s not inaccurate to say that we talked about Rumsfeld,” Mr. Card said in an interview on Friday, but “there was no campaign” to oust the defense secretary.

More Questions About Defense Secretary's Leadership (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe and Yochi Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- For months, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has been cast by Democrats and even some Republicans as the face of an unpopular war.

Now a new book, which paints Mr. Rumsfeld as isolated from his Bush administration colleagues and at odds with some of his generals, is providing fodder for more questions about his leadership.

The heightened focus on the defense chief -- sparked in part by publication of "State of Denial: Bush at War, Part III" by Washington Post editor Bob Woodward -- is complicating White House efforts to keep November's midterm elections from becoming a referendum on the war. Just as significantly, Mr. Rumsfeld's apparent increasing political isolation is affecting how he runs the Defense Department and oversees the war.

The criticism continued yesterday. "I don't have confidence in Don Rumsfeld. He's made major mistakes in this war," said Sen. Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican facing a tough re-election campaign. Speaking on NBC's "Meet the Press," Sen. DeWine stopped short of calling for Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation, saying that should be President Bush's decision.

Yesterday, Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters that he isn't considering resigning and that Mr. Bush telephoned him recently to express his confidence in the defense chief.

Meanwhile, senior White House officials made it clear that Mr. Bush still supported Mr. Rumsfeld. "There are a lot of armchair quarterbacks, but he's the right man," said White House counselor Dan Bartlett on CBS's "Face the Nation."

The controversy over Mr. Rumsfeld's leadership does look to be changing the way he manages the military's massive bureaucracy, forcing him to take a less-direct approach to running the department. An example of this is the Army's recent budget woes. Typically, the Secretary has played a significant role in advocating for major changes to the Pentagon budget. This year, rather than make the case himself for a bigger Army budget, Mr. Rumsfeld left it to Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker to make the case on his own and to sell it to Congress and the White House.

Gen. Schoomaker has told lawmakers that the service needed $17 billion in the fiscal year that started yesterday to repair equipment. In briefings on Capitol Hill and the White House, the service has said it needs $137 billion in fiscal 2008, a $24 billion increase over the planned budget for that year.

The shift in approach in many ways amounts to an acknowledgment by Mr. Rumsfeld of his own vulnerabilities. "If Rumsfeld comes in and asks for more money for the Army, it is evidence of bad management," said Daniel Goure, who served on Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon transition team in 2001 and now is a vice president at the Lexington Institute, a defense think tank in Washington. By allowing the Army to make its own case, the defense chief avoided additional criticism by some lawmakers of how he has handled the war. "It shows he understands his weaknesses," Mr. Goure says.

A spokesman for Mr. Rumsfeld, Eric Ruff, yesterday disputed the notion that the Secretary has changed his approach, and added that Mr. Rumsfeld has been "heavily engaged" on Capitol Hill over issues regarding the coming budget and has met repeatedly with members of Congress.

Despite his efforts to assume a lower profile, Mr. Rumsfeld still presents a political problem for the administration. Amid concerns that the war could cost Republicans control of at least one chamber of Congress next month, the White House has tried to mix acknowledgments of Iraq's continuing chaos and violence -- and some of the administration's own miscues -- with calls for staying the course there.

It is a difficult message to calibrate, and White House aides say Mr. Rumsfeld, who is arguably the most polarizing figure in the Bush cabinet, has made the task even harder.

Senior White House aides say Mr. Bush, having backed Mr. Rumsfeld for so long, is unlikely to abandon him in the run-up to next month's midterm elections. Moreover, polls suggest that firing the defense chief wouldn't do much good. In a recent Wall Street Journal/NBC poll, only 44% of respondents said Mr. Rumsfeld should resign and about 68% said his resignation would amount to little more than a symbolic gesture.

The aides say the White House has sought to reduce Mr. Rumsfeld's public role, to keep him from possibly weighing on the administration's poll numbers. That was evident in late July, when the U.S. announced a major shift in military strategy in Iraq that called for deploying thousands of additional American forces to Baghdad in an effort to secure the Iraqi capital. The announcement wasn't made by Mr. Rumsfeld. Instead, Mr. Bush disclosed the plans himself during a joint news conference with visiting Iraqi Premier Nouri al-Maliki.

Mr. Woodward's book, which states that senior White House aides tried twice to persuade Mr. Bush to fire his defense chief, complicates the Bush strategy.

In recent days, some officials in the White House and one prominent military commander have raised questions about Mr. Woodward's account. He says that on multiple occasions Gen. John Abizaid, the top military commander in the Middle East, said Mr. Rumsfeld was an ineffective leader. Gen. Abizaid denied ever making the statements attributed to him. "He has great respect for Mr. Rumsfeld and full confidence in the chain of command," said Col. Jerry Renne, his spokesman.

The book also quotes Gen. James Jones, the head of U.S. European Command, describing Iraq as a "debacle" and saying that "military advice is being influenced on a political level." Gen. Jones declined to comment.

In the Loop (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Remember that great "Mission Accomplished" banner on the aircraft carrier Abraham Lincoln on May 1, 2003, when President Bush dramatically landed there to give his speech announcing the end of "major combat operations" in Iraq?

The White House said the banner was not its doing and must have been the Navy's idea.

Now we find out, in Bob Woodward 's new book "State of Denial," that wasn't the case. None other than Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld , on the record, tells Woodward that "I took 'Mission Accomplished' out" upon reading a draft of the speech. "And I fixed it and sent it back. They fixed the speech," he said, "but not the sign."

The book also reminds us what a small town this is. On election night 2004, GOP communications guru Mary Matalin was with Bush and Vice President Cheney and talking with her husband, Democratic strategist James Carville , who was close to -- but not in -- John Kerry 's campaign.

Kerry, Carville told her, was going to challenge 250,000 provisional ballots in Ohio, which could change the result there or tie things up for a long time. Matalin promptly told Cheney, and they met with Bush. The Kerry camp made the announcement shortly thereafter.Another War, Another Book

And now, yet another must-read book on a U.S. military venture. If you think Woodward's book has good stuff, then try "The McNamara Ascendancy, 1961-1965, Volume V," just out from the Pentagon's Historical Office.

A Pentagon news release says it's a "full-length, scholarly account of the dynamic, often controversial early years of the McNamara era," as Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara marched the country into Vietnam.

Okay, maybe Woodward's is a better read.

Secrets, And The Obvious, Revealed (LA)

By Tim Rutten

Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

Bob WOODWARD'S "State of Denial" is the third volume in what aspires to be an inside history of George W. Bush's wartime presidency.

Less wishfully hagiographic than "Bush At War," less credulously detached than "Plan of Attack," this book's analysis essentially mirrors the shift in opinion on the administration's conduct of the war that has occurred in the foreign policy establishment's broad middle ground, where "reasonable" Republicans and Democrats still mingle in amiable, man-of-the-world solidarity. Still, "State of Denial" is a dogged piece of reporting — rich in anecdote, telling detail, fascinating snippets of conversation and troubling stories heretofore untold.

This is the darker Woodward — disquieting scene follows chilling bit of dialogue succeeded by secret memo. The administration he now portrays is a grimly feckless assemblage of dysfunction and division, disillusion and self-delusion. Yet for all the sensational revelations — and there are several — the overwhelming impression left at this very long book's rather wan end is that much labor has gone into establishing that, when it comes to the Bush White House and its war in Iraq, things are pretty much what they seem.

You don't really need a classified briefing to recognize a military and political quagmire. You don't require an unnamed source to tell you that something is wrong when the number of Americans killed exceeds 2,700 and the acknowledged death toll among Iraqi civilians climbs toward 60,000 — and there's no end in sight.

In an interview Sunday on CBS' "60 Minutes," Woodward went to the substantive heart of his appraisal: The president and his surrogates have consistently misled the American people and Congress about what's going on in Iraq, insisting that the situation is improving, while the insurgency continues to strengthen and violence escalates. Woodward said that the insurgents now attack U.S. forces 900 times a week, roughly once every 15 minutes. Intelligence experts he said, believe that "next year, 2007, is going to get worse and, in public, you have the president and you have the Pentagon [saying] 'Oh, no, things are going to get better.' " This is despite the fact, as the author writes in his book, that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice dispatched trusted aide Philip Zelikow to Iraq in February 2005, and he reported in a secret memo that the country already was "a failed state." Similarly, according to Woodward, generals on the ground were telling Washington that the conflict is "militarily unwinnable."

In "State of Denial," Woodward demonstrates that althoughdisinformation has been part of the administration's approach to Iraq from the start, the pace picked up — unsurprisingly — during Bush's 2004 reelection campaign. "In the days and weeks before election day, violence surged in Iraq," Woodward writes. "The classified figures showed that the number of insurgent attacks in Iraq had soared over the summer, going from 1,750 or so in June and July to more than 3,000 in August.... The violence was now 10 times worse than it had been when Bush landed on the aircraft carrier in May 2003 and declared that major combat was over. New Iraqi army and police units rolling out of training were being butchered.... Between 30% and 50% of all trained Iraqi units melted away and went home."

Last spring, Woodward writes, the U.S. military's Joint Chiefs of Staff provided another alarming secret analysis: "A graph included in the assessment measured attacks from May 2003 to May 2006. It showed some significant dips, but the current number of attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces and Iraqi authorities was as high as it had ever been — exceeding 3,500 a month. [In July the number would be over 4,500.] The assessment also included a pessimistic report on crude oil production, the delivery of electricity and political progress.

"On May 26, the Pentagon released an unclassified report to Congress, required by law, that contradicted the Joint Chiefs' secret assessment. The public report sent to Congress said the "appeal and motivation for continued violent action will begin to wane in early 2007."

"State of Denial" reports that, after Bush's reelection, then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card and former chief speechwriter Michael Gerson urged the president to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who emerges in this account as the boss from hell — petty and petulant, vindictive and territorial, arrogant and self-pitying, a micromanager who resolutely refuses to accept responsibility for his decisions. As recently as last May, according to Woodward, Rumsfeld circulated a secret memo arguing that "the charge of incompetence against the U.S. government should be easy to rebut if the American people understand the extent to which the current system of government makes competence next to impossible."

Bush, of course, decided to retain Rumsfeld — apparently at the urging of Vice President Dick Cheney — but sacked Secretary of State Colin Powell, who was replaced by the eerily devoted Rice.

She figures in one of the peripheral incidents Woodward recounts, one that we're likely to hear a great deal more about in the weeks ahead. He writes that two months before Sept. 11, Rice — then Bush's National Security Advisor — received a surprise visit from then-CIA Director George Tenet and J. Cofer Black, the state department's counterterrorism chief. They reviewed freshly collected, top-secret intelligence pointing to an impending attack by Al Qaeda. Based on the material, they "sounded the loudest warning" that Osama bin Laden's target was inside the United States. By Woodward's account, Rice listened politely, then gave them "the brushoff."

A former counsel to the 9/11 Commission, Peter Rundlet, wrote on the Huffington Post blog Sunday that Rice, Tenet and Black never mentioned this briefing during their testinmoney in public and in private, nor, he alleges, is it mentioned in any of the documents given investigators by the White House and CIA. Woodward, by contrast, writes that "Though investigators had access to all the paperwork about the meeting, Black felt there were things the commissions wanted to know about and things they didn't want to know about." Rundlet dismissed this explanation as "absurd" and wrote that "[a]t a minimum, the withholding of information about this meeting is an outrage. Very possibly, someone committed a crime."

One of the more troubling subplots running through "State of Denial" involves Prince Bandar, the long-time Saudi ambassador to the United States. By Woodward's account, when then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush decided to run for president, his worried father enlisted Bandar, an old family friend, to tutor the son on foreign policy. When Bandar arrived in Austin, the younger Bush blithely observed that while he had lots of ideas about domestic policies he didn't have a clue about foreign affairs. The Saudi took him under his wing, but he proved a trying pupil, who addressed his mentor as "asshole" and "smart aleck." (Perhaps this is how hereditary princelings affectionately address each other?) At one point, the younger Bush peevishly demanded to know why he needed "to care about North Korea." Bandar pointed out that, if he became president, he would have 35,000 American troops sitting on the DMZ.

Oh, right....

Later, with a Bush back in the White House, Bandar bullied the president into explicitly endorsing a two-state solution to the Israeli-conflict by threatening a total cutoff of Saudi support for U.S. policies. (Bush may never have played poker, but Bandar obviously has.) In another instance, the Saudi prince imperiously demanded — and, worse, obtained — two CIA officials to accompany him on a wild goose chase to Pakistan, where he hoped to kill Bin Laden. During a meeting in the Oval Office, according to Woodward, Bush personally thanked Bandar because the Saudis had flooded the world oil market and kept prices down in the run-up to the 2004 general election.

You don't have to be Michael Moore to find all this unsettling. Equally disquieting, Woodward's source for all this has to be Bandar or one of his intimates, acting at the Saudi's behest. What that suggests is that, after decades of arduously cultivating the Bush family, one of the shrewdest operators on the world stage has written off George W. Bush.

Unlike the previous books in this series, Bush and Cheney — both of whom declined to be interviewed for this volume — are remote figures in this narrative. The president informs Bandar that he prays daily and receives guidance from God and tells others that he intends to stay in Iraq, even if his supporters dwindle to his wife and dog. Cheney, meanwhile, broods obsessively on unfound weapons of mass destruction.

"State of Denial" is best read in tandem with Joan Didion's assessment of Cheney in the current issue of the New York Review of Books. With that as background, one conclusion that suggests itself is that — from the beginning — Iraq really has been about Vietnam. Cheney and Rumsfeld have been the Iraq war's principle advocates and architects. As Woodward now reveals, they've even introduced Henry Kissinger back into the equation, and he now is Bush's most frequent nongovernmental advisor on foreign policy. Cheney and Rumsfeld were bright young men headed for the top during the Nixon and Ford administrations, both of whom thought of themselves, as others did, as future presidents. Though the disaster in Southeast Asia hardly ruined them, a certain stigma has attached itself ever since.

For them, the Iraq war, the whole wrenching debate over domestic spying, the detainees and unitary executive power is all about Vietnam. Cheney, Rumsfeld and Kissinger all have been convinced for decades that the country drew all the wrong historical and governmental conclusions from Vietnam. The Reagan era intervention in Central America was a first attempt to overturn those conclusions, but it foundered on the arms-for-hostages scandal. Once George W. Bush — for a set of Freudian family issues too tedious to belabor — put himself in their clutches, he became the instrument of a Cheney/Rumsfeld/Kissinger attempt to abolish 30 years of history and their enduring resentment that their youthful exercise of power ended in failure, death and disaster.

So, here we are again.

New Facts About Iraq (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, October 9, 2006

The fiery debate over Iraq is turning absolutely sulfurous. With the November 7 congressional elections just around the corner, two new developments are stoking a surge of second-guessing about President Bush's conduct of the war and raising new concerns about how Washington can extricate itself from what most Americans now see as a deadly, baffling mess. One was last week's partial release of a secret National Intelligence Estimate that pokes big holes in Bush's rationale for the conflict by concluding that it is fueling, not curtailing, support for the global jihadist movement. The second is a new book by investigative reporter Bob Woodward asserting that the administration is putting a deliberately misleading spin on how the war is going.

All this, coupled with daily news reports of chilling new spasms of violence there, is deepening America's sour mood about the war and escalating tensions in Washington. After calling for conciliation and unity on the five-year anniversary of 9/11 less than a month ago, President Bush angrily branded Democrats the "cut and run" party last week and sparked another round of bitter recriminations. But a senior White House adviser said the situation, prompted by New York Times and Washington Post stories about the NIE, was so potentially damaging politically that "we needed to get our arms around this quickly."

Making matters worse for a president trying to sound upbeat, a new poll conducted for the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes found that a large majority of Iraqis believe the U.S. military presence there is provoking more violence than it is preventing. Most want U.S. troops out within a year, and 6 out of 10 support attacks on U.S.-led forces. Meanwhile, U.S. News has learned that the U.S. Army may ask Congress to expand its 504,000-strong force by 30,000-in large part because of the manpower strains from keeping 140,000 troops in Iraq.

"Things are not right." Even though Bush is getting a political boost from the economy (story, Page 36), the latest developments may prove to be a crystallizing moment in America's assessment of the war. Which is "the last thing the Republicans can afford," as they try to hold on to their fragile majorities in the House and Senate, says Boston University historian Julian Zelizer. What makes the furor over the Iraq intelligence assessment so important, Zelizer adds, is that it's based on an evaluation by 16 intelligence agencies, not the Democrats or other Bush critics. "It's nonpartisan analysis," Zelizer says, and it shows that "things are not right" in Iraq and that the rosy scenarios offered by Bush and his allies seem to be untethered by the facts.

As if all that weren't enough, more troubling disclosures and criticisms are contained in Woodward's book, State of Denial. Unlike the positive tone of his previous writings about Bush and his advisers, this time Woodward is highly negative and appears to be revising his own earlier assessments. He told CBS's 60 Minutes last weekend that the administration has not told the truth about the level of violence in Iraq, especially against U.S. troops, and says intelligence sources have predicted an even more violent insurgency there. Woodward writes that, last May, the intelligence division of the Pentagon's Joint Chiefs of Staff predicted an increase in violence not only this year but also in 2007. This report, Woodward writes, also painted a bleak picture of oil production, electricity generation, and the potential for political stability. But Bush, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice continued to say publicly that the war was going well and remained vital in combating terrorism. In an interview with Mike Wallace, Woodward said attacks against coalition troops occur, on average, every 15 minutes, which he says the administration has kept secret. "It's getting to the point now where there are eight, nine hundred attacks a week. ... The insurgents know what they are doing. They know the level of violence and how effective they are," Woodward wrote. "Who doesn't know? The American public."

The Woodward War (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, October 9, 2006

The White House had more than an inkling of what was coming. This was Bob Woodward's third book about the Bush administration since 9/11, and it was sure to be less friendly than the first two. In scores of interviews over many months, Woodward's questions to senior officials had been more aggressive, more hostile. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld seemed to be a particular target of the veteran Washington Post reporter, who remains, three decades after his Watergate debut, the best excavator of inside stories in the nation's capital. White House aides did recommend that the president and the vice president not grant interviews, but it was obvious that Woodward could, and would, get just about everyone else in positions of authority to talk.

When "State of Denial" arrived at the White House Friday morning, a team of aides went to work deconstructing the 576-page volume. Some of Woodward's revelations, like the scenes of Bush rejecting pleas for more troops in Iraq, the White House tried to dismiss as old news. Woodward's depictions of tensions within Bush's inner circle were played down or denied. It was not true, White House aides told reporters, that First Lady Laura Bush wanted to see Rumsfeld fired. Harder to slough off was Woodward's account of the role played by former chief of staff Andy Card. The White House made no serious attempt to refute Card's campaign to unseat Rummy. (Card himself quibbled over the word "campaign," telling reporters that the discussions about Rumsfeld's future needed to be seen in a "broader context.") Instead, White House spokesman Tony Snow took a dismissive, this-too-will-pass tone. Woodward's book is like "cotton candy," Snow said. "It kind of melts on contact."

A truer simile might be to a loud musical instrument. An orchestra of books has raised a cacophony of doubts about the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq. Coming after Bernard Trainor and Michael Gordon's "Cobra II," Tom Ricks's "Fiasco," Ron Suskind's "The One Percent Doctrine," "Hubris" by NEWSWEEK's Michael Isikoff and The Nation's David Corn, Woodward's "State of Denial" resounded among the administration's growing chorus of critics like a clash of cymbals.

With the midterm elections only five weeks away, Bush and his political minions have been striving mightily to direct the attention of voters away from Iraq and toward the threat of a terrorist attack. But Iraq keeps coming back into the headlines. Before the Woodward book began landing in stores late last week, portions of a National Intelligence Estimate began leaking out, suggesting that the war in Iraq was undermining the war on terror. The leaked portions of the NIE, a document representing a consensus of the U.S. intelligence community, disclosed the somewhat unsurprising conclusion that Iraq was turning into a training ground for terrorists. Bush responded by authorizing the declassification of other portions of the NIE, suggesting that if American forces were to quit Iraq, the problem would only grow worse. But simply "staying the course" in Iraq may not satisfy American voters who can see only darkness at the end of the tunnel.

Democrats as well as a few Republicans will renew their calls for Rumsfeld's head, but it is doubtful that Bush will dump his Defense secretary before the elections. That might be seen as a concession to the "Defeatocrats," as the GOP likes to call the opposition. (Rumsfeld himself had no comment about Woodward's book.) But a senior White House official, operating under the usual cover of anonymity, gave a less than airtight guarantee of Rumsfeld's job security. The president, normally one to rely on his inner circle, has been consulting outsiders. The official did not say which ones, but it is known that Bush speaks on occasion to Henry Kissinger and to his father's former secretary of State, James A. Baker. The counsel of the outsiders, says this official, "so far has been that Rumsfeld should stay. But I can't predict the future."

The Rumsfeld portrayed by Woodward is bullying and petty. Bush himself doesn't come off much better. The president is folksy and jocular, but incurious to the point of cluelessness. His war cabinet is deeply dysfunctional. Condoleezza Rice is almost a pathetic figure, whining to the president that she can't get Rumsfeld to return her calls.

As you read the excerpt that follows, keep in mind some essential context. The administration was not just unlucky. It was almost willfully blind to the risks entailed in invading and occupying a large, traumatized and deeply riven Arab country. Rumsfeld, who pushed aside Rice and Secretary of State Colin Powell to take over even the planning for postwar Iraq, wanted a lean and mean force to get in and get out quickly. This was all well and good as long as American forces could turn over the job of running the country to an effective group of local Iraqis. But the planning for this was hamstrung by disputes over the postwar role of Iraqi exiles. When Iraq began to unravel, the administration—with little debate—lurched in the other direction. The White House installed Paul Bremer as a kind of grand pooh-bah over all of Iraq, but Rumsfeld refused to give him the forces he needed for a long occupation.

Woodward writes that when Gen. Jay Garner, the man Bremer replaced in Baghdad, returned to Washington in June 2003, he told Rumsfeld that the United States had made "three terrible decisions." Garner told the Defense secretary that Bremer had seriously blundered by purging the bureaucracy, disbanding the Army and dismissing an interim leadership group. Rumsfeld shrugged off the concerns, according to Woodward. "I don't think there's anything we can do, because we are where we are."

There is always the risk in these instant histories that disgruntled former officials will cover their posteriors for posterity. One of Woodward's more obvious and prominent sources is former CIA director George Tenet. In "State of Denial," Tenet is deeply ambivalent about going to war in Iraq, but it does not appear that he voiced his concerns loudly or well inside the Oval Office. White House spokesmen were not just blowing smoke last week when they cautioned reporters to look for self-serving motivations behind some of the leaks.

Even so, Woodward's book is studded with documents and memos from Bush insiders that paint a much gloomier view of the war than the president's public statements at the time. After the first two, generally positive, volumes in his "Bush at War" series, Woodward (an object of fascination and much jealousy in the press corps) was widely derided for playing stenographer to the president and his hero-worshiping advisers. In "State of Denial," Woodward expresses shock and disbelief in interviews with Rumsfeld at his apparent denials and equivocations. Interviewed by Washington Post media critic Howard Kurtz, Woodward was matter-of-fact about his new, more critical tone. "I found out new things, as is always the case when you replow old ground," Woodward said. "The bulk of them I discovered this year. I wish I'd had some of them for the earlier books, but I didn't."

Woodward's new book, like the other critical treatments of the war, is still an early draft of history. But with each new revelation, with each depiction of the chaotic events inside the White House and Pentagon in the months before and after the invasion of Iraq, the picture of Bush's leadership becomes more refined and more disappointing.

'State Of Denial' (NSWK)

By Bob Woodward

Newsweek, October 9, 2006

A movie of the George W. Bush presidency might open in the Oval Office on January 26, 2001, when Donald H. Rumsfeld was sworn in as defense secretary. A White House photographer captured the scene. Rumsfeld wears a pin-stripe suit, and rests his left hand on a Bible held by Joyce, his wife of 46 years. His right hand is raised. Bush stands almost at attention, his head forward, his eyes cocked sharply leftward, looking intently at Rumsfeld. Vice President Dick Cheney stands slightly off to the side, his trademark half smile on his face. It is a cold, dry day, and the barren branches of the trees outside can be seen through the Oval Office windows.

Back in the days of the Ford presidency, in the wake of Watergate—the pardon of Nixon, the fall of Saigon—Cheney and Rumsfeld had worked almost daily in the same Oval Office where they once again stood. The new man in the photo, Bush, five years younger than Cheney and nearly 14 years younger than Rumsfeld, had been a student at Harvard Business School. He came to the presidency with less experience and time in government than any incoming president since Woodrow Wilson in 1913.

Well into his seventh decade, many of Rumsfeld's peers and friends had retired, but he now stood eagerly on the cusp, ready to run the race again. He resembled John le Carre's fictional Cold War British intelligence chief, George Smiley, a man who "had been given, in late age, a chance to return to the rained-out contests of his life and play them after all."

"Get it right this time," Cheney told Rumsfeld.

In his first Pentagon tour, as Ford's secretary of defense from 1975-1977, Rumsfeld had acquired a disdain for large parts of the system he was to oversee once again. He had found the Pentagon and the vast U.S. military complex unmanageable. One night at a dinner at my house a dozen years after he had left the Pentagon the first time, he said that being secretary was "like having an electric appliance in one hand and the plug in the other and you are running around trying to find a place to put it in." It was an image that stuck with me—Rumsfeld charging around the Pentagon E-ring, the Man with the Appliance, seeking an elusive electrical socket, trying to make things work and feeling unplugged by the generals and admirals.

"After two months on the job, it is clear that the Defense establishment is tangled in its anchor chain," Rumsfeld dictated in a four-page memo on March 21, 2001, two months into his second tour. He was already frustrated. Congress required hundreds of reports. It seemed there might be more auditors, investigators, testing groups and monitors looking over their shoulders than there were "front-line troops with weapons."

"The maze of constraints on the Department force it to operate in a manner that is so slow, so ponderous and so inefficient that whatever it ultimately does will inevitably be a decade or so late."

This "Anchor Chain" memo, which Rumsfeld revised and added to, became notorious among Rumsfeld's staff as they watched and tried to help him define the universe of his problems. It sounded like he had almost given up fixing the Pentagon during the George W. Bush presidency. The task was so hard and would take so long, he dictated in a later version, that "our job, therefore, is to work together to sharpen the sword that the next president will wield."

"I'm the secretary of defense," Rumsfeld insisted repeatedly in his first months in 2001. "I'm in the chain of command." He—not the generals, not the Joint Chiefs of Staff—would deal with the White House and the president on operational matters. Rumsfeld micromanaged daily Pentagon life and rode roughshod over people. In one public confrontation at a hearing with Senator Susan Collins, the earnest Maine Republican, Rumsfeld had put her down in a manner that was stunning even for him. Collins's voice had quivered at one point. Later, Powell A. Moore, Rumsfeld's assistant secretary of defense for legislative affairs, suggested that he call her, try to smooth things over.

"Hell," Rumsfeld said, "she needs to apologize to me."

On one occasion, he led a delegation from Congress to the funeral in Columbia, South Carolina, for Representative Floyd Spence, a Republican who had been a pro-Pentagon hawk for three decades. Moore had arranged the seating on Rumsfeld's plane the way everything was done in Congress, by seniority.

"I don't want this," Rumsfeld declared, and personally re-arranged the seating—putting Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who would soon become the House Armed Services Committee chairman, in the back.

On January 20, 2003, President Bush signed a secret National Security Presidential Directive, NSPD-24. The subject: setting up an "Iraq Postwar Planning Office" within the Defense Department for the expected invasion of Iraq. Rumsfeld picked Jay Garner, a 64-year-old retired three-star general and defense industry executive to head the postwar office. Six weeks later, Garner went to the White House, mid-morning on Friday, February 28, 2003, to meet President Bush for the first time. In the Situation Room, Garner passed around copies of his handout, an 11-point presentation, and dove right in. He said four of the nine tasks his small team was supposed to be in charge of in Iraq under Bush's NSPD-24 were plainly beyond their capabilities, including dismantling weapons of mass destruction, defeating terrorists, reshaping the Iraqi military and reshaping the other internal Iraqi security institutions.

The president nodded. No one else intervened, though Garner had just told them he couldn't be responsible for crucial postwar tasks—the ones that had the most to do with the stated reasons for going to war in the first place—because his team couldn't do them.

The import of what he had said seemed to sail over everyone's heads.

Garner next described how he intended to divide the country into regional groups, and moved on to the interagency plans.

"Just a minute," the president interrupted. "Where are you from?"

"Florida, sir."

"Why do you talk like that?" he asked, apparently trying to place Garner's accent.

"Because I was born and raised on a ranch in Florida. My daddy was a rancher."

"You're in," the first rancher said approvingly. His brother Jeb was governor of the state, and the president visited regularly.

DOJ_NMG_0072935

One of Garner's talking points was, "Postwar use of Iraqi Regular Army." He said, "We're going to use the army. We need to use them. They have the proper skill sets."

How many from the army? someone asked.

"I'm going to give you a big range," Garner answered. "It'll be between 200,000 and 300,000."

Garner looked around the room. All the heads were bobbing north to south. Nobody challenged. Nobody had any questions about this plan.

"Thank you very much," Bush said when Garner was done. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice started talking about something else, so Garner figured he was dismissed. As he started to walk out of the room, the president caught his eye.

"Kick ass, Jay," Bush said.

Garner waited for Rumsfeld outside. Soon, Bush and Rice came out and walked three or four steps past Garner. Suddenly Bush turned back.

"Hey, if you have any problem with that governor down in Florida, just let me know," he said.

Shortly after the invasion, while Garner was in Kuwait waiting to move into Iraq, Rumsfeld chose L. Paul "Jerry" Bremer, a 61-year-old terrorism expert and protégé of Henry Kissinger, to effectively replace Garner, but as a presidential envoy. On Garner's first day in Iraq, April 22, he signed on to an agreement to set up an interim Iraqi advisory group, made up of prominent Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis, many of them expatriates, to put an Iraqi face on the postwar occupation government. Two days later, Rumsfeld called to tell him Bremer was coming over, and said he wanted Garner to stay on as well.

"It doesn't work that way," Garner said. "You can't have the guy who used to be in charge and the guy who's now in charge there, because you divide the loyalties of the people. So the best thing for me is just to step out of here."

Rumsfeld convinced Garner to stay temporarily, and the retired general and Bremer clashed, as Bremer quickly unveiled a plan to ban as many as 50,000 members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government employment.

"Hell," Garner told him, "you won't be able to run anything if you go this deep."

The next day, Bremer revealed a second draft order, disbanding the Iraqi ministries of Defense and Interior, the entire Iraqi military, and all of Saddam's bodyguard and special paramilitary organizations. Garner was stunned. The de-Baathification order was dumb, but this was a disaster.

"We have always made plans to bring the army back," he insisted. This new plan was just coming out of the blue, subverting months of work.

"Well, the plans have changed," Bremer replied.

Bremer then met with the Iraqi advisory group Garner had agreed to work with. "One thing you need to realize is you're not the government," he told them. "We are. And we're in charge."

The next day, the group went home.

Garner came back to the U.S. in June and basically hid out for a couple of weeks, not wanting to see anyone at the Pentagon or talk about his experience in Iraq. Finally, on June 18, 2003, alone with Rumsfeld around the small table in the secretary's office, Garner felt he had an obligation to state the depths of his concerns.

"We've made three tragic decisions," Garner said.

"Really?" Rumsfeld said.

"Three terrible mistakes," Garner said. He cited the extent of the de-Baathification, getting rid of the army, and summarily dumping the Iraqi leadership group. Disbanding the military had been the biggest mistake. Now there were hundreds of thousands of disorganized, unemployed, armed Iraqis running around. Garner made his final point: "There's still time to rectify this. There's still time to turn it around."

Rumsfeld looked at Garner for a moment with his take-no-prisoners gaze. "Well," he said, "I don't think there is anything we can do, because we are where we are."

Rumsfeld and Garner went to the White House to see Bush. It was Garner's second time with the president. "Mr. President, let me tell you a couple of stories," Garner said. Describing meetings with Iraqis, Garner painted a positive picture. "I'd get ready to leave," Garner said, "and this is true—as I leave they're all thumbs-up and they'd say, 'God bless Mr. George Bush and Mr. Tony Blair. Thank you for taking away Saddam Hussein.' That was in 70 meetings. That always was the final response."

"Oh, that's good," Bush said.

On the way out, Bush slapped Garner on the back. "Hey Jay, you want to do Iran?"

"Sir, the boys and I talked about that and we want to hold out for Cuba. We think the rum and the cigars are a little better … The women are prettier."

Bush laughed. "You got it. You got Cuba."

Of course with all the stories, jocularity, buddy-buddy talk, bluster and confidence in the Oval Office, Garner had left out the headline. He had not mentioned the problems he saw, or even hinted at them. He did not tell Bush about the three tragic mistakes. Once again the aura of the presidency had shut out the most important news—the bad news.

It was only one example of a visitor to the Oval Office not telling the president the whole story or the truth. Likewise, in these moments where Bush had someone from the field there in the chair beside him, he did not press, did not try to open the door himself and ask what the visitor had seen and thought. The whole atmosphere too often resembled a royal court, with Cheney and Rice in attendance, some upbeat stories, exaggerated good news, and a good time had by all.

Soon Rumsfeld was distancing himself from Bremer, who, on paper, was to report to the president through the secretary of defense. Rumsfeld later confirmed to me in an interview that he felt that Bremer had only "technically but not really" reported to him.

"He didn't call home much," Rumsfeld said of Bremer.

Rumsfeld also stepped away from the hunt for Saddam's alleged WMD. CIA Director George Tenet proposed to Rumsfeld that the person in charge of the WMD hunt report to both of them.

"Absolutely not," Rumsfeld said.

After Bush's re-election in November 2004, the biggest question mark at the White House was Rumsfeld. Should he stay? White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. had to approach the issue with delicacy. The biggest voice for change was outgoing Secretary of State Colin Powell. In one conversation, Powell had told Card, "If I go, Don should go." Bush had decided to replace Powell with Rice, but it was unclear who he wanted at Defense.

Card got out his "hit-by-the-bus" book, an 8½-by-11-inch spiral notebook, a half-inch thick with a blue cover. On separate pages he had lists of possible replacements for all the major administration posts, including his own. The names were listed in no particular order. Card kept the notebook in his desk at the White House and periodically added or deleted names. He had intentionally used a student notebook, something he had bought himself, so it wouldn't be considered a government document or a presidential record that might someday be opened to history. It was private and personal.

His list of 11 possible Rumsfeld replacements included Senator Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who had been Al Gore's running mate in 2000, and Republican Arizona Senator John McCain.

But Card had what he thought was a great idea—a sleeper candidate. The best replacement for Rumsfeld would be James A. Baker III. "Everyone would say, 'Phew,'" Card said. "No learning curve. Great. Interesting." Baker was 74, only two years older than Rumsfeld. He had served in the Marine Corps. He had been the best modern White House chief of staff, Card thought. He had successfully handled the 2000 Florida recount for Bush. Mr. President, this is my quiet counsel, Card said. Put a diplomat in the Defense Department.

The president seemed genuinely intrigued. You don't have to rush to make a decision, Card advised. But the president would not even authorize Card to send out feelers or to enter into any discussion with Baker.

Card spoke with Rumsfeld, who talked as if he presumed there would be no change. Rumsfeld wanted to stay.

Soon Karl Rove weighed in. A contentious session with Congress was coming up. As he saw it, the Democrats were in no mood for a honeymoon. With Rice's confirmation hearing and with the expected nomination of White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales as attorney general, would another Senate confirmation overload the system? And, clearly, the conduct of the war in Iraq would be the subject of confirmation hearings for anyone Bush nominated to be the new secretary of defense.

Rove agreed they did not want to do anything that would prompt hearings on the war. Jesus, no.

In mid-December the president made his final decision. Rumsfeld would stay, he indicated to Cheney and Card. He couldn't change Rumsfeld.

"That didn't mean he didn't want to," Card later said.

Card tried to have a private, candid session with First Lady Laura Bush about every six weeks to hear her concerns. He set aside an hour and a half for each meeting. Sometimes it took 30 minutes, sometimes the full hour and one half and on occasion two hours.

The first lady was distressed about the war, worried that Rumsfeld was hurting her husband, and her perspective seemed to reflect Rice's concern about Rumsfeld's over-bearing style and tendency to dominate. Card knew that the first lady and Rice often took long walks together on the Camp David weekends.

"I agree with you," Card said. On one level he was trying to educate and explain, but he was also lobbying. So he outlined his problems with Rumsfeld and how he believed it was time for a change. He said, however, so far his advice on the Rumsfeld situation had been considered and rejected.

"He's happy with this," the first lady said, "but I'm not." Another time she said, "I don't know why he's not upset with this."

As the new secretary of state, Rice hired Philip Zelikow, an old friend, as the counselor to the State Department, a powerful but little known top post that would leave him free to undertake special assignments for her, and quickly dispatched him and a small team to Iraq. On February 10, Rice's 14th day as secretary, Zelikow presented her with a 15-page, single-spaced memo classified SECRET/NODIS, meaning "no distribution" to anyone else. "At this point Iraq remains a failed state shadowed by constant violence and undergoing revolutionary political change," Rice read. This was a shocking notion—"a failed state," after two years, thousands of lives, and hundreds of billions of dollars.

In midsummer 2005, General Jim Jones, the NATO commander, paid a call on his old friend General Pete Pace, the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs. It was virtually certain that Pace was going to move up to become chairman, the number one military position.

The two Marine generals had been friends for more than three decades. They had been in Vietnam at about the same time, a searing and formative experience for both, and then served side-by-side as first lieutenants in 1970 at the Marine barracks in southeast Washington.

Jones expressed chagrin that Pace would even want to be chairman. "You're going to face a debacle and be part of the debacle in Iraq," he said. U.S. prestige was at a 50- or 75-year low in the world. He said he was so worried about Iraq and the way Rumsfeld ran things that he wondered if he himself should not resign in protest. "How do you have the stomach for eight years in the Pentagon?" he finally asked.

Pace said that someone had to be chairman. Who else would do it?

Jones did not have an answer. "Military advice is being influenced on a political level," he said. The JCS had improperly "surrendered" to Rumsfeld. "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder."

His concern was complete. When Senators John Warner and Carl Levin, the chairman and ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, visited him at his headquarters in Belgium, Jones told them about all the problems. He said they needed new legislationto re-empower the service chiefs or make some kind of sense of the crazy system.

"The Joint Chiefs have been systematically emasculated by Rumsfeld," Jones said.

Pace soon became chairman. In an interview, he flatly denied that Jones had told him that Iraq was a debacle or that Rumsfeld had systematically emasculated the Joint Chiefs. "He's a good friend. He was in my wedding," Pace said, noting they had known each other for 36 years. "If Jim felt that way he would tell me."

I called Jones at NATO headquarters in Belgium. He said that he had made all those comments to Pace in their meeting in 2005. "That's what I told him," Jones said.

In March 2006, Rumsfeld invited six of the Pentagon's regular outside advisers in to be briefed and ask questions. One was Ken Adelman, a longtime Rumsfeld friend and vehement early supporter of the war who had become entirely disillusioned over the administration's handling of the postwar. His relationship with Rumsfeld was almost over.

"What metrics would you use for success in Iraq?" Adelman asked Rumsfeld. "You know, for winning the war?"

"Oh, there are hundreds," Rumsfeld replied. "It's just so complicated that there are hundreds."

"Wait a minute," Adelman insisted. "A former boss of mine always said identify three or four things, then always ask about, get measurements and you'll get progress or else you'll never get any progress." The former boss was Rumsfeld himself, who had driven the point home to Adelman 35 years ago, when he worked for Rumsfeld at the Office of Economic Opportunity. What are they? Adelman insisted.

Rumsfeld said it was so complicated that he could not give a list. "Hundreds," he insisted.

Adelman believed that meant there was a total lack of accountability. If Rumsfeld didn't agree to any criteria, he couldn't be said to have failed on any criteria.

"Then you don't have anything," Adelman said. He left as dis-turbed as ever. There was no accountability.

On March 16, General John Abizaid, the commander of CENTCOM and thus the top military officer for the Middle East, was in Washington to testify before the Senate Armed Services Committee. He painted a careful but upbeat picture of the situation in Iraq. Afterward, he went over to see Congressman John Murtha, the 73-year old former Marine who had introduced a resolution the previous November calling for the redeployment of troops from Iraq as soon as practicable. Sitting at the round, dark wood table in the congressman's office, Abizaid, the one uniformed military commander who had been intimately involved in Iraq from the beginning and who was still at it, indicated he wanted to speak frankly. According to Murtha, Abizaid raised his hand for emphasis and held his thumb and forefinger a quarter of an inch from each other and said, "We're that far apart."

Rumsfeld circulated a six-page SECRET memo on May 1, proposing some fixes, entitled "Illustrative New 21st Century Institutions and Approaches."

It was almost the latest version of the "Anchor Chain" memos he had written in his first months as secretary in 2001—a cry from his bureaucratic and managerial heart. Not only was the Defense Department tangled in its anchor chain but so was the rest of the U.S. government, and the world.

He dictated, "The charge of incompetence against the U.S. government should be easy to rebut if the American people understand the extent to which the current system of government makes competence next to impossible."

DOJ_NMG_0072938

On Wednesday, May 24, 2006, the intelligence division of the Joint Staff, the J-2, circulated an intelligence assessment, classified SECRET, that showed that the forces of terror in Iraq were not in retreat. It put hard numbers on trends that had been reported to Bush all year. Terrorist attacks had been steadily increasing. The insurgency was gaining. Attacks were now averaging 700 to 800 a week. Every IED that was discovered—whether it detonated and caused damage or casualties or was identified and disarmed before it could do any damage—was still counted as an attack. A graph measuring attacks from May 2003 to May 2006 showed some significant dips, but the current number of attacks was as high as they had ever been—exceeding 3,500 a month.

I told Rumsfeld that I understood the number of attacks was going up.

"That's probably true," he said. "It is also probably true that our data's better, and we're categorizing more things as attacks. A random round can be an attack and all the way up to killing 50 people someplace. So you've got a whole fruit bowl of different things—a banana and an apple and an orange."

I was speechless. Even with the loosest and most careless use of language and analogy, I did not understand how the secretary of defense would compare insurgent attacks to a "fruit bowl," a metaphor that stripped them of all urgency and emotion. The official categories in the classified reports that Rumsfeld regularly received were the lethal IEDs, standoff attacks with mortars, and close-engagements such as ambushes—as far from bananas, apples and oranges as possible.

During one week in May 2006, enemy-initiated attacks soared to 900, a new record. In June, attacks went down to about 825 one week but then spiked up again. By July it was over 1,000 a week, again a new record. It was even worse considering the level of violence existed after two years spent training, equipping and funding 263,000 Iraqi soldiers and police. The cost had been $10 billion, and American teams had been embedded with most of the Iraqi units for over a year. At an equivalent time in 1971, after several years of Vietnamization, the trend lines of insurgent violence had been down, not up.

In July 2006, I interviewed Rumsfeld on two successive afternoons. I asked him about troop levels—a key issue and point of contention. The record showed that the plan for invading Iraq had a top number of 275,000 ground combat forces, including about 90,000 who were scheduled to flow into Iraq in the weeks and months after March 19, 2003, when the war began. Rumsfeld said it is one of the great "canards" that he had decided or unduly influenced the decision to not bring in the 90,000. It was all on General Franks's recommendation, he said. But by the summer of 2006, Rumsfeld had softened his position on the issue of whether there were enough troops. "It's entirely possible there were too many at some point and too few at some point, because no one's perfect," he said. "In retrospect I have not seen or heard anything from the other opiners that suggests to me that they have any reason to believe that they were right and we were wrong. Nor can I prove we were right and they were wrong. The only thing I can say is they seem to have a lot more certainty than my assessment of the facts would permit me to have."

Asked about the battle with the Iraq insurgency, he said, "It could take eight to 10 years. Insurgencies have a tendency to do that." Overall he said, "Our exit strategy is to have the Iraqis' government and security forces capable of managing a lower-level insurgency and ultimately achieving victory over it and repressing it over time. But it would be a period after we may very well not have large numbers of people there."

I said I understood that General George W. Casey Jr., the top commander of forces on the ground in Iraq, had reported that the insurgency had not been neutralized—key goal of his campaign plan—but only contained. After some typical verbal jousting, I was able to ask directly, "Do you agree it has not been neutralized?"

"Oh clearly not," Rumsfeld answered.

"Only contained?"

"Yeah," he said. "Thus far."

I then read from the May 24, 2006, assessment that said the "Sunni Arab insurgency is gaining strength and increasing capacity." I asked him, "Does that sound right to you?"

Here was one of the central questions in any war. Was the other side "gaining strength and increasing capacity?" General Casey the Joint Chiefs' intelligence staff, and the CIA had all categorically said the insurgency was gaining. Certainly Rumsfeld knew that. I had also quoted from the assessment on a list of 29 sample questions I had submitted in advance, and I know he had spent at least one hour the day before preparing for the interview.

"When was this?" Rumsfeld asked.

Six weeks ago, I answered. The question on the table was whether he agreed or not that the insurgency in the Iraq War was gaining. I was ready for a pure Rumsfeldian moment, and I was not disappointed.

"Gosh, I don't know," the secretary of defense replied. "I don't want to comment on it. I read so many of those intelligence reports"—I had never said it was an intelligence report—"and they are all over the lot. In a given day you can see one from one agency, and one from another agency, and then I'll ask Casey or Abizaid what they think about it, or Pete Pace, 'Is that your view?' And try and triangulate and see what people think. But it changes from month to month. I'm not going to go back and say I agree or don't agree with something like that."

He was right that there might be some changes month to month, but, as he knew, the overall assessment and trend was visibly, measurably and dramatically worse.

I asked Rumsfeld what was the best, most optimistic scenario for a positive outcome in Iraq.

"This business is ugly," he replied. "It's tough. There isn't any best. A long, hard slog, I think I wrote years ago. We're facing a set of challenges that are different than our country understands … They're different than our Congress understands. They're different than our government, much of our government, probably understands and is organized or trained or equipped to cope with and deal with. We're dealing with enemies that can turn inside our decision circles." The enemy can move swiftly, he said. "They don't have parliaments and bureaucracies and real estate to defend and interact with or deal with or cope with. They can do what they want. They aren't held accountable for lying or for killing innocent men, women and children.

"There's something about the body politic in the United States that they can accept the enemy killing innocent men, women and children and cutting off people's heads, but have zero tolerance for some soldier who does something he shouldn't do."

"Are you optimistic?" I asked.

Rumsfeld looked through me and continued. Three of his aides who were sitting with us at the table in his office could not help but register surprise as Rumsfeld plowed on without answering.

"We're fighting the first war in history in the new century," he continued, "and with all these new realities, with an industrial-age organization in an environment that has not adapted and adjusted, a public environment that has not adapted and adjusted."

At the end of the second of two interviews, I quoted former Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara: "Any military commander who is honest with you will say he's made mistakes that have cost lives."

"Um hmm," Rumsfeld said.

"Is that correct?"

"I don't know. I suppose that a military commander..."

"Which you are," I interrupted.

"No I'm not," the secretary of defense said.

"Yes, sir," I said.

"No, no. Well … "

"Yes. Yes," I said, raising my hand in the air and ticking off the hierarchy. "It's commander in chief, secretary of defense, combatant commander."

"I can see a military commander in a uniform who is engaged in a conflict having to make decisions that result in people living or dying and that that would be a truth. And certainly if you go up the chain to the civilian side to the president and to me, you could by indirection, two or three steps removed, make the case."

Indirection? Two or three steps removed? It was inexplicable. Rumsfeld had spent so much time insisting on the chain of command. He was in control—not the Joint Chiefs, not the uniformed military, not the National Security Council or the NSC staff, not the critics or the opiners. How could he not see his role and responsibility?

I could think of nothing more to say.

Into The Blacksnake's Lair (NSWK)

By Michael Hastings

Newsweek, October 2, 2006

Murat Karayilan prefers to travel in darkness. Under cover of a starry night, his white Nissan Pathfinder crawls up a narrow gravel road in Iraq's mountainous far north to a typical-looking village house. Karayilan—his name is Turkish for "blacksnake"—is a hunted man. To the east, Iran's anti-U.S. leaders would like nothing better than to see the Kurdish guerrilla commander jailed or dead. To the west, America's longtime allies in the Turkish government feel the same. The State Department lists his group, the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), as a terrorist organization. "We are not terrorists," the Blacksnake tells NEWSWEEK, seated in a sparsely furnished room with a stone floor. "The U.S. has seen us through the eyes of our enemies. We want you to see us as friends."

That's not easy. Even as U.S. forces struggle against rising chaos and violence elsewhere in Iraq, the fear now is that the north could also be engulfed, thanks to Kurdish separatists' use of Iraqi soil as a staging area for their war against the Turks and the Iranians. The rebels see themselves as standing up against centuries of often brutal repression. This year the Blacksnake's guerrillas have staged more than 250 attacks on Turkey, in one bloody week killing 14 Turkish soldiers, a toll unmatched since a decade ago, at the height of the separatist conflict. Ankara keeps threatening to send its troops into Iraq to root out the rebels.

Meanwhile, a PKK-affiliated group in Iraq is picking fights with Iran. In recent weeks the violence has escalated, as everyone tries to inflict as much damage as possible before winter snows interrupt the fighting.

There is no authority but the PKK in its corner of Iraq. To get there you climb a winding road where even the shepherds carry AK-47s, into the Qandil Mountains, a stretch of high peaks straddling the borderlands of Iraq, Turkey and Iran. The last Iraqi government checkpoint is at the foot of the mountains, guarded by soldiers from Iraq's Kurdish Regional Government. It flies the flag of Iraqi Kurdistan, a yellow sunburst on a field of green, white and red. The flag at the next checkpoint, almost two miles above sea level, belongs to the PKK: a red star on a yellow sun outlined in green. Armed guerrillas make sure no one goes farther without permission from PKK central command. Around the bend, an immense portrait has been painted on the rocky hillside—the face of Abdullah Ocalan, the group's founder.

Ocalan created the PKK in the 1970s as a Kurdish national liberation movement against Turkish rule. The Kurdish-speaking people, whose homelands stretch from Iran to Syria and eastern Turkey, have never had a country all their own. In the 1980s, the PKK's fighters reportedly hung out with Yasir Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization and made pilgrimages to Lebanon's Bekaa Valley, then a hive of anti-U.S. terrorism. By the time Ocalan was captured in 1999, his war had claimed some 37,000 lives.

Karayilan has set a very different tone. He spoke glowingly to NEWSWEEK about democracy and human rights and "Mr. Bush's new Middle East project." He says his 7,000 armed fighters could be a valuable ally for the United States against Islamic fundamentalism. Not to mention Iran. The Free Life Party (PJAK, pronounced "peshak"), a two-year-old offshoot of Karayilan's group, claims some 1,500 guerrillas along the Iranian border from Azerbaijan to Iraq. American forces in Iraq have steered clear of the group, at least in public. "We have the same enemy as the U.S., but they do not extend help to us," PJAK's leader, Abdul Rahman Haji Ahmadi, told NEWSWEEK in a phone interview from his exile home in Germany.

The Blacksnake's guerrillas remain on the terrorist list. Washington recently named retired Gen. Joseph Ralston as "anti-PKK coordinator," to work on a plan for disarming the group. Last weekend the guerrillas proclaimed a unilateral ceasefire. No one was impressed. At least four previous ceasefires have failed, and last week Turkey issued a pre-emptive dismissal of any PKK peace offer. "The PKK usually hibernate over the winter," says one Turkish diplomat. "When spring comes, they are up to their usual business again." The Blacksnake shows no sign of quitting the fight. "If the Turkish Army comes to Iraq, they will lose the battle," he promises. "They have lost 100 times already." Across the border, Turkey's troops are itching to accept that challenge.

'Whatever Is Necessary' (NSWK)

By Lally Weymouth

Newsweek, October 2, 2006

Turkey's foreign minister, Abdullah Gul, was in New York last week and spoke bluntly with NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth about how the Turkish government sees the situation in Iraq. He warned that if the Iraqi Kurds did not curb the PKK terrorist group, Turkey may take matters into its own hands. Excerpts:

WEYMOUTH: Last week Iraq's President [Jalal] Talabani said that if Turkey continues to meddle in Iraq's affairs, the Iraqi Kurds will support opposition movements of other countries.

GUL: I was surprised, because Turkey is the one country that has really contributed to the Iraqi [Kurds]. Turkey is the country that protected them when there was a chemical attack in Saddam's time. I think Talabani's statement was unfortunate and unwise. He is not the leader of one of the tribes now; he is the president of Iraq. So he has to be careful in his statements.

Was Talabani suggesting supporting the PKK?

The PKK is a terrorist organization. The Americans ... will [ultimately] withdraw, and he will be living with his neighbors—so he should be careful.

Last week Talabani told me that Iraq had convinced the PKK to announce a ceasefire and that a new chapter would soon open in relations between Turkey and Iraq.

What is the new chapter? Turkey is one of the main countries that has stressed the territorial integrity of Iraq. We are protecting their territory.

Do you think there is about to be a ceasefire with the PKK?

We cannot bargain with a terrorist organization.

Do you think the Kurds could control the PKK if they wanted to?

If they don't, we have the capacity, ability and determination to fight to the end ... PKK terrorism has increased. Also, the PKK has a new source of weapons. They have obtained weapons and explosives from the Iraqi Army. They bring them into Turkey and use them with remote-control devices.

Are the Iraqi Kurds working hand in hand with the PKK?

I don't want to say this, but they are not doing enough. The PKK terrorists feel relaxed to move about. We are expecting serious cooperation on this issue from all Iraqis as well as from the U.S. In the past, the leader of the PKK lived in Syria, and that regime was the enemy. Now the leaders of the PKK are in northern Iraq, which is controlled by the Coalition forces.

So, would Turkey invade northern Iraq to bring the PKK under control?

We will do whatever is necessary to fight this organization. I want to give the message that if our friends don't help us, we will do the job ourselves.

The White House has announced that PKK terrorism is on the agenda of the meeting President Bush will hold with [Turkish] Prime Minister [Recep] Erdogan this week.

We appreciate that several times President Bush has declared that the U.S. will take serious steps to fight terrorism, but we have to see the results.

When President Talabani was in the United States last week, he painted an optimistic picture of Iraq.

Since the beginning of this year, 16,000 people have been killed there. There is an escalation of the violence. Sectarianism is getting worse and worse.

In the United States many people believe the time has come to withdraw.

How can you leave a vacuum over there? Then, what will happen? All the neighbors of Iraq and the U.S. should work hand in hand with the Iraqi government and the different tribes in Iraq to bring stability. I think it is possible. There is no other way. You have to put things in order.

Here people are asking, why doesn't Iraq split into three parts?

The neighboring countries will not accept this. That idea should be forgotten—it should not be an option. Those [who favor it] don't know Iraq or the region.

You said previously in Washington that you thought Iran might respond positively to nuclear talks. What is your assessment now?

A good package has been given to Iran. During my visit to Iran in August, I met with all the leaders and they said they appreciated the package—I learned this from [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad. He said that this package is different than previous ones. With good intentions, I think there can be a solution.

Why doesn't he suspend nuclear activity?

They say that when they are guaranteed delivery of all the things in the package, then they will suspend. Both sides lack confidence [in each other]. As a neighbor country, we want to see a peaceful solution. We don't want to see any nuclear weapon in our neighborhood.

Saddam's Revenge (TIME)

By Brian Bennett

Time, October 2, 2006

Baghdad

When Ahmed Hassani Mohammed al-Dujaili took the stand as witness No. 1 in the trial of Saddam Hussein last December, he might have thought his worst nightmares were behind him. On a summer afternoon in 1982, two days after gunmen in his town opened fire on a presidential motorcade, Ahmed and all the other males in his family were rounded up by Saddam's Special Republican Guard. Ahmed and three of his 11 brothers were eventually released; the rest disappeared. Two years later, Saddam signed execution orders for six of Ahmed's brothers; a seventh died during interrogation. They were among the 148 men and boys Saddam is accused of ordering killed in retaliation for the assassination attempt. Ahmed says that when he recounted those horrors in court, he looked over at Saddam. The deposed dictator stroked his beard, looked Ahmed dead in the eye and ran his forefinger across his throat.

Since then, the nightmare has returned to Dujail. Ahmed believes that Saddam's throat-slitting gesture, made while television cameras were rolling, was a message to loyalists to kill Ahmed's family. Two of his cousins were kidnapped in July and haven't been heard from since. On Aug. 6, his brother Ali Hassan Mohammed al-Dujaili, another witness, was attacked in the middle of Dujail. Ahmed's nephew Husam was killed while protecting Ali. When Ahmed's younger brother Jaafer came to collect Husam's body, a sniper lying in wait put several bullets in Jaafer's legs. Jaafer lived but will always walk with a severe limp. He is among the lucky ones. The town's mayor, Haji Mohammed Hassan al-Zubeidy, says some 180 people have been murdered in Dujail since Saddam's trial began in October 2005. Basam Ridah, adviser to the Prime Minister for the Saddam trial, puts the number closer to 200. About 80 more have vanished while traveling on the road between Dujail and Baghdad. "Have you ever heard of the Bermuda Triangle?" asks Mahmoud Hussein al-Hesreji, chief of the Dujail city council. "It's just like that."

On Oct. 16, a five-judge panel will deliver a verdict on whether Saddam and his regime carried out the original 148 killings in Dujail. If convicted, he will face the death penalty. That trial, as well as a second one focused on the massacre of Iraqi Kurds in 1988, has been taking place inside the heavily secured Green Zone, where a succession of judges have given the former dictator the kind of hearing he never afforded his victims. But for many others associated with the trials, there has been no refuge from assassins who take justice--and revenge--into their own hands. Shi'ite death squads have murdered defense lawyers, while ex-Baathists have targeted the families of prosecutors and judges. The brother-in-law of Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa, the second trial's presiding judge, was gunned down last week in Baghdad. If putting Saddam on trial is intended to help Iraqis bury the demons of his murderous rule, the spate of vendetta killings has served as a reminder of the unchecked mayhem that has followed it.

Nowhere has the trial brought more misery than in Dujail, a town of 84,000, most of them Shi'ites, in the middle of the Sunni triangle. Since the start of Saddam's trial, Dujail has been infiltrated by ex-Baathist hit squads. Residents believe they have been ordered by Saddam's former henchmen to take out the families of witnesses. A number of insurgent cells operating around Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, a mere 45-minute drive north of Dujail, have targeted relatives of witnesses, most of whom rarely leave the Green Zone. Abu Hamid, commander of a nationalist cell based north of Dujail, says if any of the witnesses in the Saddam trial leave the Green Zone to return home, "we will destroy all of Dujail. If the people of Dujail allow these villains to live in the town, they will get the same treatment."

The plight of the town reflects the broader collapse of order in the center of Iraq. Insurgents have destroyed the town's water and electricity facilities. Mayor al-Zubeidy says he needs at least 200 more people from the police or Iraqi National Guard to secure the entrances and exits of Dujail. He says he has been unable to persuade the Iraqi government to send reinforcements to the town. "We haven't gotten any support from any of the governments," he says. "There is almost a siege of Dujail, and we can't move out. If they catch you on the way to Baghdad and they find out you are from Dujail, you will be killed at once." The town has provided Ali with three police bodyguards, but he still feels vulnerable. "I'm hunted," he says. "The government is ignoring Dujail."

The killings in Dujail speak to a larger battle being waged in the Iraqi psyche. In Saddam's police state, there were navigable boundaries that made it possible to live. True, the executions by Saddam's regime in Dujail showed that those boundaries were a mirage: they could close in on you in less time than it takes a bullet to fly from the barrel of a gun. But life in Iraq has become so bloody and death so ever present, random and unpredictable that some Iraqis are nostalgic for Saddam's tyranny. When I told U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad about the killings of witnesses' families in Dujail, he shook his head but said the current loss of life is "different than a government carrying on violence against its own citizens." Iraqis, he says, "have paid and are paying a high price to potentially head in a great direction that was not available under Saddam."

It is indicative of the scale of Saddam's brutality that there are some in Dujail who believe the current bloodshed is preferable to what preceded it. "Of course, now it is much better," says Ali, speaking by phone from Dujail. "Saddam's terrorism would go on forever if he were still in power." Ali's brother Ahmed, witness No. 1 in the Saddam trial, doesn't know when he will leave the Green Zone or what awaits him if he does. But after spending his high school years in prison and losing most of his brothers, he says he is willing to pay the ultimate price to see Saddam answer for his crimes: "I'll give up my own life and the lives of my family if it means I have helped send Saddam to the gallows." The sobering reality is that both may come true.

Letter Gives Glimpse Of Al-Qaeda's Leadership (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Six months before the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June, a senior al-Qaeda figure warned him in a letter that he risked removal as al-Qaeda's leader in Iraq if he continued to alienate Sunni tribal and religious leaders and rival insurgent groups.

The author of the Dec. 11 letter, who said he was writing from al-Qaeda headquarters in the Waziristan region of Pakistan, was a member of Osama bin Laden's high command who signed himself "Atiyah." The military's Combating Terrorism Center at West Point, which last week released a 15-page English translation of the Arabic document made public in Iraq, said his real identity was "unknown."

But counterterrorism officials said they believe he is Atiyah Abd al-Rahman, a 37-year-old Libyan who joined bin Laden in Afghanistan as a teenager during the 1980s. He has since gained considerable stature in al-Qaeda as an explosives expert and Islamic scholar. After becoming acquainted with Zarqawi in the western Afghan city of Herat in the late 1990s, he became al-Qaeda's main interlocutor with the fiery Jordanian.

Atiyah's name does not appear on any published U.S. government list of known or suspected terrorists. But his biography, as described by counterterrorism officials who agreed to discuss him on the condition that they not be named, offers a rare glimpse into the cadre of loyal senior aides who escaped with bin Laden into the mountainous Afghan-Pakistani border region in the fall of 2001.

The letter, the first document to emerge from what the military described as a "treasure trove" of information uncovered from Iraqi safe houses at the time of Zarqawi's death, provides new details of a debilitated al-Qaeda leadership-in-hiding, locating it in Waziristan.

"I am with them," Atiyah writes Zarqawi of the high command, "and they have some comments about some of your circumstances."

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said on a visit to the United States last week that he believes bin Laden and his top lieutenants are on the Afghan side of the border. U.S. military and intelligence officials have long believed that the al-Qaeda leadership is hiding in one of the tribal provinces on the Pakistani side of the border, and Atiyah's letter, if accurate, would confirm their location at the time it was written.

Atiyah bemoans the difficulty of direct communications between Waziristan and Iraq and suggests that it is easier for Zarqawi to send a trusted representative to Pakistan than the other way around. The "brothers," he writes, "wish that they had a way to talk to you and advise you, and to guide and instruct you; however, they too are occupied with vicious enemies here.

"They are also weak," he continued, "and we ask God that He strengthen them and mend their fractures. They have many of their own problems, but they are people of reason, experience and sound, beneficial knowledge. . . . This letter represents the majority of, and a synopsis of, what the brothers want to say to you."

Deemed authentic by military and counterterrorism officials, Atiyah's letter adds context to events in al-Qaeda's often rocky relationship with its Iraqi subsidiary, shedding new light on the depth of the organization's concern over Zarqawi and the limits of its control over him.

An earlier letter to Zarqawi, written in July 2005 by bin Laden deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, made some of the same points in more formal and less pointed words. But it appeared to have little effect. In September 2005, Zarqawi released an audiotape accusing Sunni leaders and Shiites of cooperating with U.S. forces and promising their certain death.

Atiyah's letter begins with warm personal words for Zarqawi. "I am setting this out as an introduction," he says, because the rest of his letter "will be primarily about the negatives and cautioning against things that are perilous and ruinous."

Zarqawi had been placed in a position of high responsibility, Atiyah continues, but needed to expand his circle of advisers in Iraq and listen more to those with a better sense of al-Qaeda's wider political objectives. If his words led Zarqawi to wonder if he were being asked to step down, Atiyah writes, the response would be "not necessarily." But, he continues, "it is a possibility if you find at some point someone who is better and more suitable than you." Sharia law, he reminds, requires that "proper fitness be ordained."

Atiyah orders him not to make "any decision on a comprehensive issue" without consulting bin Laden, Zawahiri and the other "brothers." He said Zarqawi should improve his relationship with other Sunni insurgent groups in Iraq and be more judicious in using the al-Qaeda name in his operations.

Atiyah refers to a bombing in Jordan ordered by Zarqawi as the kind of operation that requires consultation. He urges the utmost caution "against attempting to kill any religious scholar or tribal leader who is obeyed, and of good repute in Iraq from among the Sunnis, no matter what." After they have succeeded in driving out U.S. forces and dismantling the Iraqi government, he writes, "then we can behave differently."

"Know that we, like all mujahiddin, are still weak. . . . We have not yet reached a level of stability. We have no alternative but to not squander any element of the foundations of strength or any helper or supporter."

Atiyah's December missive seemed to produce at least temporary results. In January, Zarqawi's organization, al-Qaeda in Iraq, announced it was melding operations with other Sunni insurgent groups under a new umbrella organization called the Mujaheddin Shura Council. But any hopes of appealing to Shiites -- seen by al-Qaeda as an interim necessity that would be abandoned once U.S. forces were ejected -- was eliminated when Zarqawi-affiliated forces blew up an important Shiite shrine, the golden-domed al-Askari mosque in Samarra, in February. A number of Sunni tribal leaders in Iraq's Anbar province have also been killed this year under the Shura Council banner.

Since Zarqawi's death in a U.S. air raid near the Iraqi city of Baqouba in June, the new leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, has appeared more in tune with al-Qaeda's wishes and has reached out to Sunni tribal and religious leaders. Competing for their support with the U.S.-backed Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, al-Muhajer on Thursday issued a public appeal for their forgiveness and pledged to respect their scholarship and status.

Atiyah is no longer in Waziristan, according to U.S. officials who declined to speculate on his current whereabouts. But they said he was not in U.S. custody and expressed certainty that he is still alive. Asked what priority they attach to his capture, one official said: "He is an important figure. . . . The world would be a much safer place with him off the streets."

The official said that Atiyah is one of a number of senior al-Qaeda figures whose names have not been made public. "We knew about him," he said. "There are a lot of key al-Qaeda people that might not be on lists for the general public or the press." Rita Katz, whose Washington-based SITE Institute monitors extremist Web sites, said she believes that Atiyah is a "top al-Qaeda strategist" who frequently appears on a password-protected site under the name of Louis Atiyah Allah. "He's the one the jihadists go to when they have a question. He tells them what to do, what fatwahs to provide. He communicates with the jihadi online community."

The counterterrorism official declined to say whether the government believes Louis Atiyah and Atiyah Abd al-Rahman are the same person.

Atiyah's journey from Libya to a prominent position in the al-Qaeda hierarchy began like that of many young Muslims who traveled to Afghanistan to join the Afghan mujaheddin fighting a Soviet military occupation in the 1980s. Many were recruited and organized there by bin Laden, a charismatic Saudi who had joined the mujaheddin cause. U.S. officials said Atiyah was principally based around the eastern Afghan city of Jalalabad.

In the early 1990s, after a brief return to Saudi Arabia, bin Laden transferred his operations to Sudan. The 1991 U.S. action against Iraq had given him a new cause, and his al-Qaeda organization, formed of the foreign recruits he had organized in Afghanistan, declared war against the U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf.

As bin Laden organized in Sudan, Atiyah went to Algeria, where he is believed to have fought with the Armed Islamic Group (known as GIA, its French initials).

When the Taliban took power in Kabul in 1996, bin Laden returned to Afghanistan, where Atiyah joined him in establishing terrorist training camps. After his release from a Jordanian prison, Zarqawi arrived in Afghanistan in 1999. Although he had only a tenuous relationship with al-Qaeda, Zarqawi took bin Laden's money to set up his own training camp near Herat to prepare to overthrow the Jordanian government in Amman.

It was in Herat, U.S. officials believe, that a relationship was established between Zarqawi and Atiyah.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Zarqawi traveled to Iran and then to northern Iraq. After U.S. forces invaded Iraq in March 2003, he leveraged his al-Qaeda connections to gain legitimacy and adherents to an anti-U.S. insurgency. In October 2004, he changed the name of his burgeoning organization to al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Atiyah's liaison role was "more a function of his long-term ties to al-Qaeda and his relationship with the al-Qaeda central leadership and their interest in seeing him assume this role as opposed to a close relationship with Zarqawi," a counterterrorism official said.

In Hunt For Terrorists In Iraq, General Is No Armchair Warrior (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

A group of American terrorist-hunters that included one of the most senior commanders in Iraq quickly descended on the burned-out rubble that framed the dying body of Abu Musab Zarqawi.

The deadly operative of al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, Zarqawi had been the personal quarry of a super-secret task force whose backbone is the Army Delta Force and Navy SEALs of U.S. Joint Special Operations Command (JSOC). Its commander, Army Lt. Gen. Stanley A. McChrystal, was so personally involved in the hunt that he went with his men to the bombed-out hut near Baqouba to make sure they got their man.

A source close to the special-operations community said Gen. McChrystal's eyes-on identification is representative of the three-star general's hands-on approach as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's chief terrorist pursuer in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"He goes on raids. He doesn't sit back at headquarters," said the source, who asked not to be named. A spokesman at U.S. Special Operations Command in Tampa, Fla., declined to comment on the general's operating style.

The West Point graduate's personal commitment to the mission has led some to dub him the first "commander-forward" of JSOC. He spends little time at the command's headquarters at Fort Bragg, N.C. Instead, he shuttles between task forces in Afghanistan and Iraq to personally supervise hundreds of commandos.

Gen. McChrystal's team was so instrumental in finding Zarqawi, and enabling an Air Force F-16 National Guard pilot to kill him in an air strike, that President Bush thanked the general in a phone call to him and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

"I haven't spoken to our commanders yet, except to call Gen. Casey and McChrystal and congratulate them, but more importantly, for them to congratulate the troops and the intel groups that were working on finding Zarqawi," Mr. Bush said at a June 10 press conference at Camp David.

The "intel groups" represent part of Gen. McChrystal's domain. He oversees a task force that includes JSOC, as well as a special intelligence group that specializes in intercepting communications and the "Night Stalkers" aviation unit. The group is augmented by intelligence officers, including the CIA and Defense Intelligence Agency.

The task force's special intelligence unit cinched the kill. Once Jordanian agents identified Zarqawi's clerical adviser, a frequent visitor to the al Qaeda in Iraq leader, the intelligence unit used special technical means to track his whereabouts. On June 7, the unwitting accomplice ended up on the front door of the terrorist's hide-out. JSOC has used the technical means to track and capture scores of Zarqawi henchmen.

Mr. Rumsfeld takes a personal interest in the assignment of admirals and generals, especially for such a key post as JSOC commander. The defense secretary has made it a priority to bolster special-operations spending and manpower. Shortly after the war on terrorism began, he traveled to Fort Bragg and toured the highly secret training ground of Delta Force. He watched a HALO (high-altitude, low-opening parachute jump), a practice raid and some sharpshooting, and he met Delta recruits.

Gen. McChrystal caught the defense secretary's attention in 2003 when the formertwo-star general was vice director of operations in the Joint Staff, the planning arm of the Joint Chiefs chairman. He conducted nationally televised press briefings at the Pentagon and met frequently with Mr. Rumsfeld and others to map strategy.

At his debut in March 2003, as war kicked off in Iraq, former spokeswoman Victoria Clarke introduced him. "I won't quite say he volunteered, but he's going to help out on the briefings," she said.

After less than a month of fighting, Gen. McChrystal declared from the podium, "I would anticipate that the major combat engagements are over."

Gen. McChrystal long had a special-operations niche: He trained and deployed as an Army Ranger, an elite special-operations force that does the big missions of unconventional warfare.

"There are very few flag-officer movements the secretary doesn't decide," said Larry Di Rita, a former senior aide to Mr. Rumsfeld who worked with Gen. McChrystal. "He tends to invest a lot of time into those decisions, and this one was no different."

He added, "[McChrystal] is well-known in the Army as an exceptional operator and an ability to work in a joint environment, an ability to work at various levels of operational skills. It is those things the secretary tends to look at in these kinds of commands. An ability to communicate. [McChrystal] is a very good communicator."

Special-operations insiders say that when it is time to replace Army Gen. Bryan "Doug" Brown, commander of Special Operations Command, Gen. McChrystal will likely be a finalist, along with Lt. Gen. Dell Dailey, a former JSOC chief.

Iraq Government Facing Sectarian Rift (AP-Y)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

Shiite politicians demanded changes in the Iraqi government Sunday, accusing a Sunni Arab party in the coalition of ties to terrorism after a bodyguard of its leader was arrested on suspicion of planning bomb attacks.

The dispute threatened a sectarian crisis within the national unity government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, which is struggling to contain spiraling Shiite-Sunni killings that the U.S. ambassador said have surpassed Sunni insurgent attacks in deadliness.

After the bodyguard's arrest, an unprecedented surprise curfew was imposed on Baghdad on Saturday, preventing pedestrians as well as vehicle traffic. The curfew was lifted early Sunday.

At least 23 people were killed in violence Sunday, and 21 bodies were found in Baghdad or to the south, many of them bound and tortured. In the evening, gunmen burst into a frozen food factory in Baghdad, kidnapping 24 workers and wounding two others — similar to past attacks in which militants have picked out members of the opposing sect from among the captives and killed them.

The U.S. military also reported Sunday that two American soldiers were killed the day before in fighting in western Anbar province — bringing to at least 70 the number of U.S. troops killed in September, the second highest monthly toll this year after April, when 76 died.

Iraqi troops backed by American military advisers arrested a suspected Shiite militiaman believed to have carried out kidnappings and killings. A gunbattle broke out at the suspect's house in Baghdad's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City, leaving a woman and a young girl dead, Iraqi police said.

Afterward, angry men at the scene held up a color photo of a smiling, winking Jesus giving a "thumbs up" sign that they said was left by troops at the raided house — an allegation denied by U.S. and Iraqi officials.

The photo, known as the "Buddy Christ," is from the movie "Dogma," a 1999 religious satire in which "Buddy Christ" is part of a church campaign to improve Jesus' image.

U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said the photo was a "rather ridiculous attempt" to discredit the raid. It was unclear how it ended up at the site.

DOJ_NMG_0072946

The potential government crisis erupted after U.S. troops on Friday arrested a bodyguard of Sunni politician Adnan al-Dulaimi, saying the man was suspected of leading an al-Qaida-linked cell that was "in the final stages" of carrying out a string of bombings in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, the center of government and home to the U.S. and British embassies.

Al-Dulaimi heads the Iraqi Accordance Front, the main Sunni Arab party with 44 seats in the 275-member parliament and positions in al-Maliki's government, including a supporter in the Defense Minister post.

The government also includes Shiite parties linked to militias accused of killing Sunnis — and the arrest threatened to wreck al-Maliki's attempts to forge a reconciliation between the sects that could rein in the militias as well as Sunni insurgent violence.

"We are faced with two choices, either militias or the nation. We will not allow the dignity of the nation to be violated," the Shiite prime minister said Sunday in an interview with Al-Hurra TV, which is funded and overseen by the State Department.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, sought to contain the political fallout, underlining in a joint statement that "the arrested individual had no ties to al-Dulaimi's family, nor is al-Dulaimi connected in any way to the suspect activities of the individual."

But Baha el-Deen al-Araji, a lawmaker from the party of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, accused Sunni politicians of having "direct and indirect links to Saddamists, Takfiris (Sunni radicals) and terrorists."

He demanded a "significant cabinet reshuffle" to change "ministries of security and public services dossiers."

"All our Sunni brothers have terrorist groups. This is destructive to the reconciliation process," another Sadrist lawmaker, Nasser al-Saadi, told The Associated Press. "We must stand up to them."

He said that if al-Dulaimi is shown to have links to al-Qaida "he should be treated as a terrorist." The lawmakers said parliament would discuss the arrest in a session on Monday.

Al-Dulaimi denied any connection to militants and said those trying to "defame" the Accordance Front should "be silent because any factor that leads to blow up this case would affect the entire national unity process."

Thousands of people have died in recent months in Shiite-Sunni killings, even as violence by Sunni insurgents continued. The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, said Wednesday that over the preceding week suicide attacks were at their highest level ever.

Khalilzad said al-Qaida-linked militants had been weakened in recent months and that "a main part of the violence now is sectarian violence ... between death squads associated with militias."

Speaking on CNN's "Late Edition," he said al-Maliki's government "in the course of the next two months, has to make progress in terms of containing sectarian violence."

But he expressed optimism that with the prime minister's reconciliation plan and U.S.-Iraqi security efforts "next year the level of violence will be lower than this year."

Iraq's National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie, meanwhile, said security forces were closing in on the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri.

He succeeded slain militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi at the helm of the group, which is accused of some of the deadliest suicide bombings against Shiites.

"In a very short time, we will bring you the good news of Abu Ayyub al-Masri either killed or handcuffed to be brought before the Iraqi justice system," he said.

He showed what he called an al-Qaida instructional CD found this week in a raid south of Baghdad in which al-Masri is seen explaining how to build a car bomb.

"Your days are numbered and you will face your fate very soon," al-Rubaie said, addressing al-Masri.

Sadr Political Bloc Calls For Overhaul Of Iraqi Cabinet (WP)

By Amit R. Paley And K.I. Ibrahim

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 1 -- The political bloc of anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr demanded a shake-up of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's cabinet on Sunday, the latest challenge to the country's increasingly beleaguered unity government.

"Some of those who are in this government have direct or indirect relationships with terrorists," said Bahaa al-Araji, a senior legislator with Sadr's Shiite Muslim party. "The democracy that the occupation brought to Iraq is being exploited by the Sunni insurgents and the terrorists to kill our sons and our men."

Araji's remarks appeared aimed at Adnan al-Dulaimi, the leader of the largest Sunni Arab coalition in parliament, whose bodyguard was arrested Friday on suspicion of planning suicide bombings inside the fortified Green Zone.

The demands of the Sadr movement -- a major bloc in the United Iraqi Alliance, the dominant Shiite coalition that has 130 seats in the 275-member parliament -- exposed deep rifts in the government, as well as mounting frustration with its perceived failure to stanch the horrific sectarian bloodshed here.

Senior U.S. military commanders have questioned whether Maliki has the political will to root out corruption and tackle the militias and death squads wreaking havoc across the country. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said in an interview Friday that Maliki was running out of time to address the problem.

Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for Maliki's government, did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Dulaimi has denied that his bodyguard is connected to terrorists, and on Sunday other Sunni legislators denounced Araji for making "hysterical statements."

"They accuse the Sunnis of being insurgents, Baathists and Saddamists, but if we check the records of the majority of those politicians, we will find that they have ties to the former regime," said Hussein al-Falluji, a Sunni member of parliament.

Falluji also suggested that tensions within the Shiite government -- over Maliki's efforts, unsuccessful so far, to disarm militias controlled by Sadr and other Shiite groups -- are causing politicians to lash out at Sunnis. "They are trying to transfer their problems to us," he said.

Sadr officials in recent days have stepped up their criticisms of Maliki's government. In a sermon on Friday in the city of Kufa, Sheik Mouyed Khazrajy, a member of the Sadr movement, called on the prime minister to move swiftly to reduce sectarian tensions.

"Our patience has limits," he said.

"The hands with which we fought the tyrants are still on the triggers, and the weapons we fought with, which placed you on the prime minister's chair, are still full of gunpowder," Khazrajy said. "We are ready to give you and your masters a lesson in defiance and steadfastness. . . . What has held us back, as the leader has said, is neither humiliation nor ignominy, but feelings of brotherhood and love for the country."

Violence continued to convulse Iraq on Sunday. Twenty-three people were killed and 21 bodies were discovered in incidents across the country, the Associated Press reported.

The U.S. military also announced that two soldiers assigned to the 13th Sustainment Command were killed Saturday during combat in Anbar province, the volatile Sunni insurgent stronghold in western Iraq.

Special correspondents Saad Sarhan in Najaf and Saad al-Izzi in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Shiite Politicians Grow More Critical Of Iraq's Government (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 1 — Iraq's fragile government showed further signs of strain on Sunday, as Shiite political leaders expressed growing frustration at having to share power with Sunni Arabs whom they view as having ties to insurgents.

"There is a real trust crisis," said Baha al-Aaraji, a prominent Shiite legislator at a news conference broadcast on television. "The prime minister does not trust his deputy," and the speaker of Parliament "does not trust his first deputy."

The remarks, which included a call for a cabinet shuffle, came after the disclosure on Friday that a guard working for a leading Sunni politician might have been involved in a plot to detonate multiple car bombs in the Green Zone. But they quickly led to a larger debate, with Sunni and Shiite factions accusing one another of protecting their militias and governing to suit their own sects.

The outburst underscored the weakness of Iraq's government. A patchwork of parties and groups that represents most of Iraq's ethnicities and sects, the government was assembled through weeks of bitter negotiations brokered by the Americans this spring.

At the time, the thinking was to include all of Iraq's groups, particularly the minority Sunni Arabs who dominated the government of Saddam Hussein, in order to drain support for the insurgency. But now, five months after the government was formed, the violence has only worsened, with death squads carrying out sectarian killings that are changing the texture of neighborhoods.

On Sunday evening in Al Amel, a neighborhood in western Baghdad that is largely Sunni Arab, 26 workers were taken from a store that sells sandwiches and meat pastries, Iraqi officials said. Mass kidnappings began occurring with some frequency in the spring.

Continuing another grim trend, the Iraqi police said they discovered 50 bodies in and around Baghdad in the 24 hours ending Sunday night.

The United States military said Sunday that two American soldiers were killed by small-arms fire on Saturday in Anbar Province.

Until now, Shiites have largely held back from explicit criticism of the government, which is run by a Shiite, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, out of fear of weakening him. But progress has been slow, and Shiites seized on the accusation that a guard working for the Sunni leader may have been planning a suicide bombing.

Mr. Aaraji's comments — including a call for a "significant reshuffle" of the cabinet — were the most public and pointed criticism to date. He openly derided a national reconciliation plan announced earlier this year that included a limited amnesty for some Iraqis, saying the plan was soft on insurgents. "We are stuck between the hammer and the anvil because of the national reconciliation plan," he said. "We and our sons are being killed because of it."

The Sunnis, for their part, brought up complaints at news conferences of their own. "The interior minister himself said there are 3,000 militiamen" who had infiltrated the Ministry of Interior, said a member of the Iraqi Consensus Front, the largest Sunni Arab bloc. "Three thousand versus one person," she said, referring to the arrested guard.

Some Shiites say that the Americans, who still control security, have made it hard for the government to act. Parts of the government "still feel paralyzed," said one Shiite politician, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not want to be seen as critical of the leadership. "Neighborhoods are being attacked by armed groups. Threats are passed on to families."

Against Turkey, Washington Is Caught Between Allies (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

QANDIL MOUNTAIN RANGE, Iraq -- Kurdish guerrillas have used the remote mountains of northern Iraq as a base to attack Turkey for years. Now their presence has become a thorny problem for Washington.

Thousands of Kurdish fighters move openly in dozens of camps spread throughout Qandil's scrubby mountainsides and tree-covered ravines. A day's hike to the north lies Turkey, where most of these militants were born and where they face terrorism charges for fighting for Kurdish autonomy. Here in northern Iraq, with grenades clipped to the belts of their matching olive-green outfits, the guerrillas conduct combat drills, restock arms or watch satellite television. A few months ago they honored their leader by painting his image on a giant concrete slab they poured onto a hillside. It is visible from miles away.

"We have our own state in the mountains," says Farman, the 42-year-old area commander whose neck bears the indented scar of a bullet wound. Like other militants from the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or PKK, he introduced himself by first name only.

The guerrillas' enclave in northern Iraq is at the center of a growing diplomatic storm. As the U.S. begins to exert pressure on Iraq to rein in the anti-Turkey fighters, it finds itself caught between two key allies. On one side is Iraqi Kurdistan, which supported the U.S. invasion of Iraq and whose leaders have deep ties with the Kurdistan Workers' Party. On the other is Turkey, a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and a Muslim democracy, whose leaders say they are committed to destroying the PKK.

Stakes for Washington are high. Iraqi Kurdistan is the safest part of Iraq. Armed conflict between Turkey and Kurdish fighters would prove calamitous, adding another front to the bloody Iraqi battlefield and further stretching U.S. and Iraqi security forces. Turkey, which maintains tens of thousands of troops on its border with Iraq, said this summer it is drawing up plans to attack the guerrillas' positions.

For the first time since these fighters began using Iraq as a base more than two decades ago, Washington has appointed a high-level diplomat to address the crisis. In late August, it named retired Air Force Gen. Joseph Ralston to the post of Special Envoy for Countering the PKK. Gen. Ralston, a former NATO top commander, took a whirlwind tour through Turkish and Iraqi capitals in September, pressing the U.S. point that Iraqi territory shouldn't be used as a PKK haven. Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan will raise the issue with President George W. Bush when the two meet in Washington today.

Gen. Ralston's tour comes after a summer of heightened violence. In one week in July, PKK militants killed at least 15 Turkish soldiers and police. A month later, explosions in three Turkish cities killed three Turkish citizens and injured 60 civilians, including foreign tourists. The attacks against civilians were claimed by Kurdistan Freedom Falcons, which Turkish and Western officials say operates under the auspices of the PKK.

On Saturday, the PKK promised to halt attacks, the fifth time the group has declared a cease-fire. However, the decades-old conflict remains far from defused. Past truces have led to lulls in violence, followed by intensified fighting. Turkey immediately dismissed the cease-fire. Violence in the Kurdish area of Turkey continued yesterday.

Marxism and Nationalism

The Kurds, who number about 25 million and speak their own language, have never had a country of their own. Most of them live in contiguous border stretches in Turkey, Iraq, Iran and Syria. The majority -- about 15 million -- live in Turkey, which has historically denied them minority rights such as cultural recognition or Kurdish-language education.

Since its birth in Turkey in 1974, the PKK, or Partiya Karkerên Kurdistan, has employed a violent blend of Marxism and nationalism. Its guerrillas consolidated support in the countryside, ruthlessly attacking Turks and Kurds alike who stood in the way of their goal of establishing an independent Kurdistan. The conflict with the Turkish military led to an estimated 30,000 deaths in the 1980s and the 1990s.

Pressured inside Turkey, the PKK found a haven in northern Iraq in the mid-1980s. Iraqi Kurdish leaders, fighting their own rebellion against Baghdad, allowed the PKK to enter northern Iraq in a gesture of pan-Kurdish solidarity. Iraqi Kurds were also among the region's strongest supporters of the U.S. decision to depose Saddam Hussein, who is currently on trial in Baghdad on charges of genocide against Iraqi Kurds in the 1980s.

Three guerrillas from the Kurdistan Workers' Party in northern Iraq's Qandil mountains. Behind them, a structure housing a television room and a small library.

In the aftermath of the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq, which Turkey opposed, Iraqi Kurdistan has strengthened its autonomy. The home to five million Kurds, the Iraqi region has gradually accumulated the trappings of sovereignty from Baghdad's rule, serving as an inspirational example to Kurds across the border in Turkey and Iran.

In early September, Massoud Barzani, the region's president, outlawed the Iraqi national flag on the grounds that it symbolizes repression of Kurds under Mr. Hussein. Only Kurdish flags, marked with a bright yellow sun in the middle, now remain. The region's parliament just approved a petroleum law that stipulates that revenue from future oil production doesn't have to be shared with Baghdad. (Baghdad has criticized the region's drive to set its own oil policy.) Boundaries between Kurdistan and the rest of Iraq are reinforced with trenches and patrolled by units of the regional government's own military force, the Peshmerga.

In addressing the guerrillas sheltering within their borders, Iraqi Kurdistan's officials find themselves with dual allegiances. While Washington classifies the Kurdistan Workers' Party as a terrorist group, Iraqi Kurd leaders view them as freedom fighters. Masrur Barzani, the head of Iraqi Kurdistan's intelligence branch and the son of the regional president, says Kurds "existed here long before" the Turkic tribes from Central Asia began their conquest of modern-day Turkey a millennium ago. Jafar Mustafa Ali, an Iraqi Kurd in charge of many of the Peshmerga units, suggests the PKK fighters are cut from the same nationalist cloth as Iraq's anti-Saddam Kurdish guerrillas. "The PKK asks for the rights of its people," he says. "Why should somebody be called a terrorist for that?"

At the same time, the region's administrators are eager to avoid the sort of violence afflicting the rest of Iraq. As northern Iraq looks to start pumping its own oil, it will require cooperation from Turkey and Iran to ship it to international clients. Already, bilateral trade between Turkey and northern Iraq has grown to an estimated $3 billion last year, according to Turkish and Iraqi officials. A peaceful resolution of the PKK issue will also help the area attract foreign investment.

According to Turkish and Western intelligence, some 3,000 guerrillas live in Iraq's Qandil mountains at any given time. A smaller force is based on the Turkish side of the border. Western and Turkish intelligence officials say guerrillas train and acquire weapons in Iraq. The camps also serve as rest-and-recuperation sites for rebels who have fought in Turkey, especially during harsh winters when skirmishes usually die down. The PKK says it runs a hidden hospital here that treats fighters wounded in clashes inside Turkey.

A typical guerrilla is Semad, a 29-year-old who grew up in the southeastern Turkish city of Diyarbakir and later moved with his family to Istanbul. Two of his older brothers died in the fighting with Turkish security forces, and Semad says he started helping the PKK at the age of nine, delivering messages, leaflets and food in the militant underground. He worked briefly as a postman in Istanbul. By the time he turned 18 he walked off into the mountains and joined the fighters, taking the name of one of his dead brothers as a nom-de-guerre.

Life for Semad in the Qandil camps follows a well-established routine: political education in the morning, military training in the afternoon, then soccer, volleyball or ping-pong. The guerrillas watch satellite television, particularly Roj TV, a Denmark-based channel sympathetic to PKK's cause.

Devotion to the group's Marxist founder, Abdullah Öcalan (pronounced O-dja-lan), borders on cultish. Mr. Öcalan was captured in 1999, and is currently serving a life sentence in a Turkish island prison. His portrait is ubiquitous in the camps, on bright yellow banners or surrounded with flowers. His severe, moustached visage is painted in bold blue, white and black on a concrete slab, some 8 feet by 20 feet, above one of the camps. Semad has an image of Mr. Öcalan on the screen of his mobile phone.

On a quiet day at the camps, the wooden hovels, tents and clearings brim with domesticity, though alcohol and dating are banned. On a recent sunny morning, Saria, a 21-year-old Kurdish woman from Syria who joined the PKK five years ago, watered a patch of saplings. A male guerrilla chopped firewood. Inside one of the shacks, in a wooden bookcase straining under the weight of books written by Mr. Öcalan, there are two well-thumbed volumes of J.R.R. Tolkien's "The Lord of the Rings" in Turkish, the language most guerrillas here speak fluently and use in conversations alongside Kurdish.

The camps' relaxed feel belies their occupants' serious mission. "Our position now is self-defense war everywhere" against the Turkish military, the Kurdistan Workers' Party current leader, Murat Karaylan, said in a middle-of-the-night interview early last month in Qandil. Mr. Karaylan, a pistol holster under his vest, has been a PKK member since 1978 and leads a clandestine existence shuttling among mountain camps. His arrest and extradition are among Turkey's main demands. "If necessary, we can escalate [the war] four to five times," he said.

Washington's envoy, Gen. Ralston, did not speak with the PKK. Last month in northern Iraq, Ankara and Baghdad, he met with northern Iraq President Barzani, Turkish and Iraqi prime ministers, and U.S., Turkish and Iraqi military officials. He urged Iraqi leaders to put pressure on the guerrillas, asking them to close PKK offices and adopt other, as yet undisclosed, measures against the group. "Clearly, this is not an easy task," Gen. Ralston told reporters upon his return to Washington late last month.

In his interview, Mr. Karaylan said he had been pressed by Iraqi Kurdish officials to halt attacks on Turkish forces. On Thursday, the imprisoned Mr. Öcalan appealed to PKK guerrillas to call a cease-fire, asking them to fight back only if attacked by Turkish forces. In a news conference on Saturday, field leader Mr. Karaylan announced that the guerrillas would call a truce.

The Turkish government called instead for full disarmament. "A cease-fire is done between states," Prime Minister Erdogan told a Turkish television channel last week. "A terrorist organization must lay down its arms." On Sunday, hours after the truce took effect, Turkish soldiers killed a PKK fighter in Southeastern Turkey, not far from the Iraqi border.

Under pressure from the U.S. and Turkey, Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, a Shiite Arab, has promised to close PKK offices in Iraq. The Kurdistan Workers' Party, though, doesn't have many offices in Iraq, and prefers to operate in seclusion from the northern mountains. Iraqi forces would find it challenging to dismantle the camps: Baghdad does not have sway over Iraqi Kurdistan's Peshmerga security forces, who would be unlikely to turn their weapons against fellow Kurds.

Turkish officials say they are prepared to wait for the diplomacy to run its course before considering military options. But one Turkish government adviser says, "We won't wait too long." Iran, which has also suffered attacks from Kurdish separatists linked to the PKK and fighting out of the same Iraqi mountains, shelled northern Iraq earlier this year, according to officials in Iraqi Kurdistan. Iranian officials deny this.

Attacking With Rocks

While northern Iraq has assumed importance as a PKK haven, the root causes of the group's appeal to some Turkish Kurds can be found in the Turkish Southeast. The area still reels from the violence of the past two decades. Major riots erupted in the city of Diyarbakir in March after several PKK fighters were killed by Turkish forces. Thousands of young Kurds set up roadblocks, trashed banks and shops and attacked police with rocks. In some parts of Diyarbakir, a city of one million residents, unemployment runs as high as 70%.

Partly under pressure from the European Union, which Turkey hopes to join, Turkish officials have been trying to address some Kurdish demands for greater rights. Broadcasting in Kurdish, as well as Kurdish-language classes, have been allowed, though both activities are still tightly controlled. A few years ago, the PKK dropped its demand for an independent Kurdistan, saying it would be content with some form of autonomy inside Turkey. The government wants to channel investment to the region and now openly acknowledges that it has long neglected its Kurdish citizens and denied their identity. While these are small steps, they would have been unthinkable even a decade ago.

"One of the reasons we were fighting was to provide the conditions for greater cultural and language rights. At the time it was necessary," says Hasan Seker, a one-time teacher in a village school who joined the PKK in the 1980s, fought, lost an index finger, was captured and spent nine years in prison. He now runs a cultural center in Diyarbakir promoting Kurdish music, literature and language. Though the center faces restrictions, he says the difference is obvious. "It's serious progress. We came from the point of 'Kurds don't exist' to this point," he says. "Of course it gives us hope."

Threatened By Soldiers, Iraqi Doctors 'Don't Feel Safe' (WT)

By James Palmer

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

BAGHDAD -- It was a little before 2 p.m. last Monday when a group of Interior Ministry soldiers carried a wounded colleague into the emergency room at Yarmouk hospital.

Waving their weapons frantically, two of the soldiers demanded immediate attention from Haider Hussein, 25, a resident with only three months' experience.

The soldiers did not react well when Dr. Hussein requested time to prepare before examining the patient.

"They told me, 'We're authorized to kill you if you don't help us now,' " Dr. Hussein said.

Two armed men left and, according to several doctors, returned with about 15 more soldiers who blocked the entrances to the emergency room, holding the attending doctors prisoner. The standoff didn't end until the hospital's security force fired into the air to persuade the ministry soldiers to release the doctors.

The confrontation turned out to be a breaking point for doctors at Yarmouk. On Thursday afternoon, they went on strike, saying they were accustomed to dealing with the worst of the capital's unrelenting violence but no longer could handle the intimidation and aggressive tactics of the military and police.

"We don't feel safe anymore," said Haider Brahim, 28, the chief surgeon in Yarmouk's emergency room.

The one-day strike did not resolve their problem, but it did win them a promise that authorities will look into three main demands: a public apology from the Interior Ministry, a ban on weapons inside the hospital and a ward exclusively for armed-forces physicians to care for military and police casualties.

It was the third time that Yarmouk's doctors have walked off the job in three years because of the harsh working environment, said the hospital's director, Haqqi Razzaiki. He said 16 physicians had quit in the past two months because of miserable working conditions.

"The whole situation is bad, and we're getting no help from the Ministry of Health," Dr. Brahim said.

Yarmouk's 24 emergency-room physicians earn a little more than $135 a month.

Most of the hospital's 150 doctors live in dilapidated residence halls on the hospital grounds. In one cramped room with no bathroom, six doctors who work alternate shifts share three small beds pressed against the walls.

About 50 doctors share a narrow restroom in a hallway. Dust covers the floor, and a hole in the floor serves as a toilet. Another restroom on a separate floor lacks running water.

The food, prepared in large metal pots in a room tucked away from the first-floor corridor, is a frequent target of criticism.

"We tried to give the food once to stray cats, but they wouldn't eat it," said Dr. Hussein. "Some prisoners live better than this."

The hospital's location in the southern Baghdad neighborhoods that are flash points for sectarian and insurgent attacks also makes it an epicenter for urgent cases. Dr. Brahim estimates that his staff treats 100 to 300 emergencies a day.

Yarmouk also attracts patients from the violent western Anbar province because it is one of the first large government-run hospitals along the highway into Baghdad. As a government-run hospital, it is obliged to provide free health care to all Iraqis.

Before the strike Thursday, the triage area was filled with the wounded, their families, paramedics, hospital administrators, nurses and doctors. The building smelled of perspiration, blood and human waste.

A young resident working without plastic gloves examined a gaping wound in one man's thigh, the result of a roadside bomb. Another man on a bloodstained gurney wailed in agony as a male relative gently kissed his face.

And 9-year-old Amer Yousef, a bandage over the bullet wound in his lower abdomen, tried to fight back tears as a group of women in black abayas watched over him.

Outside the hospital's gates, an Interior Ministry pickup truck swerved to a sudden stop and uniformed men frantically escorted the injured colleague inside. A soldier in the back of the vehicle fired a machine gun into the sky to halt the oncoming traffic.

"There's no magic solution to resolve these problems," said Dr. Razzaiki, who has practiced medicine in Iraq for 27 years. "If we had better security, the problems would solve themselves."

The Big Question On Iraq (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The campaign season debate about Iraq, which circled last week around the question of whether the war has increased global terrorism, might suggest that Washington is nowhere near facing the critical question of what to do about the actual situation on the ground. Yet behind President Bush's "we're safer" rhetoric and the answering shouts of "fiasco," the most serious debate about U.S. Iraq strategy in three years is quietly emerging. Shortly after the election it should take center stage.

The central question for discussion is this: Should the United States continue to depend on Iraq's "unity" government and army to carry out the political, military and economic measures needed to stabilize the country -- most important, a political settlement among its warring sectarian factions? Or is it necessary to override the new political system and mount some sort of intervention, led by the United States and perhaps other governments, to force the necessary deals?

President Bush has been hinting about this decision point ever since Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's visit to Washington in July. "Iraq can count on our partnership as long as the new government continues to make the hard decisions necessary to advance a unified, democratic and peaceful Iraq," Bush said in an Aug. 31 speech. Administration officials say the passage was a warning deliberately aimed at Maliki.

A more explicit signal came in a Sept. 19 news conference by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton, who are leading a congressionally mandated and Bush-blessed commission to consider options for Iraq. The panel long ago decided not to make recommendations until after the November elections. So why hold a news conference in September? Perhaps so that Hamilton could make this statement: "The government of Iraq needs to show its own citizens soon, and the citizens of the United States, that it is deserving of continuing support. The next three months are critical. Before the end of this year, this government needs to show progress in securing Baghdad, pursuing national reconciliation and delivering basic services."

At least some in Maliki's government are hearing the warning. Two of its most pro-American officials, Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi and Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih, appeared in Washington in September. Mahdi, a Shiite, pleaded for more time, saying that Washington could not expect the new government to deliver results on a timetable measured in months. Salih, a Kurd, took a different tack, listing a string of measures he said would be approved by parliament before the end of the year.

In fact, amid the continuing chaos in Baghdad the parliament has finally begun to act: Last week Sunni and Shiite deputies struck a preliminary deal on legislation that would allow the creation of federal regions and set up a committee to consider amendments to the constitution. But Maliki is still resisting forceful steps against Shiite militias; and negotiations with Sunni insurgents have gone nowhere.

If such sluggishness continues, the Baker-Hamilton commission, and with it the consensus in Washington, could be tipped toward the conclusion that the United States can't look to the new political system for solutions. That doesn't mean there would be a precipitous American troop withdrawal; the commission will almost certainly conclude that such a step would be disastrous.

Instead, the time may finally be ripe for some of the ideas that have been doggedly pushed for most of this year by Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden, who has been one of his party's most serious and responsible voices on Iraq. In essence, Biden is proposing that the United States enlist its NATO allies, U.N. Security Council members and Iraq's neighbors for an intervention that would be aimed at forcing political and sectarian leaders to leap to the political settlement they are now creeping toward.

The settlement Biden has in mind is the division of Iraq into highly autonomous regions, dominated, respectively, by Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. That solution was the subject of last week's parliamentary deal, which postponed any action until 2008. A new reconstruction aid program would be launched; an international conference would commit Iran, Syria and other neighbors to a nonaggression pact. International peacekeepers would be recruited to patrol cities such as Baghdad. Meanwhile, most U.S. troops would be withdrawn by the end of next year, except for a residual force that could intervene against al-Qaeda.

It's easy to find holes in this strategy, as with any other plan for Iraq. To begin with, Iraqis simply may not be capable of jumping to a settlement. Perhaps only the pain of an extended civil war will get them there. But Biden's basic idea -- of an external political intervention backed by an international alliance -- is the one big option the Bush administration hasn't tried. It wouldn't be surprising if Baker -- master orchestrator of the Plaza agreement and the Madrid conference -- finds it compelling.

In Afghanistan, US Troops Tackle Aid Projects - And Skepticism (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

MIRDISH VILLAGE, AFGHANISTAN

The white-bearded Afghan police chief is not pleased with his village "force" of 15 rag-tag cops. They have no radios, just two AK-47 assault rifles, and a single pistol with 9mm ammunition that jams.

Afghan officials have also not paid police salaries for months in this remote eastern Afghanistan province of Nuristan on the Pakistan border. An officer is said to be collecting funds now - the proverbial "check is in the mail" - but the delay is hampering US plans to start police training this week.

"Of course it's a good idea to train," chief Nur Mohamed tells the US Military Police platoon leader, as they meet under a rock overhang. "The day they pay us, we will be there."

Money talks in Afghanistan, particularly in this undeveloped region. Whether training local police or getting tips on insurgent positions, success for US forces depends on fulfilling promises of aid and reconstruction. That's the logic behind a new fight-and-build strategy that arms the US military with millions of dollars to spend on projects to convince Afghans, one village at a time, of the benefits of opposing Taliban-led militants.

But obstacles abound here. In the wilds of Nuristan, sheer rock cliffs and mountain run-off rivers leave few options for roads. US Army convoys have been attacked nearly every time they set out in recent weeks. The terrain not only makes ambushes easier but also frustrates logistics, like getting money and supplies flowing to Mr. Mohamed's police.

Mohamed tells the MP that his unit only patrols a few hundred yards down the road to the graveyard - "where you were ambushed the other day."

"The [insurgents] couldn't come here, but we see a lot in the mountains, and they [are armed with] everything," says Mohamed. "That is why we are so afraid. How could we attack them?"

DOJ_NMG_0072953

"It's been pretty frustrating," the MP, 1st Lt. Candace Mathis from Rome, N.Y., says later. "It's hard because they do not have the food, ammunition, and blankets - all the stuff they need to be successful. All I can do is pat them on the back and say security is important." US Army takes up infrastructure

So far, the Army has signed more than a dozen contracts in a string of villages. Work has begun on popular road building, water pipe schemes, and micro-hydro projects to bring electricity.

So when troops join the police chief and mullah for a visit to Mirdish village, there is a cautious welcome, and even gratitude. More information about militant movements is coming to the Americans from such villagers. More elders want projects for their areas.

"We like you Americans here, and want to work with you," the police chief tells the MP, before adding a warning. "We appreciate when you take care of us. But when you fire [into valleys] with women and children, they are so scared."

While officers deem these to be positive signs, the US strategy is long-term, and envisions keeping militants on the run throughout a cold winter - depriving them of shelter in the villages - as progressing projects convince people to side with the government.

But there have also been two high-profile killings in this district in the past month, of one cooperating elder and a border police chief, both claimed by the Taliban.

The Islamist militia has historically had little presence in Nuristan, but use it as a route to Kabul from Pakistan and an out-of-the-way area for training grounds. The murders have shocked and intimidated elders, and the 200 fledgling police recruits.

"In counterinsurgency, you can't lead with a rifle," says Lt. Col. Mike Howard, who commands the 3rd Squadron 71st Cavalry from Fort Drum, N.Y., in Nuristan. "You must lead with actions, with reconstruction."

"The elders have bet on reconstruction, and ending this stupid fighting," says Colonel Howard, who is on his third Afghan tour. "You've got to come and stay, and plop down in the middle of [insurgent territory], and make them choose to work with you, or fight you, or leave."

Nuristan's extreme isolation once earned it the name "land of infidels" because it was the last Afghan region to accept Islam, a little more than 100 years ago. Two enemies: insurgents, skepticism

US forces are fighting two enemies here: the insurgents, and local skepticism that they will stay and deliver on promises of projects that will improve their lives. For two years, one elder carried a letter and business card from a US State Department official - and his unfulfilled promise to build a road.

The 3-71 Cavalry has so far approved $1.33 million worth of projects, contracted $966,000 of that, and disbursed some $250,000 in the long-neglected Kamdesh District alone.

It is one element of the US Army's 3rd Brigade Combat Team, that is spread across 19 forward bases and several outposts in eastern Afghanistan. It is fielding 13 Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs) which include two civilian engineers each, civil affairs personnel, and military police, in areas under US control. Road project opened new paths

An initial $200,000 road project to Kamdesh - though tangled because of an Afghan contractor from a distant city - whetted local appetites for more work. Building a five-classroom school building in Naray, a basic $23,000 effort, prompted more local requests and a better welcome across the district.

"They don't trust anybody," says an Afghan-American translator named Pali, who visits villages with US patrols and PRT teams.

She remembers the first visit to Mandagal village, when "people were so afraid of the Americans, and women and children were crying. They told us: 'We thought you were just like the Russians' " who occupied Afghanistan during the 1980s, says Pali. "I told them: 'the Americans are different.' " In Mirdish over the weekend, children trailed the soldiers, laughing, and watched from high rooftops.

"The only thing to convince them is to build something and pay people. They are sick and tired of insurgents," says Pali. "They say: 'For heaven's sake, if you are here to build for us - promise and do it. If we see one or two projects, all Nuristan is with you.' "

Though still in its early stages, the US effort is sparking a violent reaction. Before moving into the district last July, officers held meetings and killed a goat with elders, and signed contracts.

But forward bases were attacked daily for weeks. The first 30 days at Kamdesh outpost, as construction got under way, no one took up the US offer to hire base guards for $153 per month. Last week they reached their goal of 60 guards, requiring just two critera that recruits be at least 18 years of age, and have a rifle. But many have aged rifles, or appear too young to grow beards, or both.

Radio chatter indicated that insurgents planned to "attack [Americans] like the Russians." Then insurgents switched to going after convoys on the single-lane dirt road that winds along the river - and invites ambush.

DOJ_NMG_0072954

In the past month, this unit at Kamdesh has earned eight Purple Hearts. One soldier lost a hand to a rocket-propelled grenade round - the only one to make a direct hit out of 30, says Capt. Matt Gooding, commander of Alpha Troop, 3-71 Cav, which is building Kamdesh outpost.

The unit moved here from Helmand Province in the south, where the fighting was intense, but conducted in a by-the-book manner across a desert battlefield.

"In Helmand, you knew when you cleaned house; you knew when you had a good day," says Capt. Gooding. "I don't feel that here, and it's frustrating."

But this unit has become adept at fending off an attack for an hour, then they "transform - you can see it in their faces," says Gooding, when they continue on to a village visit. But still the attacks continue. Insurgents in the dark

On Saturday night last week - during a storm and with no moonlight at all - three groups of 10 to 15 men moved toward the Gowardesh outpost, but were spotted and hit with US mortars and dispersed.

A few days before that, officers called in a 2,000-pound bomb 10 minutes after an ambush. For days after, insurgent radio traffic all but stopped.

"I haven't attacked a thing up here, but I killed a lot of bad guys because they can't bear me being here, putting in water pipe," says Howard, of the frequent ambushes. "Now if [soldiers] go into a village, and enter every home and go through their underwear, who has the high ground then?"

But the Taliban is making its mark. On Aug. 29, a well-known elder from Gowardesh village, Haji Younis, was kidnapped, tortured, and dumped near the Pakistan border. He had signed a US Army contract three days before, and was on the road to get it ratified by the sub-governor when he was abducted.

A note pinned to his clothes said: "Don't work with coalition forces. This will happen to you." It was signed in the name of Mullah Omar, the fugitive Taliban leader.

"Haji Younis was a friend of mine," says Howard. "But his killing backfired. Instead of being intimidated, people were outraged."

A blood feud between families has now erupted, a tradition in Nuristan. Such feuds can last for decades, and often end in further revenge bloodshed.

Ahmad Shah has been another victim. A colonel in the border police, he was killed by a roadside bomb on Sept. 13. The Taliban claimed responsibility, sending "shock waves" that "completely intimidated" the untrained police force, which one US officer says has gone from "extremely awful to just bad." Counterinsurgency a 15 year project

"Realistically, it will take three to five years to be where we want to be with the police," says Col. John "Mick" Nicholson, who commands the 3rd BCT. "This is a counterinsurgency; it's going to take 15 years.... What we're looking for is buy-in."

Some results may be emerging, judging by the number of roadside bombs discovered and turned into US or Afghan forces for cash. Only two of 21 on the main Kamdesh road have exploded, US officers say.

Elders have come to this outpost four times in a week, asking for projects. And Afghan police - green as they are, out in this wilderness - have been passing on tips about the insurgent presence.

"I see indications that we are being successful," Lt. Col. Anthony Feagin, the Kamdesh PRT commander, tells his projects team. "But we've got to make sure we don't make any tactical blunders."

Backstory: A Softer Side Of The Marines (CSM)

By Mary Beth Mccauley

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

BETHESDA, MD.

Marine Staff Sgt. Rudy Perez isn't due to get off duty until midnight, but by 7:30 this evening, his day feels complete.

"I see the weight lifted," says Sergeant Perez, watching a sedate but glowing reunion of wounded Cpl.Brian Smith and his family at the National Naval Medical Center.

Here, thanks to Perez and his staff, who carry out a rich interpretation of the fiercely loyal Marine Corp's tradition of caring for its own, the war in Iraq is already a world away for the newly arrived marine. Seriously injured by a roadside bomb in Fallujah, Iraq, days earlier, his arm heavily bandaged, Corporal Smith rests with his family in the womblike fifth floor hospital lounge.

National Naval is where marines most seriously wounded in Iraq are treated. Here, in one of the military's most emotionally gripping assignments, says Perez, "It's our responsibility to take care of the family as if it was our own family."

Perez's liaison unit reunites the wounded with their families and orchestrates all nonmedical aspects of their stay.

Smith's arrival Aug. 29 by medical transport bus marked the end of a long journey. He came in one of three weekly medical airlifts to nearby Andrews Air Force Base from Landstuhl, Germany, where he'd been stabilized. He'd already had two surgeries to repair the "shark bite" arm wounds that left him near death, "You wanted to go ahead and cry tears of happiness," Smith says of his arrival. "But I'm a marine. I can't cry." He calls the liaison unit "the softer side of the Marines."

The 18-strong all-reserve unit serves as a "five-star concierge service" for patients and families, explains Lt. Col. John Worman. Typically there are 20 to 30 in-patient casualties, and they stay an average of four to six weeks. More than 1,500 have been treated here since the beginning of the war, says Ellen Crown, hospital spokeswoman.

Upon hearing of Smith's expected arrival, Perez and his men went to work - making plane reservations for the family, meeting their flight, taking their bags, driving them to hotel rooms, settling them in before bringing them to the hospital. There, the liaison unit briefed the family on the marine's condition before his arrival, and were available round-the-clock for the rest of his stay.

The liaison unit also serves as a clearinghouse for the many offers of assistance to wounded vets. They stock donated paperbacks, CDs, videos, snacks, clothing, and toiletries. They explain benefits and answer questions about pay. They offer everything from Gatorade to a friendly shoulder to streams of family members.

Unit members have arranged a bedside wedding, a citizens' swearing in, a video-conference introduction of a newborn to a hospitalized father. They've managed to ask the wife of a higher-ranking patient to obey regulations and get out of his bed.

They've learned to give the signature "high and tight" haircut, which, when a patient requests it, they take as a signal of sure recovery. They've learned how to deflect, on behalf of a "sleeping" patient, an offer of a visit from a well-meaning celebrity. "This is not a petting zoo," explains Lance Cpl. Carlos Lopes.

Wounded in 2005, Corporal Lopes is part of a contingent of wounded vets helping out as they receive their own outpatient treatment. Liaison work distracts him from worries about his "guys" back in Iraq, and helps him find the sleep that had eluded him. Here, he gowns up visitors, finds takers for donated baseball tickets, sees each patient several times a day, and visits marines transferred to nearby Walter Reed Army Hospital for prostheses. In free moments, he studies criminal justice online.

"We've been taught that there's nothing that can't be done today," explains Lopes, quoting from a deep vein of Marine Corps truisms.

Cindy Smith, the new patient's mother, appreciates the small kindnesses: "They bring us to the hotel, but they walk us right up to the room." Corporal Smith's daughter has to start school, so Mrs. Smith will take her home to Maine. Meanwhile, liaisons will care for the wounded vet's infant son, while his wife, Jennifer, visits her husband.

The Smith family was "an easy one," says Perez. Smith was a "walk off" - an unexpected delight for everyone who gathered at the flag-lined lobby of Building 10 to welcome his arrival.

There are much more emotionally difficult cases to negotiate. The hospital specializes in head-trauma care, and many of the Marines arrive seriously injured, or unconscious, their conditions shocking even to families who have been prepared ahead of time.

Divorce is another common complication for the liaison job. It can fill the already emotional reunions with rancor and blame. There's the marine's mom who's not talking to his dad, the marine's wife in the same room with his girlfriend, the one parent who favored military service and the other who didn't. Marines who meet families at the airport tend to be on the receiving end of anger, but know not to take it personally. "You go 'yes, ma'am; no, sir.' You treat them like you would treat your own parents," says Sgt. Jason Becerril.

The marines here seem to consider the popu-lar "oppose the war but support the troops" sentiment ridiculous, though they're too polite to come right out and say so. Largely, pro or con feelings about the war itself seem to be left at the gate.

"Up here they seem to be focused on their son's health," says Colonel Worman. The officer, whose brother died in Iraq in 2005, says that Elisabeth Kubler-Ross's writing on the stages of grief have helped him deal with families of the injured. But mostly, he relies on his instincts and experience.

So, too, does Master Sgt. Terrell "Top" Jones, a sardonic, tough-guy sort, whose office decor features both the salty and the sacred. His most memorable request was from a father, not a practicing Catholic, who sought a godfather to step forward so his dying son could be baptized. Sergeant Jones, a Catholic, volunteered. The patient died three days later.

"What school teaches you that?" Jones asks bluntly.

First impressions - neat, direct, polite, and thoughtful - mean something here.

"We represent the Marine Corps," says Jones, of the attention to detail. In the end, what his unit proffers to families is the very identity of the Corps.

"I had heard about that 'band of brothers' thing, and I thought it was stupid," admits Mrs. Smith. But now she has joined the brotherhood, as - at her son's request - the Smiths have become surrogate kin to the marine who was injured alongside him, but whose family can't come to Bethesda. "I can understand the bond now."

Down the hall on this late-August night, Wally Howard, of Orlando, Fla., and his wife, have been standing vigil for their son round-the-clock since mid-July.Lance Cpl. Patrick W. Howard, wounded by insurgent mortar fire July 18, remains bedridden, with a seemingly endless list of internal injuries and fractures. His parents haven't left the Bethesda base since the day they arrived, relying on the liaison unit completely.

"If it weren't for the way we've been treated in here, we wouldn't be able to do what we're doing," says Wally Howard.

His marine's most recent request: a haircut.

Qwest Communications Judge Approves Settlement With Shareholders In Suit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

A judge gave final approval to a $400 million settlement of a consolidated shareholder lawsuit that accused Qwest Communications International Inc. of civil fraud in connection with a multibillion-dollar accounting scandal. The settlement, announced in November 2005, covers Qwest and most former executives, except former Chief Executive Officer Joe Nacchio and former Chief Financial Officer Robert Woodruff. Qwest, a telephone-service provider based in Denver, will pay the money into a fund to compensate shareholders. U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn in Denver stayed action on the remaining claims against Messrs. Woodruff and Nacchio until spring after Mr. Nacchio's trial on criminal charges is scheduled to conclude. Mr. Nacchio has pleaded not guilty to 42 counts of insider trading. The Securities and Exchange Commission has said fraud occurred at Qwest in April 1999 to March 2002, which allowed the company to improperly report about $3 billion in revenue that later was restated. The shareholder lawsuit alleged that Qwest, and former officers and board members, concealed information about the revenue.

Fastow A Key For Plaintiffs In Bank Suits (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Andrew S. Fastow is telling all, naming names, and the lawyers suing Enron's former banks on behalf of investors say that his words could lead to billions of dollars in fresh settlements.

Mr. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, was sentenced last week to six years in jail for stealing from Enron and devising schemes to deceive investors about the energy company's true financial condition. In his last weeks of freedom, he spent long days giving plaintiffs' lawyers his account of the role that banks played in helping Enron disguise how much debt and how little cash it had.

Lawyers have already won settlements for $7.3 billion of the $40 billion investors claim they lost in Enron's collapse. Most of that money has come from banks, like J. P. Morgan Chase, Bank of America, Citigroup and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Seven other banks have not settled.

Until now, the plaintiffs' lawyers have had to rely primarily on documents to try to prove that banks played a central role in Enron's false accounting. But Mr. Fastow, the Enron executive who worked most closely with the banks, has been explaining the motives for many of Enron's bank dealings, putting them in context and recounting conversations with top bank officials, according to two plaintiffs' lawyers and Mr. Fastow's civil defense lawyer, Craig Smyser.

It remains to be seen if assistance from Mr. Fastow will prove convincing in a courtroom and be a help to the plaintiffs. Nevertheless, the information that Mr. Fastow has provided so far has given a new burst of confidence to lawyers suing Enron that they can force the remaining banks in the case to settle claims or prevail at trial, if necessary.

Those lawyers say that Mr. Fastow has provided an insider's perspective and a road map of many of the bank transactions that investors assert were a large part of the Enron fraud. The transactions allowed Enron to experience its explosive growth in the late 1990's before its sudden collapse in December 2001.

Mr. Fastow, 44, originally decided to cooperate with the civil lawyers in part to try to reduce his own prison sentence. But he has agreed to give a full deposition over the next few weeks. If a judge does not decide otherwise, the deposition will take place in prison or a detention center.

In interviews over the weekend, Mr. Smyser and lawyers suing the banks said that the banks were already expressing concern over a 25-page declaration that Mr. Fastow turned over to the plaintiffs' lawyers before he was sentenced. In it, he said he viewed certain banks as "problem solvers" that Enron turned to when it needed to resolve its financial problems. Those banks designed complex financial structures that helped Enron meet its financial reporting targets, Mr. Fastow wrote.

Mark Herr, a spokesman for Merrill Lynch, said that Mr. Fastow's declaration was "produced at a time when he was seeking a more lenient sentence" and "should be seen for what it is: a series of unproved and stale claims that have not been tested in open court or been subject to cross-examination." Merrill Lynch, one of the banks named in the investor suits, was identified by Mr. Fastow as a "problem solver."

William S. Lerach, the lead lawyer representing investors suing Enron and the banks, said that the declaration was "just the tip of the iceberg" of what Mr. Fastow has been telling the civil lawyers.

Mr. Smyser said Sunday that there had been a flurry of correspondence and phone calls between him and the banks' lawyers. "They want to know what is coming down the pipe, and they have an indication from Andy's declaration that it isn't going to be pleasant," he said. "I suspect it is their worst nightmare."

Despite truckloads of documents from Enron and the banks, and millions of dollars spent on the case so far, civil lawyers had struggled to learn much of anything from the banks' own employees. Plaintiffs' lawyers took 175 depositions from bank officials over the last 18 months, most of them running 15 hours long. Yet nearly all of those officials either exercised their Fifth Amendment right to not testify or said they did not recall anything relevant, according to two lawyers involved in the case.

That finally began to change when lawyers for the plaintiffs first sat down with Mr. Fastow in late August in a conference room at Mr. Smyser's downtown Houston office. After that initial 90-minute meeting, the civil lawyers set up a series of six meetings in September totaling almost 40 hours, two lawyers involved in the meetings said.

Each meeting focused on a different set of banks, including Barclays, Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse First Boston, Deutsche Bank, Royal Bank of Canada, Royal Bank of Scotland and Toronto-Dominion. One meeting focused exclusively on LJM, the off-the-books financing structure that Mr. Fastow set up to help Enron hide its debt and buttress its earnings. Before the meetings, lawyers sent binders — some nine inches thick — for Mr. Fastow and his lawyer to study.

Mr. Fastow was generally patient and friendly, the lawyers said. But he sometimes grew impatient at having to repeatedly explain how certain transactions worked, they said. On the morning of Sept. 18, Mr. Fastow became upset upon learning that Judge Kenneth Hoyt had sentenced David W. Delainey, a former Enron executive, to 30 months in prison for one count of insider trading, reducing his sentence by only 90 days. Most legal experts had expected Mr. Delainey to receive probation for his extensive cooperation in helping the government convict Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling.

Just minutes after learning of Mr. Delainey's fate, Mr. Fastow stared at a lawyer in the conference room and said, "I'm done, my fate is sealed," according to a lawyer who was there.

Some plaintiffs' lawyers grew worried that Mr. Fastow would walk out of the meeting, seeing little personal benefit from continuing to cooperate with the civil lawyers. But he kept his agreement to help them. And the judge eventually did reduce his sentence, seeming to say, in effect, that Mr. Fastow and his family had suffered enough; his wife, Lea, had served one year in jail for falsifying a tax return related to one of Mr. Fastow's schemes to skim money from the company.

Civil lawyers said they had been impressed with Mr. Fastow's recall of specific transactions with the banks. Mr. Fastow cited four conversations, for example, related to an electricity trade done with Merrill Lynch in 1999 to help Enron meets its earnings numbers. He has supported the plaintiffs' position that e-mail messages show that Enron made a verbal agreement with Merrill to get the bank out of the deal in June of 2000 and would pay the bank $17 million for doing the transaction, the civil lawyers said. Merrill Lynch has repeatedly denied that there was any agreement to unwind the trade.

But information Mr. Fastow can provide about Royal Bank of Scotland and others may prove to be the most valuable to the plaintiffs, Mr. Lerach said. Mr. Fastow has told plaintiffs' lawyers that verbal assurances that he gave to Royal Bank of Scotland and other banks were considered guarantees that the banks' equity investments would be repaid. A spokesman for Royal Bank of Scotland did not respond to calls and e-mail messages Friday and over the weekend.

Mr. Fastow's deposition will take an estimated 10 days, plus more than two weeks of preparation, said one lawyer involved in the case. Some 80 lawyers will probably to want to attend. The plaintiffs' lawyers have requested that Judge Hoyt let Mr. Fastow give his deposition soon, before he enters prison, and have asked that he be allowed day passes to give his testimony at law offices in downtown Houston.

Hours in front of a microphone being peppered with questions might be a relief for Mr. Fastow. He is currently in solitary confinement in a Houston detention center, awaiting assignment to a prison. His cell is so filthy that Mr. Fastow, dressed in an orange jumpsuit, has taken to doing pushups with his feet on the bed and his hands on the sink, said Mr. Smyser, who last visited him on Saturday.

Drama In The Boardroom (WSJ)

By JOANN S. LUBLIN And ERIN WHITE

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

Corporate directors, pressed to become more vocal following the scandals of the Enron era, are throwing their weight around more, rubber-stamping management less -- and roiling many once-clubby boardrooms.

DOJ_NMG_0072958

At General Motors Corp., Jerome York, a representative of investor Kirk Kerkorian, joined the board in February and is pushing GM to weigh an alliance with Japan's Nissan Motor Co. and France's Renault SA. Unhappy representatives of the Chandler family on the Tribune Co. board have forced the media company to consider big strategic moves, including a breakup of the company. At H.J. Heinz Co., investor Nelson Peltz captured two board seats after urging Heinz to cut costs and boost marketing of its core ketchup brand. Heinz accelerated cuts and announced a restructuring that wasn't too different from Mr. Peltz's plan. He attends his first board meeting next month.

Few boards, though, have matched the degree of all-out war achieved at Hewlett-Packard Co., where investigations into boardroom leaks mushroomed to include spying on directors, executives and journalists. The divisions were rooted partly in disputes among three independent directors, including Patricia Dunn, until recently H-P's chairman. Extreme though that situation may be, it does highlight the pitfalls that may await a board whose directors are fiercely independent of management and, at times, antagonistic toward one another.

Propelled by changes in stock-exchange rules and the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-reform law, more independent directors have more leadership positions on boards and meet more often without management. Adding to the mix are several other forces, including mergers that have left a legacy of distrust, forceful investors who have won board seats through persuasion or proxy fights and directors' fears of personal liability for corporate misdeeds.

Friction is inevitable in such circumstances, directors and board watchers say. "With the emphasis on board governance, you certainly are seeing directors unwilling to go along with the CEO and the consensus" of other directors, observes Stephen Hardis, outside chairman of insurance giant Marsh & McLennan Cos. and a member of six other boards. "They say, 'I can't just go along to get along.' "

Adds William George, former chief executive of Medtronic Inc. and a director at three public companies: "I think we're correcting the imbalance that existed five years ago....It's unhealthy when boards become more of a rubber stamp to management."

The roster of potentially fractious corporate boards seems to grow by the week. There have been 80 proxy contests for board seats in 2006, more than double the 29 such fights in all of 2004, according to estimates by FactSet Research Systems Inc., of Norwalk, Conn. About 62% of this year's challengers have succeeded, up from 41% two years ago.

At ImClone Systems Inc., investor Carl Icahn and three allies won board seats last month after threatening a proxy fight. His first day on the board, Mr. Icahn demanded that Chairman David Kies resign. Mr. Kies was re-elected at a board meeting that lasted five hours. Last week, Mr. Icahn, who owns almost 14% of ImClone, proposed ousting six of the company's 12 directors. Mr. Kies says Mr. Icahn is trying to seize control of the company without paying a premium to shareholders.

At Blockbuster Inc., meanwhile, Mr. Icahn and two allies last year won board seats after a bitter proxy fight. Mr. Icahn pushed through a 70%, one-year cut in the annual retainer paid to directors, to $15,000 from $50,000, over some board members' objections. Mr. Icahn initially had only two allies on the seven-member board. But with careful lobbying, he says, a dissident minority can persuade other directors to "eventually see it your way....It's human nature. You talk to people. Board members start seeing the other side."

Historically, split votes have been rare in U.S. boardrooms; at many companies, open disagreement during discussions borders on heresy. That is changing. At Valeant Pharmaceuticals International, a Costa Mesa, Calif., drug company with a turbulent past, directors value their independence so highly that they encourage members to cast dissenting votes.

"We've developed a culture where we're comfortable" with nonunanimous decisions, because "we respect each other," says Richard Koppes, a director and an attorney for Jones Day in San Francisco. Board meetings last longer than they used to, he adds. "There have been times when people change their minds. And at times, we agree to disagree."

Last year, Valeant directors amended an approved executive-pay plan after some directors voiced concerns by casting dissenting votes, according to a person close to the situation.

Formerly known as ICN Pharmaceuticals Inc., Valeant in 2002 ousted its chief executive, Milan Panic, after he lost a fight for control of the nine-member board. Mr. Panic, a Serbian-born immigrant who served briefly as prime minister of Yugoslavia, refused to relinquish his directorship before his term expired. During the first board meeting of the revamped ICN board, "you could cut the tensions with a knife," recalls Mr. Koppes, one of the newly elected directors.

Before leaving the board in 2003, Mr. Panic repeatedly cast dissenting votes. That made for a difficult period, Mr. Koppes says, but he adds that Mr. Panic's opposition "caused people to think" about the importance of dissenting votes. Now, when a dissent is cast, Mr. Koppes says, "that means there has been a full debate."

Through a spokesman, Mr. Panic says Valeant "has been terribly managed" since his departure. "All they have done is cost jobs and hundreds of millions of dollars in shareholder value and operating losses," the spokesman says.

Fears of boardroom divisions have proved groundless, in some cases. At Marsh, former U.S. Attorney Zachary W. Carter joined the board in 2004 with the backing of four big public-employee pension funds. Mr. Hardis says he initially worried that boardroom collegiality might suffer. But Mr. Carter says he "made it clear that I saw my responsibilities as representing all investors and not just one group."

A few months later, Mr. Carter turned out to be a big asset for Marsh, after New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer filed a lawsuit accusing Marsh's insurance-brokerage unit of bid rigging. Mr. Carter, a friend of Mr. Spitzer, helped arrange a critical meeting between Mr. Spitzer and four independent directors. Jeffrey W. Greenberg, Marsh's chairman and CEO, soon quit, and Marsh reached an $850 million settlement in January 2005.

Worried about increased boardroom discord, more directors are seeking help with handling disagreements, reports David A. Nadler, chairman of Mercer Delta Consulting, a New York firm that advises boards and CEOs. During the past few years, he says, he has seen greater interest from board members keen to examine "the critical issue of how do we work together with each other and with management."

Experts say that some argument can be healthy but warn that boards must learn to manage disagreement constructively or risk becoming dysfunctional, as H-P's board did. An increasingly popular tactic is the use of board peer evaluations, Mr. Nadler says. "Four or five years ago, [such evaluations were] almost unheard of," but now some 10% to 15% of major boards use them, he says. Some problems directors encounter with peers include inadequate preparation for meetings, asking too few questions, asking too many unhelpful questions -- or leaking information to employees or the news media.

Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware and a director at three public companies, says discussions need to be frank, but disagreements "shouldn't devolve into the personal." Lead directors, chairmen and committee chairman are important in helping reach a consensus. One tactic is to adjourn for a few days. "Give people a day or two to rethink things," Mr. Elson says. "Don't have a hasty vote."

Boardroom veterans say diplomacy can overcome many disputes. Raymond Troubh, who serves on six public company boards, recalls how the lead independent director at one company resolved a disagreement a couple of years ago regarding the renomination of another director. He declines to identify the company. The lead director spoke with directors individually and summarized each camp's position without the heated rhetoric. In the end, the director was renominated unanimously.

Silicon Valley's Outsiders: In-House Lawyers? (WSJ)

By Ashby Jones

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

In the past two decades, in-house corporate lawyers have grown in clout and stature at many U.S. companies. But that trend hasn't fully taken hold in Silicon Valley, some lawyers say.

Lately, two scandals -- Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board-leak investigation and the backdating of stock options -- are shining a light on the role of in-house lawyers at Silicon Valley technology companies.

Those situations each present different facts. But lawyers inside and outside the valley say in-house lawyers at technology companies sometimes lack the respect the position commands elsewhere. One indication: Some big Silicon Valley companies don't have general counsel -- the title typically conferred on top in-house attorneys.

At H-P, longtime General Counsel Ann Baskins resigned Thursday, hours before a congressional hearing on an H-P investigation into press leaks that included potentially illegal tactics to obtain private phone records. Former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn said she relied upon Ms. Baskins's judgment about the propriety of the investigation.

Ms. Baskins's lawyers said she acted legally and ethically. Meanwhile, more than two dozen Silicon Valley companies are under scrutiny for past stock-option grants that may have enriched executives and violated accounting rules.

Despite some changes, general counsel in Silicon Valley are still sometimes "seen as a blockage to the execution" of the company's plans, says Scott Bohannon, general manager of the General Counsel Roundtable, a Washington research organization.

As an in-house lawyer in the valley, "you've got one hand tied behind your back," said Mark Michael, general counsel of computer-networking-equipment maker 3Com Corp. from 1986 until 2003. "You have to do the job, but you're just not empowered or funded." For instance, Mr. Michael says he struggled unsuccessfully for years to upgrade his department's technology.

A 3Com spokesman said, "I can't speak for Mr. Michael's tenure here, but we feel our current GC, Neal Goldman, has broad access to the CEO and board, and has ample resources to do his job."

To some, the status of in-house lawyers in the valley reflects the relative youth of an industry that worships technical innovation. "No" -- the message in-house lawyers often have to deliver -- isn't the message some driven entrepreneurs want to hear.

Silicon Valley's most influential attorneys have traditionally been outside lawyers, such as Larry Sonsini, who counsel young companies on venture funding, mergers and acquisitions and stock offerings. Mr. Sonsini, chairman of Wilson Sonsini

Goodrich & Rosati, is H-P's outside counsel and was on the board of Brocade Communications Systems Inc., where two former executives have been indicted on criminal-fraud charges. The former executives deny the charges.

By comparison, in-house lawyers sometimes play second fiddle. "It's still not uncommon to see outside counsel ignore the internal counsel," said Donald Keller, a partner in Orrick Herrington & Sutcliffe's Menlo Park, Calif., office. Some in-house lawyers command attention from other executives, Mr. Keller said, but often they are "regarded as a necessary evil."

A similar arrangement prevailed at most U.S. companies for generations. In-house lawyers farmed out tough issues to outside counsel. Inside corporations, where power typically flows to those who generate revenue, the general counsel's office was often viewed as a mere cost center.

In the past 20 years, however, general counsel have won a stronger voice with senior executives and directors. One key figure in that development was Benjamin Heineman Jr., the top lawyer at General Electric Co. from 1987 to 2005. Mr. Heineman recruited high-powered legal talent. Many of his protégés went on to become strong and respected top lawyers elsewhere, including Maura Abeln Smith at International Paper Co. and Jeffrey B. Kindler at McDonald's Corp. and Pfizer Inc. Mr. Kindler was named Pfizer's chief executive in July.

Some Silicon Valley general counsel do have reputations for leading strong departments and wielding influence within their companies, including Bruce Sewell at Intel Corp., Mark Chandler at Cisco Systems Inc. and Thomas McCoy at Advanced Micro Devices Inc., whose formal title is vice president of legal affairs.

Joseph Grundfest, a former member of the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission who now teaches at Stanford Law School, said Silicon Valley's in-house lawyers are no stronger or weaker than in other industries. In the wake of corporate scandals, Mr. Grundfest says, "pressures on general counsel are up in Silicon Valley, but they're up at nontech companies too."

Some big Silicon Valley companies don't have general counsel. Cypress Semiconductor Corp., which has a $2.5 billion market capitalization, doesn't have a general counsel; its two staff lawyers report to the head of new product development. Novellus Systems Inc., a maker of semiconductor-manufacturing equipment with a market capitalization of $3.4 billion, hasn't had a general counsel in at least a year, though a spokeswoman says the company is looking to hire one.

"It's shocking to me that any public company would exist without a general counsel," said Richard Koppes, a lawyer at Jones Day in San Francisco and the former general counsel at the California Public Employees' Retirement System, one of the nation's largest public-pension funds. Mr. Koppes says he knows of one former general counsel at a Silicon Valley company who resigned because senior executives wouldn't crack down on behavior he considered unethical.

Anne Jordan, former general counsel at software maker PeopleSoft Inc., said thinly staffed Silicon Valley legal departments often are hard-pressed to provide adequate oversight or to change the way a company monitors itself. "You tend to [go along] with how things are [already] being done," said Ms. Jordan, who left PeopleSoft in 2004, shortly before the company was acquired by Oracle Corp.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Republican Leaders Scramble To Contain Mark Foley Fallout (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Pummeled by Democrats and their own self-doubts, Republicans worked to get ahead of the Mark Foley page scandal, with the White House moving toward a criminal investigation that might take some heat off the majority party.

In back-to-back letters released last night, Speaker Dennis Hastert formally asked both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to begin inquiries, and the Illinois Republican said the investigations should look at both Mr. Foley's conduct and how some of the most sexually explicit messages were kept secret for as long as three years.

"There is going to be, I'm sure, a criminal investigation into the particulars of this case," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said on CNN's "Late Edition."

But House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) demanded that the House Ethics Committee begin its own inquiry and take sworn testimony from Republican leaders about what they knew of the Florida congressman's improper advances to teenage male pages in emails and suggestive instant messages.

"Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year, and they chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," Ms. Pelosi wrote in a letter to the ethics committee.

Coming just weeks before midterm elections, Mr. Foley's resignation Friday and the ensuing scandal aren't well-timed for Republican fortunes. As lawmakers left Washington over the weekend to campaign, the news soured a political mood already strained by divisions between the House and Senate leadership and a failure to complete major domestic legislation.

A Host of Bills Left Unfinished

Defense, port and homeland-security bills passed in the final hours, along with new restrictions on Internet gambling. But unfinished were a host of domestic spending bills and tax-break extensions, as well as energy and immigration legislation.

With the Latino vote being courted by both parties, one of the last measures committed more than $1 billion to build more fencing along the Mexican border and tacitly blessed buying prescription drugs from Canada -- but not Mexico.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to capture the House; the threat to the majority is that the Foley matter will reawaken doubts about Republican failure to deal more aggressively with scandals. Legislation to tighten lobbying and ethics rules was among measures left undone, and while the leadership says there is little voter interest in such issues, sexual advances to teenage boys is another matter.

A number of individual Democratic challengers called on Republican incumbents to return money raised by Mr. Foley. For example, in New Mexico, where state Attorney General Patricia Madrid is running against Rep. Heather Wilson, a news release from Ms. Madrid's campaign read, "Wilson has $6,000 in dirty money from congressman who made improper advances to underage boy." Republican incumbents facing tough races in states such as Connecticut were outspoken that their party leaders must be held accountable.

Leaders deny any attempt at a coverup and expressed surprise and anger at learning last week the full scope of Mr. Foley's advances. But Republicans now say they made a serious error last fall, when the first warnings of potential trouble emerged, by not informing Michigan Rep. Dale Kildee, the lead House Democrat on the six-member board that oversees the page program.

Private Warning

That board, which includes three members of Congress as well as professional officers such as the House clerk, was set up in its current form after sex scandals involving lawmakers and House pages in the mid-1980s. But rather than call a board meeting, Rep. John Shimkus (R., Ill.), the chairman, went to Mr. Foley and warned him privately against what were described by Republican lawmakers as nonsexual, but "overly friendly" emails to a former page.

Jeff Trandahl, who was then the House clerk, has yet to comment publicly on the matter, but according to Mr. Shimkus's account, Mr. Trandahl accompanied him when he met with Mr. Foley.

Left out of the loop was Mr. Kildee, a former seminarian who isn't a partisan figure in the House. Mr. Kildee said Mr. Shimkus told him last week he felt "broken hearted" about the matter. "Absolutely there should have been a page board meeting," Mr. Kildee said.

"It is made up of a cross section of members and our role is to make sure these children have a safe environment," Mr. Kildee said.

Republican leaders issued a joint statement Saturday describing Mr. Foley's actions as an "obscene breach of trust" and saying his resignation "must be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system." In his letter to Mr. Gonzales, Mr. Hastert said media reports, including those earlier by ABC News, indicate the most explicit exchanges actually predate the email exchanges last year, which began around August 2005.

The early communications, "of which no one in the House leadership was aware of to my knowledge, reportedly were sent sometime in 2003," Mr. Hastert told the attorney general.

The speaker said there should be a twofold investigation, of the messages first, but also of the fact that there "are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities."

"I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter -- be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives or anyone outside the Congress."

Hastert Asks Justice To Investigate Foley Exchanges (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, October 2, 2006

By Laura Litvan and Jay Newton-Small

Oct. 1 (Bloomberg) -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert asked the Justice Department to investigate Representative Mark Foley's exchanged of sexually explicit messages with an underage employee of Congress.

Today's request by Hastert follows calls from Democrats for a full inquiry into Foley's actions and those of Republican leaders, who learned months ago that the Florida Republican was communicating by e-mail with at least one teenage congressional page and kept the matter under wraps. Foley resigned Sept. 29 after ABC New asked him about graphic messages he exchanged with another page.

``These sexually explicit communications warrant a criminal referral," Hastert said in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that was released by the speaker's office.

Foley, 52, was a member of the House Ways and Means Committee and co-chairman of the House's Missing and Exploited Children Caucus. Republicans now may struggle to hold onto his seat in what has been a strongly Republican district in central Florida. They also are defending two others, in Ohio and Texas, where the Republican incumbent declined to run because of ethics scandals.

Congressional Seat

Democrats, who need to gain 15 seats in the Nov. 7 elections to take control of the House, seized on the scandal. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid earlier in the day urged Gonzalez to investigate Foley's actions and those of Republican leaders, who he said ignored warnings about the Florida representative ``to preserve a congressional seat this election year."

Asked about Reid's request, Justice Department spokeswoman Donna Sellers, citing department policy, said she couldn't comment on whether the case is under investigation.

Representative Sherrod Brown of Ohio, who is running to unseat Republican Senator Mike DeWine in November, called for Hastert to resign as House speaker. Republican leaders have ``forfeited any public trust," he said on NBC's ``Meet the Press" program.

Critics focused on the issue of what and when Republican leaders knew about the e-mails. Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Karen Finney questioned ``whether there was an attempt to cover up criminal activity involving a minor to keep it from coming to light before Election Day."

Timeline

Hastert's spokesman, Ron Bonjean, said the speaker was in his home district in Illinois today. The Foley scandal hasn't endangered Hastert's hold on his job as speaker, Bonjean said.

``The speaker is working hard with his Republican colleagues to maintain the House of Representatives and serves at the pleasure of the House Republican Conference," Bonjean said.

Republican leaders over the past two days have issued a series of statements about Foley's contacts with the pages and the sequence of events.

Representative Tom Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said in a statement yesterday that Representative Rodney Alexander told him months ago about exchanges with a page who was from Alexander's native Louisiana. Reynolds said he didn't know the exact content of the messages and informed Hastert.

The speaker's office said in a statement yesterday that Hastert doesn't recall Reynolds telling him earlier this year about the matter but has ``no reason to dispute" Reynolds.

Hastert's letter to Gonzalez notes that ``there are two different and distinct communications at issue here." The letter says he was made aware of an e-mail ``determined to be `overly friendly' by Representative Alexander's office but was not sexual in nature."

Sequence

House Majority Leader John Boehner told the Washington Post Sept. 29 that when he learned of Foley's e-mails in the late spring he immediately told Hastert, who appeared to be aware of the problem already. Boehner contacted the newspaper again hours later and said he wasn't sure he'd spoken with Hastert, the Post reported.

Hastert's office said yesterday that an aide to the speaker met with Alexander's chief of staff in the fall of 2005 to discuss the matter. The aide informed the clerk of the House, the statement said.

Hastert's staff said that the matter was brought to Reynolds's attention in the spring of this year.

``Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Reynolds said in his statement.

Congressional pages come from around the country to spend their high school junior year working as messengers and taking special classes.

Dan Bartlett, one of President George W. Bush's top advisers, called the allegation ``shocking" and said the president was unaware of the matter until it was revealed publicly last week.

While endorsing a criminal investigation of Foley's conduct, the White House counselor said Republican leaders are acting appropriately by disclosing what they knew of the matter and seeking a congressional investigation.

``That's the best place for it to handled," Bartlett said on CNN's ``Late Edition" program.

Democratic Representative Jane Harman of California said that may not be enough.

``There's been a Republican investigation, for 24 hours, of Republican activity," she said on the ``Fox News Sunday" program. ``I just don't think that that is adequate."

According to e-mails posted on the Internet by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a non-profit watchdog group, Foley, a six-term House veteran, asked an unidentified male page for a picture and what he wanted for his birthday. ``This freaked me out," the page wrote when forwarding the e- mails to someone else.

ABC News said the network obtained excerpts of instant messages provided by former pages who said Foley made references to sex acts and made comments about their bodies.

FBI Looks At Foley's E-mails To Teens (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 2, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert asked the Justice Department on Sunday to investigate former congressman Mark Foley's communications with teenage boys who worked as House pages. The FBI is "conducting an assessment to determine whether any federal laws were broken," bureau spokesman Richard Kolko said.

Hastert has said he knew about non-sexual e-mails that Foley, 52, a Florida Republican, sent to a 16-year-old former page, first reported by ABC News on Thursday. The speaker said he did not know about allegedly more explicit communications. Foley resigned Friday after the network asked him for comment.

The e-mails and instant messages have not been independently verified by USA TODAY and were not mentioned by Foley in his resignation letter.

On Sunday, Hastert asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate Foley's communications with current and former pages and find out whether anyone knew about but did not report them.

Democrats, meanwhile, demanded a House investigation to determine whether Republican leaders covered up Foley's actions.

House Republicans stood by Hastert and the GOP leadership for now. "If it is found that any member of Congress or staff willingly participated in a coverup of Mr. Foley's actions, that individual should resign immediately," said Rep. Rob Simmons, R-Conn.

Foley, co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, helped write a law signed by President Bush in July that toughened prison sentences for sex offenders. He told USA TODAY earlier this year the bill was needed because of online child exploitation. Referring to online predators, he said: "We're going to make your life a living hell."

The political stir is the latest setback for Republicans, whose House majority is threatened in next month's elections. They already are battling Bush's low poll ratings and concerns about the war in Iraq.

Foley is the fourth House Republican forced out by ethics problems in the past year. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California resigned in November after pleading guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes. Former majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas was indicted on state campaign finance violations and resigned in June. Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio has agreed to plead guilty to charges of corruption and is not seeking re-election.

"It's not as if Republicans didn't have enough problems," said independent political analyst Stuart Rothenberg.

Two sets of communications are in question. Hastert said that in fall 2005, his office looked into e-mails Foley sent last year to a 16-year-old boy, in which Foley asked for a photo. "Sexually explicit" instant messages dating back to 2003 just came to light, the speaker said Sunday, citing media reports.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi called on the House ethics committee Sunday to question GOP leaders under oath. "They chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," she said.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said GOP leaders "showed caution." Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., said the issue could backfire "if Republicans knew what was going on and allowed it to happen."

Review Of Messages Sent By Congressman Begins (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — Law enforcement officials said Sunday that the F.B.I. had begun a preliminary inquiry into whether former Representative Mark Foley broke any federal laws when he reportedly exchanged sexually explicit e-mail messages with under-age Congressional pages as leaders of both parties demanded new inquiries.

Officials described the F.B.I. action as a review of the evidence and relevant statutes to determine whether to open a full investigation, though one appeared likely.

At the same time, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert asked the Justice Department on Sunday not only to investigate Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican who resigned on Friday after ABC News confronted him with the e-mail messages, but also to determine who possessed the messages that have touched off a furor weeks before the November elections.

"Since the communications appear to have existed for three years, there should be an investigation into the extent there are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities," the letter from Mr. Hastert to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said.

Top Democrats in the House and the Senate also demanded investigations, and Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, called on Republican leaders to be questioned under oath by the ethics committee about their handling of the case.

Republicans leaders — including Representatives John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, and Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the party's Congressional campaign committee — acknowledged this weekend that they had been aware for months of e-mail traffic between Mr. Foley and a 16-year-old Louisiana boy. Mr. Reynolds said he had also told Mr. Hastert, though Mr. Hastert said he did not remember the conversation. Several other high-level aides also knew of the e-mail.

The initial messages, though not overtly sexual, alarmed the boy's parents and led to Mr. Foley's being questioned by the clerk of the House and the Republican chairman of the board that oversees the page program. Mr. Foley told them the communications were innocent. They directed him to break off contact and then apparently dropped the matter, saying the parents did not want to take other action.

Ms. Pelosi accused Republicans of putting Mr. Foley's political welfare ahead of the page's in a letter she sent to the ethics panel, which had received a call for an investigation approved by the House on Friday.

"Since that resolution unanimously passed, Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year, and they chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," Ms. Pelosi said, asking that the inquiry be initiated within 10 days.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, also called for an investigation by the Justice Department. "The allegations against Congressman Foley are repugnant, but equally as bad is the possibility that Republican leaders in the House of Representatives knew there was a problem and ignored it to preserve a Congressional seat this election year," Mr. Reid said. The public deserves "a full accounting for this despicable episode," he added.

In his letter to Mr. Gonzales, Mr. Hastert drew a line between what he described as "two different and distinct communications at issue here" — the e-mail messages to the Louisiana boy that Republicans considered "overfriendly," and the more intimate messages that surfaced later and that leaders say they never saw.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Ms. Pelosi, said Mr. Hastert seemed "more concerned by who revealed the Republican leadership's cover-up of Mr. Foley's Internet stalking" than about the pages.

Mr. Hastert also wrote Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida asking for an investigation by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. The authorities there, both local and state, said on Sunday that they had not begun one so far.

Garry Wilson, chief deputy sheriff in St. Lucie County, said his office would not try to search Mr. Foley's condominium on Hutchinson Island unless a complaint was filed against him in the county or unless state or federal law enforcement directed the sheriff's office to do so.

In Washington, the clerk of the House has taken responsibility for Mr. Foley's Congressional office, and the locks have been changed. Associates of Mr. Foley said he was apparently in seclusion in Florida.

For a third straight day, fallout surrounding Mr. Foley's resignation worried the weary ranks of Congressional Republicans. As representatives begin the final month of campaigning before the midterm elections, several Republican advisers said on Sunday that they feared that the scandal over the e-mail messages threatened to complicate their efforts. If nothing else, they said, it provides another reason for voters to be displeased with Congress.

"Its been a time bomb from Day 1," said a Republican strategist who is close to the party's Congressional leaders and the White House and who was granted anonymity to speak freely about internal party concerns. "Now, it's sad for the whole House."

The Democratic National Committee seized on the scandal, sending out a scathing statement that raised pointed questions about Mr. Hastert and other Republican leaders. In bold red type, the dispatch asked: "What did Coach H and his buddies know and when did they know it?"

It was a rare instance in this fierce political season that Republicans were not quick to respond. The Republican National Committee has not commented on the scandal, and nearly a dozen Republican members of Congress either declined to be interviewed or did not return telephone calls about the matter on Sunday.

In some competitive House races across the country, Democrats have already started making an issue of Mr. Foley's resignation. On Sunday, Diane Farrell, who is challenging Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, said voters should hold Republicans accountable in November for the scandal.

"That the Republican House leadership apparently knew of this situation but took no action is yet another example of why this leadership must change, Ms. Farrell said, issuing a statement one day after Mr. Shays denounced the actions of Mr. Foley.

In New Mexico, Patricia Madrid called on her Republican opponent, Representative Heather A. Wilson, to return campaign contributions from Mr. Foley. Hours later, Ms. Wilson responded that she would donate the $8,000 she had received to charity.

Mr. Foley, who served on the House Ways and Means Committee, was a prolific fund-raiser. His campaign account had a balance of $2.7 million at the end of August, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission.

Carl Forti, the communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Sunday that the committee would gladly accept Mr. Foley's money or part of it to devote to House races. Mr. Foley already gave $100,000 to the committee in July, campaign records show, as part of the party's Battleground Program, to which members are asked to contribute.

"The money is in the control of Mr. Foley," Mr. Forti said. "Whatever he decides to do with it is up to him."

FBI To Examine Foley's E-Mails (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The FBI announced last night that it is looking into whether former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) broke federal law by sending inappropriate e-mails and instant messages to teenage House pages.

The announcement came hours after House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert asked for a Justice Department investigation into not only Foley's actions but also Congress's handling of the matter once it learned of the contacts.

In his letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Hastert (R-Ill.) acknowledged that some of Foley's most sexually explicit instant messages were sent to former House pages in 2003. That was two years before lawmakers say they learned of a more ambiguous 2005 e-mail that led only to a quiet warning to Foley to leave pages alone.

Foley, 52, abruptly resigned Friday, and Democrats have since been hammering Hastert and other GOP leaders. They have accused Republicans of covering up the matter and allowing Foley to remain as co-chair of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus instead of launching an inquiry and possibly uncovering the raunchier communications.

As the scandal broke, Hastert contended he learned of concerns about Foley only last week. But after Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) said Saturday that he had notified Hastert months ago of Foley's e-mails to a 16-year-old boy, the speaker did not dispute his colleague, and Hastert's office acknowledged that some aides knew last year that Foley had been ordered to cease contact with the youth.

Republican leaders continued to insist yesterday that it was understandable that the "over-friendly" Internet e-mails they had seen did not set off alarm bells. But one House GOP leadership aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity for fear of losing his job, conceded that Republicans had erred in not notifying the three-member, bipartisan panel that oversees the page system. Instead, they left it to the panel chairman, Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), to confront Foley.

Also yesterday, a former House page said that at a 2003 page reunion, he saw sexually suggestive e-mails Foley had sent to another former page. Patrick McDonald, 21, now a senior at Ohio State University, said he eventually learned of "three or four" pages from his 2001-2002 class who were sent such messages.

He said he remembered saying at the reunion, "If this gets out, it will destroy him."

House officials have already removed Foley's nameplate from his Cannon Office Building door and shut down his House Web site, while in Florida, GOP leaders prepared to meet at an Orlando airport hotel today to select a replacement candidate for the November election.

Foley has said nothing since announcing his resignation. Yesterday, a statement purportedly sent by Foley to news organizations, including The Washington Post, said he has entered an alcohol-treatment facility in Florida. The Post could not confirm the statement's authenticity, and none of Foley's former aides has responded to messages since his resignation.

In his letter to Gonzales, Hastert said Foley's electronic messages crossed state lines, so "there should be a complete investigation and prosecution of any federal laws that have been violated."

FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko declined to elaborate on his announcement of the agency's investigation of Foley. A law enforcement official who requested anonymity so he could discuss an ongoing case said the probe will be handled by the FBI's Cyber Division, and could involve agents from the Washington or Miami field offices.

Hastert also wrote that, because some of the more sexually explicit instant messages were written in 2003, "there should be an investigation into the extent there are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities."

The speaker asked that the probe extend to "all individuals who may have been aware of this matter -- be they Members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress." He said that "no one in the House Leadership was aware, to my knowledge" of the explicit messages from 2003 until ABC News reported on them last week.

In one instant-message exchange with a high school boy, ABC News reported, Foley made repeated references to sex acts and body parts.

Former page Matthew Loraditch said yesterday that he has known for years about the "creepy" messages three 2002 classmates received from Foley. He said Foley sent them after the boys had finished the House program. Each began innocuously but took a turn in tone, said Loraditch, a senior at Towson University.

"They became explicit and similar to what we are seeing on the Web sites right now," said Loraditch, 21, who runs the U.S. House Page Alumni Association's Internet message board. Those who received them "didn't do anything beside telling other pages about it."

Foley was known as an exceedingly friendly House member to young pages, most of whom are 16- and 17-year-old high school juniors who come to Washington for an intensive, year-long civics lesson. Unlike most House members, he memorized their names and talked politics with them during lulls in late-night sessions. Foley was the only House member to attend the Class of 2002's graduation, according to McDonald, and he wore a tuxedo.

McDonald and Loraditch said they received no improper messages from Foley. Loraditch said he had viewed several "cut-and-paste excerpts" of messages Foley sent to one of the three. "Some went along with it, others cut it off," Loraditch said. "I'm pretty sure none met with him."

None of the three former pages is yet willing to step forward, according to McDonald and Loraditch.

Loraditch said no one wanted to report Foley for fear of damaging his job prospects.

"That's part of your concern about coming forward," Loraditch said. "You take down a Congress member, and you can't end up trying to do something later."

McDonald remembers Foley encouraging pages who expressed an interest in politics and inviting them to his district for his own campaigning. McDonald was so fond of Foley that he almost refused to believe the objectionable messages when he learned of them in 2003.

"There is a part of us that all want to be told lies," he said. "We want to be told, 'That's not true.' I wanted to believe that Foley was the guy we always knew he was: He just loved pages."

"This weekend," McDonald said, "there's no more lying to yourself."

Hastert's letter to Gonzales was the culmination of a day-long evolution of the Republican strategy toward dealing with the scandal.

On yesterday morning's "This Week" on ABC, White House counselor Dan Bartlett defended the House GOP leadership directing the investigation into how the scandal was handled.

"The leadership appear to be very aggressive in pursuing this investigation, and I think that's the best place is for the leadership to determine the way forward," Bartlett said.

But by midday, on CNN's "Late Edition," Bartlett had joined calls by Democrats and some Republicans for a criminal investigation of the matter. "If you take the allegations at face value, I think there would have to be at least a preliminary look to see if there's any breaking of criminal law," he said.

Hours later, Hastert called for the Justice Department investigation.

The changes in course were in keeping with a Republican plan to stay ahead of Democratic attacks and to show a willingness to let impartial investigators pursue the matter. On Friday night, when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) took the House floor to demand an investigation by the ethics committee, GOP leaders quickly agreed and the motion passed unanimously.

Yesterday, Democrats kept up the pressure. Pelosi applauded the FBI announcement and called on the Republican leadership to quickly investigate "the cover up of Mr. Foley's behavior."

And Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said the allegations against Foley "are repugnant, but equally as bad is the possibility that Republican leaders in the House of Representatives knew there was a problem and ignored it to preserve a congressional seat this election year."

Hastert Asks For Inquiry Of Foley (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert yesterday requested a criminal investigation of former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, who resigned Friday amid accusations that he attempted to seduce a teenage congressional page.

An FBI spokesman last night confirmed the bureau was "conducting an assessment" of the Foley case.

"I hereby request that the Department of Justice conduct an investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages to determine to what extent any of his actions violated federal law," Mr. Hastert wrote in the letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, sent after similar calls yesterday from the nation's two leading Democrats and the White House.

Mr. Hastert also requested an investigation into whether anyone had "specific knowledge" of the sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and any current or former House pages.

"I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter -- be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress," Mr. Hastert wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0072967

Mr. Hastert also wrote to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to ask for a state investigation "to determine to what extent any of [Mr. Foley's] actions violated Florida law."

Meanwhile, yesterday, Republican leaders said they expect state Rep. Joe Negron of Stuart, Fla., to be named to replace Mr. Foley as the Republican candidate in the House race for the 16th Congressional District when the state party's 37-member executive board meets today in Orlando.

Mr. Foley, Florida Republican, was chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children before resigning Friday after he was accused of sending inappropriate e-mails and sexually explicit instant messages over the Internet to teenage boys working as congressional pages.

Democrats have harshly criticized Republican leadership in the wake of last week's revelations.

"The children, their parents, the public, and our colleagues must be assured that such abhorrent behavior is not tolerated and will never happen again," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, wrote yesterday to leaders of the House ethics committee, reiterating that the panel must start work "within 10 days."

"The American people have a right to feel confident that their congressional leaders are committed not just to the best interest of the nation as a whole, but also to the safety of the young people who every year travel to Washington to work on Capitol Hill," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett, appearing yesterday on ABC's "This Week," said President Bush was not aware of the accusations until Mr. Foley resigned and defended the response of the House Republican leadership.

Other Democrats, including Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, who has said he would run for majority leader if Democrats win control of the House in November, went further than Mr. Reid and Mrs. Pelosi.

"I just cannot believe that they allowed this to happen and just told him, 'OK, stay away from this kid,' "Mr. Murtha said on ABC yesterday. "It really makes me nervous that they looked like they tried to cover it up."

The scandal caused a weekend dispute among Republicans. Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican, at first said he learned only last week about the Foley e-mails, but Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, New York Republican, said Saturday that he had told Mr. Hastert about the matter months ago.

Mr. Hastert's office later responded that the speaker had been unaware that Mr. Foley's messages to the boys were anything more than "over-friendly."

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich yesterday defended the response of Republican leaders. Mr. Gingrich, Georgia Republican, said that House leaders had been aware only of e-mails sent by Mr. Foley. Those e-mails reportedly did not include the sexually suggestive material contained in instant-message exchanges disclosed this week.

"There was nothing sexual in those [e-mails]. They had him counseled. They had the head of the page program, [Illinois Republican Rep. John] Shimkus, talk to [Mr. Foley] very directly. And I think they thought it was over," Mr. Gingrich said on "Fox News Sunday."

"The newest incident only surfaced when ABC News interviewed Foley, and he resigned within two hours, or I think the House leaders would have moved to expel him."

Mr. Hastert made a similar point in his letter last night to Florida's governor.

"As I am sure you are aware, there are two different and distinct communications at issue here," the House speaker wrote to Jeb Bush, in requesting an investigation of possible state law violations by Mr. Foley. Mr. Hastert distinguished between the "over-friendly" e-mails to one teenager and "sexually explicit instant messages which Mr. Foley reportedly sent another former page or pages."

FBI Looking Into Foley E-mail Scandal (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington And Agencies

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

The FBI is assessing whether Mark Foley, a six-term Florida Republican, broke any laws when he sent allegedly sexually explicit e-mails to a male teenage congressional page.

Leaders of both parties on Sunday demanded full-scale investigations into another untimely scandal for the Republicans.

Dennis Hastert, speaker of the House of Representatives, at the weekend sent a letter to Alberto Gonzales, the attorney general, requesting a Justice Department investigation of Mr Foley's conduct with current and former House pages.

"Since the communications involved interstate communications there should be a complete investigation and prosecution of federal laws that have been violated," Rep Hastert said on Sunday.

The Republican leader said his office had known for a year about what he called an "over-friendly" e-mail between Mr Foley - who resigned on Friday - and a 16-year-old male page, but had not been told about any sexually explicit content.

DOJ_NMG_0072968

"I just cannot believe that they allowed this to happen and just told him, OK, stay away from this kid," Rep John Murtha of Pennsylvania said on ABC's "This Week." "It really makes me nervous that they looked like they tried to cover it up."

On Sunday, Democrats called for a full inquiry into the scanal as well as Republican leaders who kept the matter "under wraps."

Nancy Pelosi, House Democratic leader, said Republican leaders should be questioned under oath on how much they knew of Mr Foley's e-mails.

Harry Reid, Senate Democratic leader, said "the alleged crimes are far outside the scope of any congressional committee and the attorney general should open a full-scale investigation immediately,"

A scandal could weaken the Republicans ahead of next month's midterm election in which they could lose control of Congress.

The 52-year-old Foley was chairman of the House caucus on missing and exploited children, and the author of the key sexual predator provisions of the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, which President George W. Bush signed in July.

House Republicans and the White House were clearly trying at the weekend to distance themselves from the scandal.

Dan Bartlett, White House counselor, said he thought the House Republican leaders have been "very forthcoming" and that the White House learned of the matter "when the American people learned."

Scandal In Congress: The Political Fallout Of Rep. Foley's Resignation (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

The scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley (R) of Florida, who abruptly resigned his seat Friday, has engulfed the Republican leadership of the House of Representatives, adding an explosive issue to the pile of woes facing the GOP in its tough battle to retain control of Congress.

Mr. Foley quit Congress after he was confronted with evidence that he had sent sexually explicit electronic messages to former teenage House pages. Foley had already been accused earlier of sending what Republicans call "overfriendly" e-mails last year to another former page, a teenage boy from Louisiana. Members of the House GOP leadership acknowledge they knew about the less-explicit e-mails months ago and say they were handling the issue quietly, at the request of the boy's family.

Republican leaders say they did not know about the more-explicit messages until last week. But critics charge that at the first sign of possible trouble earlier this year, when the leaders learned of the e-mail traffic between Foley and the Louisiana boy, the GOP leadership should have acted more forcefully against Foley. Another black eye for GOP Adding to the black eye for the GOP, which calls itself the party of family values, is the fact that Foley had co-chaired the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, and had sponsored numerous bills aimed at protecting children from predators.

"It's a disaster" for the Republicans, says Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. "This could be the tipping point," he adds, referring to the 15-seat net gain that Democrats need to win control of the House.

Not only will the Republicans have a hard time holding onto Foley's seat, the scandal may also endanger Rep. Tom Reynolds (R) of New York, head of the GOP's House campaign committee. Mr. Reynolds released a statement on Saturday saying he had been informed of the existence of the e-mails between Foley and the Louisiana boy by the House member for whom the boy had paged, Rep. Rodney Alexander (R) of Louisiana, but that he had not seen the e-mails in question.

"Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, and I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Reynolds continued.

He also said Alexander took the matter to the clerk of the House, and that an investigation was conducted by the clerk and Rep. John Shimkus (R) of Illinois, head of the House Page Board. Pages are high school students who work for members of Congress and attend a special school on Capitol Hill. Inappropriate e-mails

After Alexander learned of the e-mail exchange between Foley and Alexander's former page, Foley was ordered to stop contacting the boy. The e-mails, while not overtly sexual, made the boy uncomfortable. In one, Foley asked the boy to send him a picture of himself and asked him what he wanted for his birthday. The teenager called the e-mails "sick."

While many of the other House members aware of the fall 2005 e-mails - including Alexander, speaker Dennis Hastert (R) of Illinois, and majority leader John Boehner (R) of Ohio - are not seen by political handicappers as endangered for reelection by the scandal, Reynolds may be different. Though holding a safe Republican seat in a normal election year, Reynolds could be hurt in a year where the top of the Republican ticket in New York - the candidates for governor and Senate - is weak this year, and could suppress GOP turnout in that state. The page scandal may suppress turnout further. Democratic Party response

The Democratic Party is reportedly considering a quick ad campaign focusing on family values. Of all the scandals hurting the Republicans this fall - three GOP members have already been indicted for corruption - the page scandal is the easiest to understand. Few issues grab voters with children more than a scandal involving a member of Congress and an underage child, and the appearance of a coverup.

In recent weeks, the Republicans' prospects for keeping control of the House appeared to have brightened somewhat, as Bush's job approvals had grown to 40 percent (still not high, but heading up) and the price of gas had declined.

But the continuing bad news out of Iraq - plus stories on reporter Bob Woodward's new book, and the latest national intelligence estimate painting a negative picture on terrorism and Iraq - plays badly for the Republicans. And now the Foley scandal adds to the challenge.

"It has significant potential to add to the Republicans' already substantial woes," says nonpartisan political analyst Stu Rothenberg. "As this issue gets discussed, and people point fingers at one another ... it starts to look like they're not managing institution very well."

In Florida's 16th congressional district, GOP chairman Sid Dinerstein is not willing to concede defeat in the newly cast battle for the seat. On Monday, the executive board of the state GOP will meet to vote for a replacement for Foley on the ballot - expected to be popular state Rep. Joe Negron.

But Foley's name will remain on the ballot, and all votes cast for him will go to the new candidate. The local GOP will have to mount a major campaign to explain that to voters.

"It's gone from clearly being a safe seat to a seat where we're going to have to work very hard to win," says Mr. Dinerstein.

Former Pages Describe Foley As Caring Ally (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — In the hierarchy of Congress, the high school students who serve as Congressional pages fall somewhere near the bottom, seemingly invisible as they scurry through the hallways of the Capitol ferrying messages to powerful lawmakers who often fail to give them a second glance.

In that rarefied world, Representative Mark Foley, the silver-haired Republican from Florida, stood out.

He took pains to befriend the 16- and 17-year-old aides, several former pages said in interviews on Sunday. He chatted with them on the House floor, they said, sent handwritten notes and urged them to keep in touch when they left Washington for their hometowns.

In 2002, he even stood up on the floor of the House, his eyes welling with tears, and commended the young men and women for their year of service. In his speech, Mr. Foley mentioned several of the high school students by name, describing a handwritten note to celebrate one young man's graduation and a lunch with another at Morton's steak house.

Ashley Gallo, a 21-year-old former page who is now a senior at Western Michigan University, said on Sunday that many of her friends had viewed Mr. Foley as one of the few lawmakers who made a real effort to reach out to young people.

"You didn't have a lot of interaction with the members because most of them treated you like a kid, but he was pretty friendly," said Ms. Gallo, who served as a page in 2001. "He would talk to people," she said.

"He would say, 'Here's my e-mail address if you want to keep in touch.' I don't think anyone thought anything of it. They saw him as a mentor or a reference."

Mr. Foley's resignation on Friday, following the disclosure of his sexually explicit Internet and cellphone messages to pages, left many former pages shaken. And on Sunday, they burned up the phone lines and sent e-mail messages flying as they reached out to their old friends who remain tight-knit years after leaving Capitol Hill.

Patrick McDonald, 21, a senior at Ohio State University, said he took Mr. Foley up on his invitation to keep in touch and sent him an e-mail message asking about internship opportunities two years after he completed his work as a page in 2002. He said that he kept up a casual e-mail conversation — chatting about the 2004 presidential election, among other things — with Mr. Foley for several months and that it never became inappropriate.

"If a congressman was talking to you, it was the best thing in the world," Mr. McDonald said. "And he made himself known to the pages in the first couple of weeks, befriending us, asking us how we were doing. He was one of the cool congressmen. He was willing to chill out with us."

But despite Mr. Foley's warm demeanor, Mr. McDonald and another former page said they later became aware that the lawmaker might have a darker side. Mr. McDonald said he learned that Mr. Foley had sexually explicit Internet conversations with several pages who had left the program. "I was disgusted, but I was not surprised when these revelations started circulating," he said.

Congressional pages come to Washington from across the country, sponsored by their local senator or representative, in a highly competitive program that attracts thousands of applicants each year.

Many describe it as one of the most formative experiences of their lives, giving them a rare, insider's view of the inner workings of power. Former pages have set up alumni associations and message boards, and exchange e-mail messages and attend reunions to keep the memories of their days in Congress alive.

They describe living in an intensely supervised and sheltered world during their time in Washington. The 72 pages who serve in the House of Representatives are paid a stipend. They share rooms in a two-story, red brick dormitory just blocks from the Capitol and have a 10 p.m. curfew on weeknights and a midnight curfew on weekends.

Pages start classes at 6:45 a.m, and work in the House of Representatives later, answering telephones, delivering documents and running errands for lawmakers. Every night, the former pages said, the dormitory supervisors checked to make sure every page was there on time.

James Kotecki, 20, who was a page in the spring semester of 2003, said his orientation included a video on sexual harassment. He said he did not remember any formal rules against fraternization, however, and added that the young pages enjoyed the rare opportunities to socialize with the lawmakers. He said he met Mr. Foley only in passing, but remembered him as "a nice guy."

"Pages are kind of very, very low on the totem pole on the Hill," said Mr. Kotecki, now a senior at Georgetown University. "Anytime a member is nice it's fantastic because often members don't give pages the time of day."

Raymond Schillinger, 20, also a Georgetown student, echoed those thoughts. He worked for Mr. Foley this spring as an intern and said the congressman treated the young staff very well.

"He was very affable, always friendly with the staff, but never over friendly, nothing suggestive," Mr. Schillinger said.

Matthew Loraditch, who worked as a page with Ms. Gallo and Mr. McDonald in 2001 and 2002, said a supervisor had once casually mentioned that Mr. Foley "was odd" and that he later saw sexually explicit text messages that Mr. Foley had sent to two former pages after they left the program.

But Mr. Loraditch said he was never warned by program supervisors to stay away from him. "He was friendly," said Mr. Loraditch, who maintains a Web site for alumni and attends Towson University in Maryland. "He would talk to us more than some other members would."

To this day, Mr. Loraditch still remembers the speech Mr. Foley gave to the pages in 2002. The genial lawmaker stood on the floor of the House and noted that several pages were weeping as he spoke.

"You all have proven without a doubt that you are not only courageous Americans but wonderful young people," Mr. Foley said on June 6, 2002. "I salute you and I thank you, and I hope you will join me, too, in saluting everyone in the page program that has made this year a resounding, phenomenal learning experience and success for you. God bless you all."

Fla. Constituents 'disgusted' By Accusations Against Foley (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, October 2, 2006

LAKE WORTH, Fla. — Mark Foley's former constituents shifted their anger Sunday from the disgraced Republican to House GOP leaders, who knew for months about inappropriate e-mails between Foley and at least one teenage page.

Foley resigned Friday after being questioned by ABC News about alleged sexually explicit instant messages. A day earlier, the network reported that Foley sent e-mails to a 16-year-old boy, a former page.

The content of the e-mails and instant messages have not been independently verified by USA TODAY. Foley did not refer to them when he resigned but said he was "deeply sorry."

On Sunday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., called on the Justice Department and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to investigate.

Foley's former constituents in the 16th Congressional District called Sunday on House GOP leaders to step down. "It's no longer a party of one. It's a party of many," said Sondra Stateman, 45, a health care administrator from West Boynton. "They should resign, too."

Beverly Pepe, 67, of Lake Worth, drew a comparison to the Roman Catholic Church's scandals. "That's the same as when the church knew about all those priests molesting the boys, and they just kept moving them from church to church," she said.

Florida Republican leaders postponed until Tuesday a vote to name a replacement for Foley because of the Yom Kippur religious holiday.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the House Democratic campaign committee, said Democratic nominee Tim Mahoney will be moved to the group's "red to blue" list of candidates considered strong enough to take GOP-held seats. That means Mahoney will get the committee's financial and strategic support.

DOJ_NMG_0072971

Under Florida election laws, Foley's name must remain on the ballot. The party can replace him with another candidate, but voters must punch in Foley's name if they want to vote for that replacement.

Even Republicans recognize how hard that will be for some. “It's not an impossible task but certainly a daunting challenge,” said Carl Domino, a state representative. “How is anyone going to be able to get people to punch ‘Mark Foley'?”

Lorelle Haynes, a lifelong Republican who voted for Foley, predicted fellow Republican voters cannot be convinced that a vote for Foley really is not. “They'll be disgusted.”

Haynes' comments were echoed throughout Foley's former district, a collection of counties that stretches from Stuart on the east coast to Port Charlotte on the west.

Deborah Garson is a lifelong Democrat but said she had respected Foley since his days on the Lake Worth city commission.

“But it's very upsetting to me, being a mother and a grandmother, that he would do this,” she said. “There's just no excuse for that.”

Among the churches Foley would visit in his district was New Macedonia Missionary Baptist Church, where Bishop Thomas Masters struggled to explain his feelings. “People come to the church with all kinds of situations going on in their lives: suicides, drug addictions, all kinds of sin,” Masters said, explaining that he tries to help people confess and embrace religion. After pausing, he added: “Sometimes that happens, and sometimes it doesn't.”

Hastert Requests Criminal Probe Of Foley (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert requested Sunday that the Justice Department conduct an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley's electronic messages to teenage boys — a lurid scandal that has put House Republicans in political peril.

"As Speaker of the House, I hereby request that the Department of Justice conduct an investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages to determine to what extent any of his actions violated federal law," Hastert, R-Ill., wrote in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The White House and Democratic leaders in Congress also called Sunday for a criminal probe. White House counselor Dan Bartlett called the allegations against Foley shocking, but said President Bush hadn't learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a 16-year-old boy and instant messages to other boys before the news broke last week.

"There is going to be, I'm sure, a criminal investigation into the particulars of this case," Bartlett said. "We need to make sure that the page system is one in which children come up here and can work and make sure that they are protected."

Foley, R-Fla., quit Congress on Friday after the disclosure of the e-mails he sent to a former congressional page and sexually suggestive instant messages he sent to other high school pages.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada called the Foley case "repugnant, but equally as bad is the possibility that Republican leaders in the House of Representatives knew there was a problem and ignored it to preserve a congressional seat this election year."

Reid said the case should be handled outside Congress.

"Under laws that Congressman Foley helped write, soliciting sex from a minor online is a federal crime," Reid said. "The alleged crimes here are far outside the scope of any congressional committee, and the attorney general should open a full-scale investigation immediately."

In his letter to Gonzales on Sunday, Hastert asked the Justice Department to investigate "who had specific knowledge of the content of any sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and any former or current House pages and what actions such individuals took, if any, to provide them to law enforcement."

The scope of the investigation, Hastert wrote, should include "any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter — be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives or anyone outside the Congress."

Hastert also sent a letter to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush on Sunday requesting that he "direct the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to conduct an investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages."

Hastert maintained at first that he had learned only last week about the e-mails. But Rep. Thomas Reynolds, head of the House Republican election effort, said Saturday he had told Hastert months ago about concerns Foley sent inappropriate messages to a teenage boy. Reynolds, R-N.Y., is under attack from Democrats who say he did too little to protect the boy.

Hastert acknowledged over the weekend that his aides had, in fact, referred the matter to the House clerk and to the congressman who was chairman of the board that oversees the page program. Hastert's office said, however, it had not known the e-mails were anything more than "over-friendly."

Majority Republicans engineered a House vote Friday that refers the Foley matter to the House ethics committee, but lets that panel decide whether there should even be an investigation.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, pressed the committee on Sunday to begin investigating and make a preliminary report within 10 days. She demanded to know who knew of the messages, whether Foley had other contacts with pages and when the Republican leadership was notified of Foley's conduct.

"Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year, and they chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," she wrote.

Congressional pages, a staple of Washington politics since the 1820s, are high school students who serve as temporary gofers in the House and Senate. The program nearly ended in the early 1980s due to alleged sexual misconduct and drug use.

Republican leaders say it is their duty to ensure House pages' safety, and are now creating a toll-free hot line for pages and their families to call to confidentially report any incidents. They also will consider adopting new rules on communications between lawmakers and pages.

House Democrats said that wasn't enough.

"This should be investigated objectively. I think the Democratic leadership should have been told 10 months ago," said Rep. Jane Harman of California, top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. "I gather that basically nothing was done except that Foley was warned."

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., said the House ethics committee should conclude its work on the Foley case before the November elections, so that voters can "hold people accountable." Doing so, he said, might help restore public confidence, since already "the reputation of Congress under the Republican leadership is lower than used car salesmen."

Foley, who is 52 and single, was co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. In a statement Friday, he said, "I am deeply sorry and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida I have had the privilege to represent."

Harman was on "Fox News Sunday," Murtha appeared on ABC's "This Week" and Bartlett spoke on ABC's "This Week, CNN's "Late Edition" and CBS' "Face the Nation."

The Wrong Message (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas And Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, October 2, 2006

Mark Foley, a six-term Republican congressman from Florida, championed the protection of children from sexual predators. Chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, he often spoke out about the need to catch pedophiles. In July, he attended a signing ceremony at the White House for the Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006. "We track library books better than we do sexual predators," he had argued in support of the bill.

It took some time, but last week Foley himself was tracked down. Confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit messages he had exchanged with 16- and 17-year-old congressional pages, Foley abruptly resigned his seat. (He did not protest his innocence; whether he committed a crime is unclear.) Politicians and preachers crusading against sin while sinning themselves is an old morality play. But the politics of Foley's downfall are messy and intriguing, coming just weeks before hotly contested congressional elections. The Democrats accused the Republicans of trying to cover up Foley's indiscretions until after Election Day, while the Republicans accused the Democrats of leaking the story just in time to cost the GOP a crucial seat.

An energetic, capable politician, Foley appeared to be well matched to his prosperous Palm Beach district. His sexuality did not seem to be an issue with voters. In Washington he made little effort to hide his sexual orientation, and neither his colleagues nor his staff seemed to worry that he might be a predator. Gregarious and fun-loving, he was known for hosting raucous parties and making off-color jokes. "All of his colleagues knew" that Foley was gay, said a former aide, who asked for anonymity discussing Foley's personal life. "It was the worst-kept secret in Washington."

Radical gay groups sometimes "out" closeted right-wingers, but Foley was insulated against charges of hypocrisy because he voted against a congressional ban on gay marriage. (Last week Democrats were careful to say that the issue was not his sexuality but potentially criminal behavior toward minors.) Foley's sexuality may have inhibited his political ambitions, however. In 2003, he briefly ran for the Senate before dropping out, against the urgings of some party leaders who wanted him to stay in the race. He held a press conference to denounce rumors that he was gay, without confirming or denying them.

Foley's sexual leanings were also well known, or at least suspected, by a particularly vulnerable group on Capitol Hill. Every year Congress hires about 100 pages, who can be seen in their distinctive blue uniforms scurrying through the halls, running errands for lawmakers. The pages have been embroiled in earlier sex scandals. In 1983, a pair of congressmen admitted to sexual relations with underage pages (one with a girl, one with a boy). After that, the pages were housed in a dormitory and fairly closely chaperoned. A former female page, who asked not to be identified to protect her privacy, told

NEWSWEEK that she and other pages had regularly seen Foley stop and talk to pages on the House floor and in the cloakroom, lingering with them and asking them to describe their experiences in Congress. "We just gradually figured out he was flirting with the guys," said the page. "It made a lot of the guys uneasy. He was kind of creepy."

In late 2005, one of the pages, a young man from Louisiana, went to an aide to his congressman, Rodney Alexander. The page had received some e-mails from Foley that, the boy said, "freaked me out." Alexander went to Republican Party leaders, and Foley was summoned to see GOP Congressman John Shimkus, the chairman of the House Page Board. The e-mails between Foley and the page were subject to interpretation—Foley had asked for a photograph of the boy, talked about going to the gym and asked if he was OK after Hurricane Katrina. Foley insisted that he was acting only as the boy's "mentor." Shimkus warned Foley to be "especially mindful of his conduct" with the pages. The boy's parents did not want to pursue the matter.

That might have been the end of it, but rumors and copies of the messages began to rattle around newsrooms in Florida and Washington, possibly fed by Foley's political opponents. Last Thursday night ABC News broke the story. That seemed to open the Internet floodgates. The next night ABC posted a follow-up on its Web site, showing instant messages between Foley and congressional pages that were far more sexually explicit. Many more, and much seamier, message exchanges began to pour in to ABC. Some were mildly crude. "Do I make you a little horny?" Foley is said to have asked one page. Others show Foley, under the signer Maf54, engaged in graphic Internet sex with minors, ABC reported. During one session a page instant-messages Maf54, "brb [be right back] ... my mom is yelling." ABC confronted Foley with a batch of these messages, and within hours he had penned a one-sentence resignation note. Foley issued a statement saying that he was "deeply sorry" for letting down his family and the voters, but made no reference to any e-mails. It is not known if he is under any kind of criminal investigation.

The politics heated up right away. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi took the floor to demand an investigation. Her Democratic colleagues instantly began agitating to know what the Republican leadership had known about Foley and when it had known it. The GOP leadership did not help its cause by putting out garbled or conflicting accounts, though there was no proof of any kind of deliberate cover-up. Late Saturday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt issued a statement calling for a criminal investigation. But some Republicans were also curious about the timing of the revelations. Foley's district is strongly Republican, but he had faced a serious challenger, Tim Mahoney. The GOP can pick a new candidate, but it may be too late to get Foley's name off the ballot, which could cost the Republicans a seat. The struggle for control of the House may be so close, with a 15-seat swing hanging in the balance, that a single seat can make a real difference.

While congressmen caught in a sex scandal is nothing new, the way the story broke shows the power of Web technology to influence politics. Few people may have even been aware that instant messages can be saved and copied, but they have turned out to be a powerful weapon. Before the Internet, a story like Foley's might have kicked around for months, with conflicting accounts, and possibly never surfaced. Once the existence of the e-mails became known, Foley was swept away within hours.

Democrats See A Chance To Turn The Tables (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — In their efforts to keep their party in power, Republican leaders have not hesitated to hit the Democrats hard when it comes to the issue of protecting children.

The strategy was on display in Indiana, where the National Republican Congressional Committee recently ran a series of television spots showing a man accused of child molesting who was inadvertently released under the watch of Brad Ellsworth, a county sheriff and a Democratic candidate for Congress.

Now, Democrats are suddenly seeing an opportunity to turn the tables, questioning the actions of Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the chairman of the Congressional committee, and other top Republicans who have acknowledged that they had been aware for months of e-mail exchanges between Representative Mark Foley, a Florida Republican, and a former teenage page.

In a statement issued over the weekend, Mr. Reynolds said that when he first learned of the issue, he personally brought it to the attention of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. Republican leaders have described the e-mail messages that initially came to their attention as “over-friendly” and said that they were not sexually explicit, like the messages between Mr. Foley and other pages that were disclosed later.

But Democrats are accusing Republican leaders of keeping silent about Mr. Foley and allowing him to remain as chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children until the disclosure on Friday of the more sexually explicit e-mail messages. Carl Forti, a spokesman for Mr. Reynolds, defended the actions of Republicans, emphasizing that there was nothing overtly sexual about the e-mail messages they had initially seen. He also defended the advertisements sponsored by the Republican House campaign committee.

The Democrats, Mr. Forti said, are "trying to take advantage of a very tragic and wrong situation."

After years of defending themselves against Republican charges that they are soft on crime and generally out of step with the nation's values, Democrats are criticizing Republicans on one of their core issues. While commercials and mailings attacking Democrats as weak on issues like child protection appear to occur only sporadically, Democrats contend that it is a tactic that Republicans fall back on regularly.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said concerns about the Republican leadership's handling of the accusations made their campaign attacks on Democrats seem hypocritical.

Not all rank-and-file Republicans have been happy with the efforts of party strategists to feature the issue of sexual predator legislation in campaign commercials.

In a closely watched race to fill a Congressional vacancy in San Diego this past June, the Republican candidate, Brian P. Bilbray, protested when the National Republican Congressional Committee ran an advertisement attacking the Democratic candidate, Francine Busby, a local school board member, for praising an elementary school teacher who was subsequently accused of trying to obtain child pornography.

The advertisement grew out of a newspaper article in 2004, when Ms. Busby was asked her reaction to reports that an elementary school teacher in her district had been arrested for trying to obtain child pornography. Ms. Busby said she was stunned and noted that she had always found the teacher to be dedicated and supportive of his students.

After the spot began running, Mr. Bilbray expressed displeasure with it and, referring to national Republicans, said he "would sure prefer that they keep the message positive."

In 2004, protecting children against lurking threats was a theme with the Republican House committee running advertisements against several Democratic candidates in Texas, Kansas and Indiana, accusing them of being out of step with "family values" because the candidates would "allow the sale of violent and sexually explicit video games and movies to our children."

That theme has resurfaced this year. In the contest for Nevada's Third Congressional District seat, the Republican incumbent, Representative Jon Porter, is running a spot that notes his work to crack down on pedophiles.

"As parents, we need to know that our schools are not hiring teachers that are sexual predators," Mr. Porter says in the advertisement, which was paid for in part by the Congressional committee. "That's why I wrote a law in Congress that gives our local school districts the information they need to ensure that sexual predators are not teaching our children."

And in mailings sent in recent months to voters in Pennsylvania's Eighth Congressional District, the Republican incumbent, Representative Michael G. Fitzpatrick, criticized the Democratic challenger, Patrick Murphy, who had raised objections to legislation seeking to protect children from online predators that Mr. Fitzpatrick proposed. Democrats said Mr. Fitzpatrick distorted the position of Mr. Murphy, who they said did not believe Mr. Fitzpatrick's measure went far enough.

Since the revelations of Mr. Foley's behavior, Democrats have been particularly forceful in singling out Mr. Reynolds, whom they see as an architect of Republican attacks against them. Mr Reynolds is facing a challenge from Jack Davis, a wealthy businessman who has vowed to spend at least $2 million of his own money in the contest and whose campaign has seized upon the Foley episode to attack Mr. Reynolds.

FBI To Look At Foley's Actions (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — As pressure mounted on Republicans over their handling of the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley, the FBI said Sunday that it had begun a preliminary inquiry to determine whether the disgraced Florida lawmaker had violated federal law by sending sexually explicit instant messages to at least one teenager who had served as a congressional page.

The FBI's brief statement confirming the inquiry came shortly after House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) sent a letter to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales asking the Justice Department to examine "Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages to determine to what extent any of his actions violated federal law."

Hastert — who has been battling accusations that House Republicans inadequately handled concerns that Foley had sent inappropriate though not overtly sexual e-mails last year to another former page — also asked Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to see whether state laws had been broken.

But the Republicans' effort to distance the party from Foley may be complicated by his close ties with the party's campaign operation.

Foley's longtime chief of staff is now a senior aide to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee is leading the effort to maintain the GOP majority in the House. In addition, Foley's campaign committee gave $100,000 to the NRCC this summer, campaign finance records show.

Seizing on the campaign donation, which put Foley among the GOP committee's bigger donors, the Democratic National Committee stepped up its accusations that Reynolds and other Republican leaders were more interested in protecting Foley than investigating potential misconduct.

"Why did Republican congressional leaders choose not to ask the critical questions about the nature and full extent of Congressman Foley's criminal actions involving minors at the time they first learned about it?" Democratic Party Communications Director Karen Finney said Sunday.

Foley, a six-term Republican who was co-chair of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, resigned his seat Friday after ABC News questioned him about the sexually explicit instant messages he reportedly sent three years ago.

House Republican leaders have been under pressure since then to explain what they knew about Foley's behavior and when they knew it. They acknowledged Saturday that they had known for some time of Foley's "over-friendly" e-mails, sent to a 16-year-old Louisiana boy, but said they had not known of the sexually explicit earlier messages before last week.

In the fall of 2005, the 16-year-old, who had finished a term as a page that year sponsored by Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), complained to a staffer in Alexander's office after receiving a series of e-mails from Foley. In them, the congressman asked for a photo and talked to the teenager about another boy being "in great shape."

After hearing from the teen and his parents, Alexander's staffers discussed their concerns with their counterparts in Hastert's office. As a result, the House clerk and the congressman in charge of the House Page Board met with Foley, who told them that his relationship with the boy was that of a mentor. They instructed him to cease his contacts with the boy.

Earlier this year, Alexander also discussed the matter with Reynolds and with House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). Reynolds has said that he discussed it with Hastert, though the House speaker has said he has no recollection of the conversation but has no reason to doubt Reynolds.

In his letter to Gonzales, released several hours after Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) had demanded a Justice Department investigation, Hastert said the House clerk and the head of the Page Board had believed their private meeting with Foley "resolved the situation."

But the revelation of the sexually explicit instant messages — sent, Hastert said, to "another former page or pages" — warranted criminal referral for two reasons: to determine whether Foley had violated federal laws on interstate communications, and to discover whether "there are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities."

Given that the instant messages were sent in 2003, Hastert said, "I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter — be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress."

Hastert's efforts did not quell the political storm gathering around the GOP, however.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) on Sunday called on GOP House leaders to explain their actions under oath before the House Ethics Committee.

The Democratic National Committee noted Sunday that Foley's contribution, which the NRCC reported receiving on Aug. 7, came after Reynolds had acknowledged having learned about the Louisiana page's complaint.

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the campaign donation had no impact on how Reynolds handled the matter, explaining that Reynolds told Hastert about the problem as soon as he learned about the e-mails.

"This is nothing more than pure politics at its worst," Forti said, dismissing the Democratic charge that Reynolds should have done more.

"Even to insinuate that is ridiculous."

Forti said Reynolds had not known about the explicit instant messages, in which Foley discussed sexual matters with at least one other former page.

But Reynolds did work closely with someone who knew Foley well.

Kirk Fordham, a veteran Republican legislative staffer who has worked on Capitol Hill for much of the last 17 years, served as Foley's chief of staff from 1995 to 2004. Fordham also managed Foley's first campaign for Congress, in 1994.

In 2005, Fordham went to work for DCI Group, a leading GOP political strategy group. The same year, he became Reynolds' chief of staff.

Fordham could not be reached for comment Sunday.

Forti said Sunday he did not know whether Reynolds and Fordham had discussed Foley after Reynolds was told of the page's complaint.

FBI Begins Look At Foley's Contact With Teens (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - The FBI is looking at whether former Florida Rep. Mark Foley's computer exchanges with underage House pages broke any laws, an FBI spokesman said late Sunday.

The agency is "conducting an assessment to determine if there has been any violation of federal law," the FBI's Stephen Kodak said.

Under fire from Democrats, House Speaker Dennis Hastert also asked Sunday that U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales -- and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement -- look into the case.

On Friday ABC News had released a series of sexually explicit instant messaging sessions between Foley and what it said were underage pages -- high schoolers who serve as messengers in the House and Senate.

Hastert's letters to Gonzales and Gov. Jeb Bush say the sexually explicit instant messages between Foley and pages ``warrant a criminal referral."

Hastert notes the messages were "reportedly generated three years ago" and "it is important to know who may have had the communications and why they were not given to prosecutors before now. ``I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter -- be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress," he wrote.

His letter drew a sharp distinction between the instant messaging sessions -- which Hastert said he was never made aware of -- and e-mails between Foley and a former House page, which top GOP leaders saw in 2005. Foley was told to cease contact with the page. Hastert noted that the same e-mails were viewed by editors at The St. Petersburg Times, which reviewed them, considered them "friendly chit chat" and declined to run a story.

Miami Herald Executive Editor Tom Fiedler said Sunday the newspaper also saw the same e-mails and ``didn't feel there was sufficient clarity in the e-mails to warrant a story.

"We determined after discussion among several senior editors, including myself, that the content of the messages was too ambiguous to lead to a news story," Fiedler said.

The call for a criminal investigation came as Democrats signaled that they plan to use the Republican House leaders' response to reports of the e-mails sent by Foley as an issue in the pivotal November election.

Foley, a Palm Beach County Republican, gave no reason for leaving but said he was "deeply sorry" and resigned Friday after the subsequent, sexually explicit instant messages were disclosed by ABC News.

Earlier Sunday, Democrats in both chambers, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, called for investigations. Democrats also seized on Ohio Republican Sen. Mike DeWine's reluctance at a televised debate Sunday to say that House leaders who knew about the e-mails Foley sent to the 16-year-old House page should resign immediately.

DeWine decried Foley's behavior and called for a "full investigation," but declined to say that House leadership step down if they knew about the e-mails.

"I think you have to look and see what they knew and what they did about it," DeWine said during the debate on NBC's Meet the Press. ``I would want to know what they did about it. And, you know, this is reprehensible."

Minutes after the debate ended between DeWine and Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee sent out a press release saying DeWine ``refuses to hold GOP leaders accountable over the Foley scandal."

Over the weekend Republicans sought to defend their handling of the matter, with Hastert providing what his office called a "preliminary" report of when House leaders were alerted to the situation and how they handled it.

Hastert's office said Saturday his office was contacted last fall by a staff member in the office of Louisiana Republican Rep. Rodney Alexander, where the page once worked. The boy said in an e-mail to Alexander's office that the computer exchange with Foley "freaked him out" and was ``sick . . . sick . . . sick."

Hastert's office said the clerk of the House was assured the nature of the exchange was not of a sexual nature, although it was characterized as "overly friendly." The e-mails are chatty and at one point Foley asks the teen to send him a ``pic."

The House clerk and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., head of the page board, asked Foley about the e-mail and told Foley to ``immediately cease any communication with the young man."

Hastert's office underscored that he did not know of the sexually explicit instant messages until ABC News posted them on its website Friday. "In fact, no one was ever made aware of any sexually explicit e-mail or text messages at any time," Hastert's office said.

DOJ_NMG_0072977

The scandal comes just a month before the GOP tries to hold onto its majority in the House and Senate in the wake of an increasingly unpopular war in Iraq and declining poll numbers for the Republican-led Congress that gave President Bush the go-ahead.

White House special counsel Dan Bartlett said the Bush administration didn't know anything about the Foley matter until it broke open Friday.

"We're going to get to the bottom of this, the leadership is, and that's very important because we need to make sure the page system is one in which children can come up here and work and make sure they are protected," Bartlett said on CNN's Late Edition.

FBI Launches Foley Investigation (ST)

FBI launches Foley investigation The House speaker also calls for inquiries by the Department of Justice and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. By ANITA KUMAR, Times Staff Writer

Published October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — The FBI said Sunday that it had launched an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit Internet communications with teenage boys.

The announcement came after House Speaker Dennis Hastert called for criminal inquiries by both the Department of Justice and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement.

In letters sent Sunday to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Hastert asked for an investigation into "Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages to determine to what extent any of his actions violated … law."

Foley, 52, a Republican from the West Palm Beach area, abruptly resigned Friday after the public disclosure of e-mails and instant messages between him and former congressional pages that Hastert now says went back at least three years.

The scandal has left House Republican leaders fending off charges that they knew about Foley's behavior for months but failed to disclose it.

It comes just weeks before the critical midterm election in which Democrats have their best chance in a dozen years to take control of the House.

Democratic leaders praised the federal inquiry but continued to call for a separate investigation by the House Ethics Committee into what they are calling a Republican cover-up.

"Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year, and they chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said.

Several House leaders including Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner and Rep. Tom Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee, have said in recent days that they knew for months about some of Foley's correspondence. They said they knew about one "over-friendly" e-mail exchange Foley had with a 16-year-old page from Louisiana but not the sexually explicit instant messages later publicized by ABC News.

To bolster his argument, Hastert refers to an editor's note published on the St. Petersburg Times Web site Saturday that explains that the newspaper received copies of some of the e-mails to the Louisiana page in November 2005, but characterized them as "friendly chit-chat" and chose not to print a story about them after speaking to Foley.

But on Sunday night, St. Peterburg Times editors rebutted his statements.

"The speaker is inaccurate. Our decision not to publish last fall was not based on an explanation from Rep. Foley,'' managing editor Stephen Buckley said.

"We didn't publish because the Louisiana teenager's parents did not want to pursue the issue, and because, despite our best efforts, we weren't able to track down any pages who had received inappropriate e-mails from the congressman. We didn't know about any sexually explicit exchanges between Rep. Foley and any former pages until the instant messages became public on Friday."

Hastert also asked federal and state authorities to look into "who had specific knowledge of the content of any sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and any former or current House pages and what actions such individuals took, if any, to provide them to law enforcement.

"I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter — be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress," he wrote in his letter.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko confirmed Sunday night that the FBI is "conducting an assessment to see if there's been a violation of federal law."

Agents from the cyber division are looking into the text of the messages, how many e-mails were sent and which computers were used.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett called the allegations against Foley shocking, but said President Bush hadn't learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a 16-year-old boy and instant messages to other boys before the news broke last week.

"We need to make sure that the page system is one in which children come up here and can work and make sure that they are protected," Bartlett said on a Sunday morning talk show.

Gov. Bush's communications director Alia Faraj said that FDLE had already been cooperating with FBI and federal officials before late Sunday and had been told to expect Hastert's letter.

"The FBI is lead and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement is coordinating," Faraj said. "If it becomes necessary for the state to have a separate investigation, we will do so at the appropriate time."

Laws Involving Contact With Minors Allow Prosecutors A Broad Range Of Discretion (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

The decision by Representative Mark Foley of Florida to resign after the disclosure of his sexually explicit e-mail and text messaging exchanges with Congressional pages has been followed by a flood of demands from his former Congressional colleagues — Republicans and Democrats alike — that he face "the full weight of the criminal justice system."

Legal experts consulted yesterday said that weight could be considerable.

Though the messages made public to date stopped short of soliciting sex or proposing an assignation, some were quite graphic and asked for descriptions of intimate actions. Several states, including Florida, have laws that make it a crime to transmit communication harmful to minors over the Internet.

In the past, legal experts said, prosecutors have exercised a great deal of discretion in deciding whether to pursue such cases. In the absence of physical contact, said Douglas A. Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University, some prosecutors reviewing e-mail messages like Mr. Foley's "could say, 'This is really gross, I need to take a shower,' but not charge" the sender with a crime.

But Professor Berman added, "There are cases in which people have done stuff that is not significantly worse and have had the book thrown at them."

Earlier this year, for instance, the Arizona Supreme Court upheld a 200-year sentence for a former Phoenix high school teacher convicted of possessing child pornography. The teacher, Morton R. Berger, was not charged with transmitting pornography or with having unlawful contact with minors.

Marjorie Heins, a fellow at the Brennan Center for Justice and the founder of the Free Expression Policy Project, said that prosecutors almost certainly had the legal tools to pursue Mr. Foley if they were inclined to do so.

"I wouldn't be surprised," Ms. Heins said, "if someone could get him criminally under a number of state laws, whether they involve the Internet or not, that prohibit unlawful contact with minors."

But legal experts cautioned that any case against Mr. Foley would involve difficult jurisdictional and constitutional questions. At least three jurisdictions may be implicated: Washington and Florida, where Mr. Foley worked; the federal system; and perhaps other states, as information about contacts with pages emerges.

Courts have taken varying positions about whether they have the power to hear cases involving communications originating in other states. And laws regulating speech on the Internet have often faced First Amendment challenges.

A Florida law makes it a third-degree felony, punishable by up to five years in prison, to transmit "material harmful to minors by electronic device." The law defines the material broadly to include descriptions of "nudity, sexual conduct, or sexual excitement." There is an exception for materials with serious literary, artistic, scientific and political value. The e-mail messages disclosed to date appear to fail that test, though they may have serious political value in a different sense.

And Mr. Foley is not the only person who could possibly face prosecution, Professor Berman said. "If there were people who knew about him or protected him," he said, "some sort of complicity or conspiracy charge is certainly viable."

Prosecutors Seek Pirro's Financial Records (NYT)

By SEWELL CHAN And WILLIAM K. RASHBAUM

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Federal prosecutors have issued a subpoena for copies of financial disclosure statements filed by Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for state attorney general, from 1998 to 2005, when she was the Westchester County district attorney, a person familiar with the subpoena said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0072979

The request for the documents, which contain details of Ms. Pirro's personal finances, is the latest in a series of developments that have roiled her campaign. On Wednesday, Ms. Pirro disclosed that she was the subject of a federal investigation into whether she illegally recorded her husband's conversations on the family's boat last year to determine whether he was having an affair.

The New York Post, which reported on the subpoena yesterday, said it came from a federal grand jury in Manhattan.

A person familiar with the subpoena said yesterday that it was delivered late Friday afternoon to the Westchester County Board of Ethics and gave county officials until Wednesday to respond.

The subpoena asked for disclosure reports from 1998 to 2005 and for the instructions given to Ms. Pirro to use in filling out the reports, according to the person, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the highly politicized nature of the case.

The reports ask officials to disclose bank accounts, stock transactions, real estate holdings, memberships on corporate boards and significant stock ownership. It was not clear why the disclosure statements were being sought.

Paul Shechtman, Ms. Pirro's lawyer, said, "In my conversations with the government, they have given no indication that the investigation involves anything else than Jeanine's talking about eavesdropping."

He added, "The only thing that I can guess is that the financial disclosure statements are being sought to ascertain whether Jeanine claimed an ownership interest in the boat."

Ms. Pirro has acknowledged that she had private investigators follow her husband, Albert J. Pirro Jr., and that she spoke with Bernard B. Kerik, the former New York City police commissioner, about possibly taping Mr. Pirro. She has said she never carried out the idea.

Yesterday, Ms. Pirro attended a campaign rally and a Columbus Day parade on Staten Island, but did not take questions from reporters.

In a written statement released by her campaign, Ms. Pirro repeated her criticism of leaks that she said were intended to smear her campaign. She called again for the Justice Department to appoint a special prosecutor to review her case. And she lashed out again at Elliott B. Jacobson, an assistant United States attorney who Ms. Pirro says has a "partisan political agenda." Mr. Jacobson helped convict Ms. Pirro's husband of tax evasion in 2000; he served 11 months in prison.

"Today's leak to The New York Post really comes as no surprise," Ms. Pirro said in the statement. "As long as Elliott Jacobson remains at the head of this case, continuing leaks are unfortunately predictable. In fact, no one will be surprised if there are more leaks before the end of the week."

In calling for a special prosecutor, she added: "I know there is only one way this case will end; I will be cleared. The only question is whether I will be cleared before Election Day or after Election Day."

Michael J. Garcia, who supervises Mr. Jacobson as the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, said in a statement last week, "We do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations."

A spokesman for Mr. Garcia said in a statement yesterday: "Because the investigation is ongoing, we are not going to comment further. We stand by the statement we issued last Wednesday."

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department in Washington declined to comment on the matter yesterday.

Lobbyists: Sports Tickets And Springsteen—The E-Mail Trail (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Holly Bailey, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 2, 2006

The folks around Karl Rove are on the hot seat again. The White House has launched an internal ethics inquiry into one Rove aide in response to new e-mails showing that Rove's office had far more extensive conduct with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff than previously acknowledged. The e-mails, obtained by a House committee, show that Rove's executive assistant, Susan Ralston, may have violated a White House ban on accepting gifts worth more than $20 from lobbyists. At the same time, Ralston—who previously worked for Abramoff—was helping the lobbyist and his associates set up meetings with Rove and providing them with inside info about presidential appointments and White House decision making, including at least one matter relating to a business deal in Iraq for an Abramoff client, the e-mails show. Ralston also discussed future business opportunities with Abramoff, such as her plan to help him capitalize on the "rush to get lucrative government contracts" being awarded by the Department of Homeland Security—another possible breach of ethics rules.

The e-mails show Ralston peppering Abramoff with requests for small perks and favors. "Can we get the row A seats for the 12/22 Caps game?" she asked Abramoff in a Dec. 22, 2001, e-mail about an upcoming Washington Capitals hockey game. "Need 4 for O's on 8/23 and 4 for Springsteen if possible," she wrote the lobbyist on July 26, 2002. Ralston's lawyer declined to comment. A former associate said Ralston may argue that though she apparently never paid for any of the tickets, she did not violate the ethics rules because of an exemption for officials who have a "pre-existing" and personal relationship with the lobbyist. "She was not looking at [Abramoff] as a lobbyist," said the former associate, who asked not to be identified because of political sensitivities. "She was looking at him as a friend."

The e-mails show Rove's then chief political deputy, Ken Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, had his own repeated contacts with Abramoff—in stark contrast to previous public statements. According to the new records, Abramoff and his associates turned to Mehlman in their bid to obtain $16.3 million in federal funds from the Justice Department to build a jail for the Mississippi Band of Choctaws, an Abramoff client. In one e-mail, Abramoff associate Tony Rudy described to Abramoff a meeting he had with Mehlman about the subject. "Mehlman said he would take care of this," Rudy wrote. "He was a rock star." After Justice later approved funding for the Choctaw jail, another Abramoff associate e-mailed a colleague: "Those guys should get anything they want for the rest of the time they're in office ... Opening Day tickets, Skins v. Giants, oriental massages, hookers, whatever ... " Mehlman denied any wrongdoing. "The job of the political director is to meet with interested parties—in some cases, political supporters—and hear them out," he said Friday. Of the events described in the report, Mehlman said, "It was all stuff that was aboveboard. All stuff that was appropriate." Rove himself apparently knew the rules: when Abramoff offered skybox tickets to an NCAA basketball game, he wrote a check for them.

Still, the game gave Abramoff a chance to discuss other matters with Rove. After being e-mailed by an old friend who was a militant Israeli settler, Abramoff responded: "I was sitting with Karl Rove, Bush's top advisor, at the NCAA basketball game, discussing Israel when [your] email came in. I showed it to him. It seems that the President was very sad to have to come out negatively regarding Israel but that they needed to mollify the Arabs for the upcoming war on Iraq. That did not seem to work anyway. Bush seems to love Sharon and Israel, and thinks Arabfat [sic] is nothing but a liar. I thought I'd pass that on."

Leveraging The Lobbyist Scandal (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, October 2, 2006

For a congressional candidate, a presidential visit during campaign season is a sought-after opportunity reserved for those who really need it. So midterm watchers were surprised to hear that President George W. Bush would travel to northeastern California this week to raise an estimated $500,000 for Republican incumbent Representative John Doolittle. Doolittle hasn't won less than 60% of the vote since 1992, and Republicans outnumber Democrats 48% to 30% in his district. So why spend valuable time and fund-raising muscle on a man who should be a sure thing? One simple answer: Jack Abramoff.

Conventional wisdom holds that the Abramoff lobbying scandal that engulfed Washington a year ago has fizzled. Nothing like the 60 court cases some predicted have materialized. Democrats, beset by their own ethics scandals in West Virginia and Louisiana, have all but abandoned attempts to nationalize corruption as an issue. Even last week's revelation that Abramoff had 82 contacts with Bush adviser Karl Rove registered barely a blip on the capital's political seismograph.

But the scandal did knock two powerful Republicans out of Congress over the past year, putting both their seats in play. At the same time, Democrats are finding that in a handful of districts like Doolittle's, their opponents' ties to Abramoff are helping them raise money and close poll numbers, forcing expensive countermeasures like the Bush visit. And with races tightening across the country, a handful of districts may be enough. The Abramoff factor has put up to five seats in play for Democrats in a contest in which 15 would give them control of the House.

One of the seats most likely to flip is that of former House majority leader Tom DeLay, who stepped down a year ago amid revelations of his ties to Abramoff. Although DeLay dropped out of his House race after the primary last April, it was too late to get his name off the ballot. Now the Democratic candidate Nick Lampson is the favorite of most oddsmakers to beat the late-starting G.O.P. write-in candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs. In southeastern Ohio, former House Administration Committee chairman Bob Ney is retiring after pleading guilty last month to trading favors for campaign contributions from Abramoff. But his handpicked replacement, Joy Padgett, can't shake the taint of scandal. Ney's solidly Republican district favored Bush by 14 percentage points in 2004 but is now polling anywhere from 2% to 14% in favor of Democrat Zack Space.

G.O.P. incumbents are safer, but some are still worried. In Arizona, Representative J.D. Hayworth is up against a popular local official, Harry Mitchell, whose first TV ad last week led with charges that Hayworth took $100,000 from Abramoff and his clients. "This guy's going to be all Abramoff all the time," says Hayworth. "But it's just not going to work." Or maybe it will. The Democrats claim Mitchell leads Hayworth by 3%, but the Republicans have Hayworth ahead by 14%.

As for Doolittle, his opponent Charlie Brown is a retired 26-year Air Force veteran whose campaign consists largely of charges that Doolittle and his wife, who worked for Abramoff, are lining their pockets at constituents' expense. Doolittle's spokesman Richard Robinson admits he faces a "tough challenge." All the same, Democrats in Washington at first paid Brown no attention. "They told me, 'We're only going to believe it if you can raise money in the district and if you do a poll that shows you're in the running,'" Brown says. He says he promptly raised $600,000 and commissioned a poll that showed him closing to within 2 points of Doolittle. Now Brown says the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has agreed to send him a check. He's still a long shot. But says Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report: "If it weren't for the Abramoff scandal, we wouldn't even be talking about these races."

BRONX BIGS IN PROBE (NYPOST)

By MURRAY WEISS And DAVID SEIFMAN

The New York Post, October 2, 2006

October 2, 2006 -- The feds are probing two Bronx political powerhouses and their roles in lucrative real-estate dealings in the borough, The Post has learned.

Sources said the FBI is investigating the dealings of Bronx Democratic leader José Rivera and Stanley Schlein, the longtime lawyer for the party and a well-known figure in local politics.

Schlein served as a lobbyist for the New York Yankees, which enlisted most of the city's political establishment, including Rivera, on its side to push through plans for a new $1 billion ballpark.

The federal probe doesn't currently include the new Yankee Stadium project, but sources said the deal likely will be examined.

About a month ago, an agent from the bureau's Public Corruption Unit quizzed Ellington Taylor, 62, who until his recent retirement had served as Rivera's driver for more than two decades.

Sources said a Manhattan federal grand jury has issued subpoenas for government and business records.

The sources wouldn't provide any other details.

Schlein expressed shock when contacted by The Post yesterday, saying there is no basis for an investigation.

"I'm absolutely befuddled," he said. "I'm at a complete loss."

Schlein said he's been involved in only two major Bronx land-use projects in recent years, both in well-documented public roles.

One was the Yankee Stadium deal. He said he also served as an unpaid advocate for the Bloomberg administration when it sought approval of a $1.5 billion water-filtration plant underneath Van Cortlandt Park, which Rivera also championed.

As part of the deal, The Bronx is receiving $240 million to renovate its parks.

After the FBI visited Taylor, Schlein said the driver called him and he contacted Rivera.

Rivera couldn't be reached for comment.

But Schlein said he and Rivera have no business relationship and Rivera is not involved with any developers.

FBI officials declined comment.

Rivera is a former city councilman whose son, Joel, now serves as the council majority leader and whose daughter, Naomi, is an assemblywoman from the borough.

Schlein has served as an adviser to a wide range of politicians, from Al Sharpton to Fernando Ferrer.

The Chaos Behind California Executions (LAT)

By Maura Dolan And Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

SAN JOSE — "Operational Procedure No. 770," the state's name for execution by lethal injection, is performed in a dark, cramped room by men and women who know little, if anything, about the deadly drugs they inject under extreme stress.

Thousands of pages of depositions and four days of testimony last week in a federal courtroom here provided the most intimate portrait yet of a state's lethal injection methods.

Witnesses depicted executions by lethal injection — long considered a more humane alternative to the gas chamber or the electric chair — as almost haphazard events, and medical experts on both sides could not rule out the possibility that one or more inmates had been conscious and experienced an excruciating sensation of drowning or strangulation before death.

Describing the pressure executioners feel and the surreal atmosphere in which they work, one executioner explained: "There's no other place in the world that you're asked to start an IV for that purpose."

U.S. District Court Judge Jeremy Fogel, who presided over the trial here, is now reviewing the testimony and records to determine if the state can continue to perform lethal injection executions or if it should revise procedures to ensure the condemned don't suffer cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Constitution. The litigation was brought by Michael Morales, condemned for the 1981 murder of Terri Winchell, 17, a high school student from Lodi.

Morales, like inmates in several other states who have also challenged lethal injection, claims prisoners may not be anesthetized properly before receiving a muscle-paralyzing drug that would mask any suffering before a third, heart-stopping chemical kills them. His witnesses insisted that trained medical personnel are needed to ensure a humane execution.

The testimony of dueling doctors and pharmacologists underscored the incongruity of using a medical procedure to produce a decidedly nonmedical result.

Witnesses for both sides stumbled when discussing the condemned, frequently referring to an inmate as "the patient."

Lawyers for the state defended the work of the executioners, stressing it was much less complicated than medicine. An execution, after all, is supposed to be punishment, the attorneys reminded the court.

When anesthesia is administered in a hospital setting, "you have two objectives — one to render the patient unconscious, and two, to make sure you don't kill him," said senior Assistant Atty. Gen. Dane Gillette, the lead lawyer for the state. "That is not at all the objective of a lethal injection execution."

All California executions take place at San Quentin prison north of San Francisco. The condemned is strapped on a gurney in a small, mint-green room that for decades served as the gas chamber.

After the IVs are set up, the chamber's heavy, solid steel door is shut and locked, and the inmate is left alone. A prison employee leans into the door to seal it, an apparent holdover from the days when the prison had to ensure toxic gas would not escape.

The execution team retires to an adjacent room, where members insert the execution drugs by syringe into IV lines that run through the wall and into the inmate's arms.

That anteroom is often packed with state officials, prosecutors and other government visitors. There were "so many people in that room you didn't even know who they were" and why they were there, Dr. Donald Calvo, a prison doctor, testified in a deposition.

Former San Quentin Warden Steven W. Ornoski said that during one execution, "I don't believe I could move from my spot much, if any." He once had to tell someone to leave. It was a doctor.

A nurse working in the jammed room said she had to pass syringes to an outstretched hand whose owner she could not see. The same nurse said she did not know the origins of a document with instructions for the drugs. She had simply found it "in the gas chamber."

To prevent the executioners from being seen or identified by witnesses, their room is illuminated only by a red light. A doctor who filled out execution records said the room was so dark he had to use a flashlight to see what he was writing.

The IV bags hang from ducts so high that it would be impossible to determine if everything was working properly, testified Dr. Mark Heath, a Columbia University anesthesiologist and expert witness for Morales. A member of the execution team said in a deposition that she believed "the janitor" helped set the bags.

The executioners are chosen from among a group of volunteer prison workers. Though several have had medical training as registered nurses, background screening appears to have been minimal.

A prison employee was chosen as team leader even though he had missed months of work and had been under care for post-traumatic stress caused, he said in his deposition, by "my years of working in the prison system." That executioner, who was taking antidepressants, also had been disciplined for a drunk driving conviction.

Testimony suggested lax oversight of the drugs issued at San Quentin for executions. A witness testified that bottles of the barbiturate anesthetic taken for practice sessions were not opened, but there was no evidence they were returned.

Fogel wanted to know whether the anesthetic could be used as a recreational drug. Witnesses for the state and Morales disagreed.

Lawyers testified about witnessing executions, one in California and the others in North Carolina, which has a lethal injection procedure similar to California's.

Heather Jarvis recalled watching North Carolina capital prisoner Edward Hartman, 38, wheeled into the execution chamber on a gurney, covered from neck to toe by a white sheet.

"I saw Eddie's eyes close, and I thought to myself, 'Here we go. This is it.' Almost immediately his eyes opened again, not fully, more than halfway up but not completely. His eyes remained open for the entire execution."

She said his throat began to throb and pulsate like a lizard's, and his chest heaved and strained so violently she thought he would fall off the gurney.

"Then he became still, and his eyes finally did close."

After reviewing evidence about lethal injection, Fogel earlier this year ordered California to either have a doctor present at executions or instead give the inmate only a massive, fatal dose of anesthesia without the other drugs.

The state chose to go with the doctor option, hiring two anesthesiologists but assuring them they would be mere observers.

Dr. Robert Singler, a Napa anesthesiologist, reluctantly agreed to join the team at the request of a friend, Darc Keller, who works for the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. Singler testified in court that he believed the state's methods would ensure a humane execution.

DOJ_NMG_0072983

The other doctor, identified as "Anesthesiologist 2," was to play a lesser role. He said in a deposition he agreed to be present only after he was assured he would have "nothing" to do.

"What do you mean by 'nothing'?" he said he asked.

"You would have no responsibilities," he quoted Keller as saying.

Anesthesiologist 2 said he even received permission from the warden to stand in a room off the anteroom during the execution so he would not have to watch it.

On the night Morales was to die, the two anesthesiologists learned that an appeals court had ruled they would have to intervene if problems arose during the execution. Both Singler and Anesthesiologist 2 refused, saying they were bound by the physician's obligation to do no harm.

Morales, who had been stripped of his possessions and moved to a special cell, learned several hours later that his appointment for Operational Procedure No. 770 had been postponed.

GRAND-MA THEFT (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, October 2, 2006

September 30, 2006 -- The feds busted seven members of a Lower Manhattan boiler-room operation that allegedly raked in $6.7 million in just six months - bilking many elderly victims out of their life savings.

The FBI rousted the alleged scammers from their beds early yesterday morning, charging them with wire and mail fraud for cold-calling victims and using high-pressure tactics to squeeze cash out of 230 investors in a foreign currency scam from 2002 to 2003.

In convincing potential investors to cough up their cash, the cold-callers - operating out of the fraudulent firm Holston, Young, Parker and Assoc. at 130 William St. - falsely claimed their client lists included CEOs of Fortune 500 companies and numerous celebrities.

A total of 11 ring members were charged in an indictment unsealed in Manhattan federal court, including Boris Shuster, 34, Larry Shuster, Alexander Dzedets, 31, and Victor Altman, 38, Boris Tager, David Lozovsky, Adam Lichtenbaum, Edward Sharov, and Vincent Armato, who allegedly operated and managed Holston as a boiler-room operation.

Victims throughout the U.S. initially received bogus monthly financial statements reporting 5 percent growth on their investments over the first several months, according to Andrew Arena, chief of the FBI's criminal division in New York.

All the while, the alleged scam artists were secretly sending cash from the operation overseas to Cyprus and Russia.

After approximately six months, investors were sent letters saying that 90 percent of their money had been lost after a year of unprecedented market losses, authorities said.

"It was basically a flat-out boiler-room operation," Arena said. "Over a six month period, they were able to generate $6.7 million. They grab the money, close the company down and they're gone."

Seven men were arrested in New York yesterday and an eighth man was nabbed in Croatia.

"Unfortunately, by far the majority of victims in these scams turn out to be the elderly," Arena said. "They get confused. They fall for the hard sell. They invest their money."

The cold-callers used false names and lied about the company's history, claiming to manage $10 million to $30 million in clients' money.

Holston advertised itself as having offices in London, Zurich and Tokyo.

The wire and mail fraud charges carry a maximum sentence of 20 years.

FBI CHARGES MEN WITH FOREX FRAUD. FBI agents arrested seven men Friday, including four from Forest Hills, on charges of running a boiler-room scheme that defrauded 200 investors out of $6.5 million, officials said. An eighth defendant in the scheme, which promised high returns through currency exchange - the so-called Forex market - was arrested recently in Croatia, according to Michael Garcia, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District. The head of the FBI's New York Criminal Division, Andrew Arena, said some victims lost their life savings. Victims' money was not invested in the Forex market, but moved to accounts in Russia and Cyprus for the profit of the defendants, Arena said. The defendants operated from an office on William Street in Manhattan from 2002 to 2003, under the name of Holston, Young, Parker & Associates, officials said. Officials identified the leader as Boris Schuster, 34 - who also uses the name Robert Schuster - of Forest Hills. The seven were charged

FUEL PRICES REVIVE CONSUMERS. U.S. consumer spending slipped in August, but falling gasoline prices elevated shoppers' moods by September, according to reports Friday. Inflation-adjusted spending in August fell by 0.1 percent, the first decline since a 0.3 percent drop in September 2005, according to the U.S. Commerce Department. The University of Michigan's consumer sentiment index rose to 85.4 in September, up from 82.0 in August. Consumer prices outside food and energy rose 0.2 percent in August.

STATE BANCORP LOSES APPEAL. State Bancorp Inc. said Friday the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York denied its motion to overturn a January 2006 jury verdict that the company has said could cost it $44 million dollars after taxes. The New Hyde Park-based holding company for State Bank of Long Island said it is "fully reserved" for the matter and plans to appeal the decision to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. - SUSAN HARRIGAN

Con Men Held In Boiler-room Scheme (BOS/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, October 2, 2006

NEW YORK --A team of con men posing as senior vice presidents of an international Wall Street investment firm cheated about 230 people nationwide out of more than $6.5 million, authorities said Friday.

Seven suspects were awaiting arraignment in federal court in Manhattan on mail and wire fraud charges after being arrested at their homes early Friday by the FBI. Another suspect was in custody in Croatia; three were at large.

One of the men was wearing a Curious George T-shirt as FBI agents led him to court in handcuffs.

Many victims were elderly people who "fell for the hard sell," said Andrew Arena, head of the criminal division of the FBI's New York office. Some lost their life savings.

The phony firm of Holston, Young, Parker & Associates had an actual lower Manhattan address, but also claimed to have offices in London, Zurich and Tokyo that didn't exist, an indictment said.

In 2002 and 2003, the defendants, most of Russian descent, operated "a 'boiler room' with Holston cold-callers and brokers making numerous unsolicited telephone calls on a daily basis and using high-pressure tactics," the court papers said. The victims were told their money would be pooled to make large trades on the foreign currency exchange market.

The callers used false names and identified themselves as senior vice presidents to dupe potential investors into thinking they were speaking to "a senior level, experienced employee," the indictment said. One defendant falsely claimed that the firm's clients included celebrities and CEOs of Fortune 500 companies.

Investors initially got bimonthly statements showing 5 percent increases in their investments, unaware most of their money was being diverted to bank accounts in Russian and Cyprus, the FBI said. By the time a final statement arrived showing 90 percent losses, the suspects had closed their doors.

According to the indictment, the unidentified victims included a resident of El Reno, Okla., who invested $1,000; one from Conneaut, Ohio, who invested $5,000; and another from Williamsburg, Va., who invested $10,000.

If convicted, the defendants face up to 20 years in prison.

888 Poised To Suspend US Business (FT)

By Roger Blitz In London

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

888 Holdings, one of the biggest companies in the $12bn online gambling industry, is expected to suspend indefinitely business from US customers on Monday.

The move comes as the sector braces itself for a massive reaction from investors to the dramatic US decision to tighten its anti-gambling laws. People close to 888 said they believed the company would issue a statement to the London Stock Exchange accepting that the passing of the bill in the US Senate on Friday would have a “material” detrimental impact on its business.

The bill prohibits US gamblers from using credit cards, cheques and electronic fund transfers to make online wagers, and throws the high-risk industry – already damaged by the impact of arrests of executives on US soil – into turmoil. One person in the industry said the bill was an attempt to “strangle the industry through the banks”.

PartyGaming, the biggest online gambling company, said it was “evaluating the situation”.

SportingBet – whose former chairman Peter Dicks returned to the UK on Saturday after a New York court refused to extradite him to Louisiana, where he faced a charge of “gambling by computer” – was believed to be preparing a statement for the stock exchange, but is expected to wait to assess the impact of the bill.

888, which relies on the US for half its profits, was said to be in the process of deciding to make a clean break with the US, paying back gambling deposits paid by customers when they registered on the company's websites.

But trading on Monday is likely to hit the sector hard as investors, who have been waiting for the outcome of the Senate bill, get their first chance to respond to its passing. "It's going to be pretty devastating," said one adviser to a sector company.

12 Men Face Federal Child Porn Charges (BUFFNEWS)

By T.J. PIGNATARO, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, September 29, 2006

A dozen men, including eight from Western New York, are facing federal child pornography charges here under a national initiative targeting those who sexually exploit children, the FBI and U.S. Department of Justice announced Thursday.

Those charged face a variety of offenses including possessing, transporting or distributing child pornography. The crimes range from possessing images of child pornography downloaded from the Internet to the production of child pornography during sexually abusive acts, authorities said.

"These are monsters that prey upon our innocent children," said Laurie J. Bennett, special agent in charge of the Buffalo Field Office of the FBI.

U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn said Internet child pornography is a continuing act of child abuse committed by those who not only produce the images but also possess and exchange them. "[The children] are being abused time and time and time again because the picture is not destroyed," he said.

Bennett said the Buffalo office was one of the first 13 offices nationwide to institute the Innocent Images National Initiative to target those involved in the online sexual exploitation of children. Since 2002, more than 400 arrests have been made, she said.

The dozen federal cases announced in the roundup Thursday included the following individuals: Richard Bozmoff, 39, of Warren, Ohio; Bruce Bremer, 49, of Buffalo; Vincent A. Carney, 44, of North Tonawanda; Allen F. Dise, 47, of Albion; Richard Harrold, no age listed, of North Carolina; Richard Lamphere, 34, of California; Edward Keef, 37, of the Town of Tonawanda; Nathan Littlefield, 32, of Massachusetts; Thomas Powers, 47, of Lockport; Hans Sterzelbach, 64, of Grand Island; William J. Swiat, 21, of Cheektowaga; and Lloyd Thomas, 58, of Akron.

Most face sentences of up to 20 years in prison. Others face up to 10 or 30 years, depending on their crimes.

Dise, a former Buffalo News employee in the editorial graphics department, initially came to the attention of law enforcement authorities in February when he provided a co-worker with what he thought was a blank compact disk. The disk was found, however, to contain sexually explicit images of young girls. The FBI reported Dise had more that 100 images believed to be child pornography. His case was referred to federal authorities for prosecution. Dise faces up to 10 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and lifetime supervision.

His attorney, Mark J. Mahoney, said he was "very disappointed" that authorities are pursuing Dise's case federally, rather than by a state prosecution. He said Dise faces a much longer potential prison term because the case is being pursued federally.

"If he was a producer of child pornography, I could understand this decision," Mahoney said. "But [prosecutors] know there is no indication that he did anything but look at pictures that were free for him to obtain over the Internet."

Bozmoff, a 17-year Army veteran who ran a private consulting business, pleaded guilty Thursday to transporting child pornography and faces five to 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and lifetime supervision.

Bozmoff sent several videos of prepubescent children engaged in sexual conduct to undercover FBI agents and admitted to possessing more than 300 images on his computer, including some of minors under age 12 and others depicting sexual acts "readily capable of inflicting pain upon the children," authorities reported.

Both Flynn and Bennett encouraged parents, teachers and the public to learn more about the sexual exploitation of children in order to protect children from predators, and urged them to contact the FBI with any information at 856-7800. The FBI will hold a free Cyber Safety community forum at 7 p.m. Thursday in the University at Buffalo Center for the Arts.

Man To Be Arraigned On Child Porn Charges (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

A Brea man has been arrested on suspicion of possessing child pornography, officials said Friday.

Theodore Allen Jedinak, 55, was in federal custody in Santa Ana and set to be arraigned Monday after authorities found numerous pornographic images and videos of minors on his home computer, according to the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0072986

The material came to the bureau's attention, an agency statement said, after Jedinak engaged in the "initial stages" of a relationship with an unidentified individual he met online. After being shown multiple videos of minors engaged in sex acts, the statement said, the individual called Brea police, who contacted federal officials.

Jedinak was taken into custody this week at a relative's home in Chino.

Illinois Man Sentenced For Molesting Teen (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 2, 2006

MISSOULA, Mont. - An Illinois man was sentenced to five years in prison after pleading guilty to interstate transportation of a minor and engaging a boy in a relationship that included sexually explicit Internet communication.

Stephen Quinn, 45, of Harwood Heights, Ill., was sentenced Friday by U.S. District Judge Donald Molloy.

The FBI began investigating Quinn in 2005, about two years after he made contact with the boy in a gay chat room on the Internet.

Prosecutors said that in July 2004, Quinn traveled to Montana and engaged in sexual activity with the boy, then 16. The next month, Quinn flew the juvenile to Illinois and then drove him to Wisconsin, where they attended a concert and engaged in sexual activity.

Wisconsin's legal age of consent is 18 and Illinois' is 17.

Prosecutors said that in October 2004, Quinn visited the juvenile in Montana and purchased several items for him, including alcohol.

On May 6, 2005, Quinn called the juvenile's mother to say the boy had been luring older men on the Internet for sex. Eleven days later, Quinn spoke with the boy's mother in a conversation recorded by the FBI.

The FBI also obtained threatening e-mails, text messages and recorded phone calls from Quinn to the boy.

Augustine's Husband Charged In Her Death (RGJ)

By RAY HAGAR And MARTHA BELLISLE, RENO GAZETTE-JOURNAL

Reno Gazette-Journal, October 2, 2006

Reno police arrested critical-care nurse Chaz Higgs on Friday in Hampton, Va., on a warrant charging him with first-degree murder in the death of his wife, former State Controller Kathy Augustine.

The arrest was made after police received a toxicology report from the FBI indicating the presence of succinylcholine, a powerful paralyzing drug, in her urine. The drug paralyzes muscles in the body within several minutes, including the muscles used for breathing, according to medical experts.

Police also used as evidence a phone call from a nurse who said Higgs allegedly told her on July 7 that accused Reno murder suspect Darren Mack had been "stupid" to have killed his wife the way he allegedly did, and said if he wanted to kill someone, he would use the undetectable drug succinylcholine.

Augustine, 50, was taken to Washoe Medical Center the next day after Higgs said she had suffered a massive heart attack in their Reno home. He said the heart attack was brought on from the stress of political campaigning. Augustine, the only Nevada constitutional office ever to be impeached and convicted, was running as a Republican for state treasurer.

Augustine died three days later at the hospital, now called Renown Regional Medical Center.

"It's like losing my mother a second time," Augustine's daughter, Dallas, said. "I'm very angry at the fact that she could be standing here with us today if this had not happened."

Some members of Augustine's family called for the death penalty if Higgs is found guilty.

"I realize that this has to go to a jury, but clearly in my mind, he has killed my sister," said Phil Alfano of Turlock, Calif., Kathy Augustine's brother.

Augustine's stepson, Greg Augustine of Thousand Oaks, Calif., said he is considering asking Clark County officials to perform an autopsy on the body of Augustine's former husband, Charles Augustine, because of the toxicology results.

Higgs, who worked at Carson Tahoe Regional Medical Center at the time of his wife's death, was the critical-care nurse for Charles Augustine in Las Vegas when he died of a stroke in 2003 at the age of 63.

Kathy Augustine and Higgs were married about three weeks after Charles Augustine's death.

"It would be irresponsible of me not to look into the option that he (Higgs) played a part in my father's death," Greg Augustine said. "He (Charles Augustine) was a good guy and he didn't deserve that."

Contributing to police suspicions was a call just after Augustine's death from a traveling nurse who had worked with Higgs at Carson Tahoe Hospital on July 7, according to the arrest warrant affidavit filed by Reno homicide Detective David Jenkins.

She said Higgs had referred to Mack "" a Reno pawn shop owner charged with fatally stabbing his estranged wife, Charla, in June "" and said that Mack was "stupid" to allegedly kill her "in the manner he had. He said if he wanted to kill someone, he would use the drug succinylcholine," the affidavit said.

"Mr. Higgs allegedly told her that he was currently having marital difficulties with his wife and that he intended on ending his relationship with her," the affidavit said.

The nurse did not think twice about the remarks until learning that Augustine was found unconscious in her home, Jenkins said.

Dr. Ellen Clark, who performed an autopsy on Augustine, reported that "she did find evidence of a suspicious needle injection injury on Ms. Augustine's buttock and that the medical records generated during Ms. Augustine's treatment and hospitalization did not account for that injection site," the affidavit said.

Reno police Lt. Jon Catalano said a search of Augustine's home after her death did not find succinylcholine or any syringes containing the drug. But police did find a drug that was similar to the paralyzing agent.

Higgs can waive his extradition to Nevada, and he can return quickly, Catalano said. Or he can fight extradition, and it would take about 10 days for a governor's warrant, he said.

Family members were suspicious of Higgs soon after Kathy Augustine died, they said.

"We were suspicious from day one," said Augustine's cousin, Dion Gazzaruso, of Sylmar, Calif.

Higgs tried to slit his wrists three days after his wife's death at their home in Las Vegas. Higgs did not attend his wife's funeral the day after his attempted suicide or her subsequent memorial service in Carson City.

Higgs never returned to work at Carson Tahoe Medical Center after Augustine's death, a hospital spokeswoman said. While employed at Carson Tahoe Medical Center, Higgs would have had access to succinylcholine, a spokeswoman said.

Higgs left Nevada to live with his father and stepmother in Hampton, Va., after Augustine's death. The FBI met Higgs on Friday as he pulled into his brother's driveway in Hampton, Va., and held him until local law enforcement officials arrived for the arrest, Catalano said. Two Reno police detectives flew out to Virginia to assist in the arrest, Catalano said.

Dallas Augustine called authorities to help Higgs after finding him following his suicide attempt.

"I found him and at that point was standing by my belief of innocent until proven guilty," she said, adding, "But now we have conclusive evidence to go on."

Augustine's brother said he hopes Higgs confesses to murder.

"I may be naive in wishing this, but I hope Chaz comes clean and spares us the additional grief of going through a trial and spares my parents that grief," said Alfano, who is a high school principal in Modesto, Calif.

The Nevada Assembly impeached Augustine in August of 2004 for using state staff for her 2002 re-election bid. The state Senate convicted her and censured her on one violation. She was acquitted of using a state computer and staff to help her campaign. She kept her job as controller but was fined $15,000 by the state Ethics Commission.

Augustine's name remained on the primary election ballot because state officials did not have time to remove it after her death for the Aug. 15 election. Augustine received 18.64 percent of the votes in the primary, or 26,391 votes statewide. After her death, she was endorsed by two conservative groups, Liberty Watch of Nevada and the Citizen Outreach political action committee.

If Augustine had won the primary, the Nevada Republican Party would have been allowed to choose a new candidate, according to the Nevada Secretary of State's Office.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

DEATH OF NEVADA CONTROLLER: Husband Arrested (LVRJ)

By BRIAN HAYNES, GLENN PUIT And ED VOGEL, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, October 2, 2006

Authorities say powerful paralyzing drug was administered to kill Augustine in July

Chaz Higgs spoke of committing the perfect crime.

If he wanted to kill somebody, he told a fellow nurse in July, he would use a paralyzing drug that he believed would go undetected after death, according to a police report.

The next morning his wife, state Controller Kathy Augustine, was rushed to a Reno hospital. She never regained consciousness, and three days later she was dead.

Higgs, 42, a critical care nurse at Carson-Tahoe Hospital, told police and media that Augustine had suffered a heart attack. But it wasn't long before the whispers started.

DOJ_NMG_0072988

The couple's relationship was on the rocks, and she was talking about divorce, people said. He didn't seem to grieve like a loving husband would. She was in perfect health.

The whispers didn't stop until Friday, when authorities arrested Higgs in Hampton, Va., on charges of first-degree murder in Augustine's death.

Reno police said Augustine died after being injected with succinylcholine, a powerful muscle relaxant and paralyzing agent often used in hospitals to temporarily paralyze a patient so a breathing tube can be inserted into the windpipe.

It was the same drug Higgs had mentioned to his co-worker, police said, one that has been frequently used by medical workers to commit murder.

For Phil Alfano, Augustine's brother, the arrest confirmed suspicions that had been simmering since Augustine was hospitalized.

"You know how it is with a relative," he said. "You don't want to say things. But things with him bothered me."

The arrest also renewed interest in the death of Augustine's former husband of 17 years, Charles Augustine, who died in 2003 at Sunrise Hospital and Medical Center. Higgs had taken care of Charles Augustine at the hospital, and three weeks after he died Higgs and Kathy Augustine married in Hawaii.

Clark County District Attorney David Roger said Friday evening he had been in contact with both Washoe County authorities and Las Vegas homicide investigators regarding the Augustine case and in particular, the fate of her former husband. He said he will meet with Las Vegas police Monday to discuss whether the body of Charles Augustine should be exhumed.

Greg Augustine, Kathy Augustine's 36-year-old stepson, has hired Las Vegas lawyer Dominic Gentile to ask authorities to investigate his father's death. Greg Augustine had said he wanted his father's body exhumed if investigators found foul play in his stepmother's death.

"It would be irresponsible for me not to do this for Dad," he said. "He did suffer a stroke, but he was getting better."

Dr. Cyril Wecht, one of the nation's most respected medical examiners, said he believes Charles Augustine's body must be exhumed and screened for succinylcholine.

"I think they've got to in light of the facts of this case," Wecht said. "I would."

Kathy Augustine seemed to be in perfect health before she was rushed to Washoe Medical Center the morning of July 8.

Higgs had called 911 about 6:30 a.m. from the couple's Reno home. He told police he had found Augustine in bed, unconscious and not breathing.

At a news conference, Higgs told reporters that Augustine had suffered a heart attack.

But during Augustine's autopsy, medical examiners found no evidence of heart disease that could trigger a sudden heart attack. They did find a mysterious needle mark on her buttocks that could not be explained, according to a Reno police report.

As suspicions about Higgs grew in the days following Augustine's death, he proclaimed his innocence.

"I loved this woman who died, and now there is all this (expletive) coming up," Higgs told the Review-Journal. "It is just crazy for people to assume I had something to do with it. I asked for the autopsy. I want to clear it up. My wife was a healthy 50-year-old woman who dropped dead. I want to find out what happened. People don't know what went on in our home. She was frazzled and stressed out."

A day after speaking with the newspaper, Higgs slashed his wrists in the Las Vegas home he had shared with Augustine. He was released from a local hospital later that day and didn't make another public statement. He also did not attend her funeral the next day.

Meanwhile authorities sent Augustine's urine sample to the FBI forensic lab in Quantico, Va., for analysis. Among the substances the lab began looking for was succinylcholine, the substance Higgs had mentioned to a fellow nurse the day before Augustine lost consciousness, police said.

The nurse called Reno police the day Augustine died and relayed the conversation with Higgs.

The nurse said Higgs mentioned Darren Mack, who is charged with shooting his wife to death and shooting a family court judge in Reno, the police report said.

Higgs called Mack "stupid" and said he would use succinylcholine if he wanted to kill someone because it was undetectable after death, the report said. Higgs also told the nurse he was having marital problems and planned to end the relationship, according to the report.

The nurse's tip was key because succinylcholine isn't usually included in routine toxicology tests, and only specialized labs can detect it. Investigators would have to suspect its use and order a specific toxicology test to detect it in the blood or urine, Wecht said.

"You have to be thinking of it and looking for it, or it's not going to show," Wecht said.

Succinylcholine is commonly used in the operating room, but if someone is given succinylcholine and they are not given a mechanism to breathe -- such as a breathing tube -- then the patient can die, said Las Vegas anesthesiologist John Brouwers.

"You have to breathe for them," Brouwers said. "The breathing muscles become paralyzed, and you can't breathe for yourself."

Succinylcholine is a controlled drug, meaning you can't just get it anywhere. It is usually found only in a medical or hospital setting.

If an individual is given the drug without an accompanying barbiturate or anesthetic, he or she would remain conscious and unable to communicate while dying.

Reno police received the FBI's test results on Wednesday. They confirmed the presence of succinylcholine in Augustine's urine.

Police got an arrest warrant for Higgs the same day and sent two detectives to Hampton, Va., where Higgs had been visiting relatives for about a month, Reno police Lt. Jon Catalano said.

Authorities sealed the warrant because they didn't want Higgs to learn of it, he said.

"We believed Chaz was a flight risk and, based on what happened in Las Vegas, a suicide risk," Catalano said.

FBI agents staked out Higgs' brother's house Friday and arrested him about 2:50 p.m. Pacific Daylight Time when he pulled into the driveway, he said.

Higgs was booked into the local jail, where he awaits an extradition hearing before he can be transported to Northern Nevada.

A Navy veteran, Higgs had no criminal record but twice filed for personal bankruptcy when he lived in the East. He has a 10-year-old daughter from a previous marriage.

Augustine's daughter, Dallas Augustine, said Higgs' arrest "brought up the whole grieving process all over again."

"Two months ago I was faced with my mom's death, and that was completely devastating. Now I have to deal with the fact that my stepfather is being charged with her murder," she said during a brief statement to the media outside her mother's Las Vegas home.

Greg Augustine said he and other family members had been "cautiously suspicious" that Higgs was responsible for his stepmother's death and didn't believe she died from a stress-related illness.

She might have been in the middle of a political campaign for state treasurer, but she had survived being the only elected official to be impeached in Nevada. In November 2004, the Assembly unanimously impeached Augustine on charges she used her office staff and equipment for her re-election campaign.

She was censured but allowed to keep her office.

She was running for treasurer this year because term limits prevented her from running again for controller.

Alfano, Kathy Augustine's brother, said the family wonders what motive Higgs might have had to kill his wife.

"It is a question we all are asking," said Alfano, a Modesto, Calif., high school principal. "We can't get inside his head. I am confident it all will come out."

Alfano, who is the administrator of Augustine's estate, said her homes in Reno and Las Vegas, as well as a $500,000 annuity, were left to Dallas Augustine.

Higgs only received the couple's motor vehicles and some sports equipment, he said.

Alfano said Augustine drew up her will in 2004 and Higgs might not have known that he would receive little when she died.

He said Augustine did not have a $1 million insurance policy, which some media outlets have reported.

"Their relationship seemed strange to us from the very beginning," Alfano said. "My hope is he does the right thing and owns up to his crime. I hope he spares my family additional grief."

Dallas Augustine said she had no reason to suspect Higgs until Friday.

"I was firm with my believing that everyone is innocent until proven guilty, and now we have the evidence to go on," she said.

"Now he can rot."

Late Nevada Controller's Husband Charged With Her Murder (AP)

By Scott Sonner, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 29, 2006

RENO, Nev. (AP) - The husband of the late Nevada Controller Kathy Augustine was arrested in Virginia on Friday on a charge of killing her with an apparent injection of a paralyzing drug.

Chaz Higgs, 42, was arrested in Hampton, Va., on a warrant issued in Reno charging him with first-degree murder, Reno police spokesman Steve Frady said. Higgs apparently was driving there to visit his father and stepmother, who live there, investigators said.

The warrant was issued Wednesday afternoon, just hours after a coroner's autopsy and results of FBI toxicology tests showed evidence of the drug succinylcholine in Augustine's system. Police described the drug as a "very powerful paralytic."

The warrant and test results had been kept secret until Reno police announced Higgs' arrest Friday afternoon.

"It had become a criminal investigation at that point and everything was sealed," Frady told The Associated Press.

Augustine, 50, died at Washoe Medical Center in Reno on July 11, three days after Higgs, a critical care nurse at Carson-Tahoe Regional Medical Center, said he found her unconscious in their Reno home.

A police affidavit filed in court on Friday states that Higgs had access to the drug and to syringes at his job, and had told another nurse - the day before he called authorities to say that his wife was unconscious - that he would use the drug if he wanted to kill someone because it was undetectable.

According to the affidavit, the coworker said Higgs also stated he was having marital troubles and "intended on ending his relationship" with Augustine.

Higgs told the media that Augustine died of a massive heart attack. But the affidavit says an initial examination "had not revealed evidence of heart disease that would have typically been associated with a sudden and unexpected heart attack."

The document also says a doctor who conducted an autopsy found "a suspicious needle injection injury on Ms. Augustine's buttock."

Three days after Augustine's death, Higgs tried to commit suicide. He was released from a hospital later that day, and didn't attend his wife's funeral the following day.

Augustine's brother, Phil Alfano, said family members had been suspicious of Higgs all along.

"We're saddened but we're not surprised," Alfano said Friday in commenting on Higgs' arrest.

"There were a lot of things that we saw in terms of his behavior during her hospitalization and obviously during the funeral and afterward that made us very suspicious," he told AP.

"At this point we just hope that he does the right thing and cooperates with the police and spares us any additional grief," he said.

"I hope that he rots," Augustine's daughter, Dallas, told AP. She had called authorities to help Higgs after finding him following his suicide attempt.

"I found him and at that point was standing by my belief of innocent until proven guilty," she said, adding, "But now we have conclusive evidence to go on."

"It's like losing my mother a second time," she said. "I'm very angry at the fact that she could be standing here with us today if this had not happened."

Higgs had been the nurse for Augustine's previous husband, Charles Augustine, who died three years ago in Las Vegas. His death certificate says he died of complications from a stroke. Three weeks after her husband's death, Kathy Augustine married Higgs in Hawaii.

Greg Augustine, Kathy Augustine's adult stepson, had said he wanted his father's remains exhumed and an autopsy conducted if the FBI determined Kathy Augustine didn't die of natural causes.

On Friday, Greg Augustine told KVBC-TV, Las Vegas, "It would be irresponsible if I didn't look into my father's death." He added that news of Higgs' arrest "reopened a wound" for his family.

Frady said it would be up to Las Vegas Metro police to reopen the Charles Augustine case. A Metro spokesman had no immediate comment on Friday.

"That would be something our homicide detectives along with detectives from Reno would handle," said Jose Montoya, the department's public information officer.

Frady said a media briefing would be held Monday in Reno to discuss Higgs' arrest. He added that Higgs had been on the East Coast off and on since his wife's funeral.

"The investigators were aware of his locations. That is one of the reasons we moved when we did," he told AP.

FBI agents pulled Higgs over while he was in a vehicle in Hampton on Friday then waited for Hampton police to arrive on scene, Frady said.

"They confirmed the warrant and Hampton police made the arrest. The FBI has been involved for some time. It was a good cooperative effort," Frady said.

Hampton Police Cpl. Allison Good confirmed they arrested Higgs about 6 p.m. She said the FBI had told them he was in the area and described his vehicle. She said she did not know if Higgs was driving or was a passenger or if he was visiting relatives.

Nevada authorities were interviewing Higgs Friday evening, she said.

Higgs has vehemently denied having anything to do with his wife's death. The night before attempting suicide, he told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that he welcomed the police investigation.

"My wife was a healthy 50-year-old woman who dropped dead. I want to find out what happened," Higgs said. at the time. "People don't know what went on in our home. She was frazzled and stressed out."

Investigators said that medical experts told them that the drug found in Augustine's system - pronounced SUCK-suh-COH-leen - paralyzes muscles in the body within several minutes, including the muscles used for breathing. The drug is used in hospital operating rooms, emergency rooms and intensive care units to facilitate placement of breathing tubes in patients, they said.

"It's normally either injected or ingested but the information we have on how she received it has not been made public," Frady said.

Augustine was still alive when Higgs' coworker tipped police to his comments about the drug, according to the affidavit.

Detectives then worked with the Washoe County Coroner's Office and Washoe Medical Center personnel to ensure that biological samples would be available for toxicology testing in the event of her death, Frady said.

Augustine was first elected in 1992 as a Republican state assemblywoman. She became state controller in 1999.

She was impeached by the Assembly and convicted by the Senate for using state equipment on her 2002 campaign, and was censured but not removed from office. Political leaders including Republican Gov. Kenny Guinn called for her to step down, but she refused.

She was running for state treasurer when she died. Elections officials didn't have time to remove her name from last month's primary ballot, creating a potentially embarrassing situation for the state had she won, but Republican voters chose Las Vegas businessman Mark DeStefano.

Injection Killed Nev. Controller, Police Say (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

The official's husband is charged with murder. Her death had been blamed on heart attack.

The husband of late Nevada State Controller Kathy Augustine was arrested Friday and charged with murdering her by injecting her with a paralytic drug, Reno police said, the latest in a series of wild developments that has riveted the state.

Chaz Higgs, 42, a bodybuilder turned nurse, was arrested near his father and stepmother's home in Hampton, Va., said Reno police spokesman Steve Frady.

A first-degree murder warrant for Higgs' arrest had been issued late Wednesday after an FBI toxicology test found a paralytic drug in Augustine's body.

Augustine, 50, died July 11 from what Higgs, who was a critical-care nurse at Washoe Medical Center in Reno, said was a massive heart attack three days earlier.

But authorities found no evidence of heart disease in an autopsy, and many of her friends and family members had suspected Higgs.

"Ever since this happened, we have been cautiously suspicious of Chaz," said Larry Augustine, the controller's stepson and the son of her second husband, Charles Augustine.

"His explanation didn't make sense," Augustine said by telephone from his brother's home in Thousand Oaks. "This was a healthy, vibrant woman, who actually thrived on the stress of her job."

A release issued by the Reno police said that the drug found in Augustine's body, succinylcholine, "paralyzes muscles in the body within several minutes, including the muscles used for breathing.

"It has no effect on consciousness or pain perception," the release added, "so unless sedatives are also introduced, an individual given succinylcholine will be paralyzed and awake while they are dying."

Augustine, a onetime flight attendant who became an assemblywoman and state senator from Las Vegas and then controller, was censured by the Legislature after her 2004 impeachment and conviction for using state resources to campaign.

Resisting calls from the governor and other fellow Republicans to step down, she planned to serve out her term and announced a run this year for state treasurer. In the GOP primary last month, after her death, she received more than 26,000 votes, coming in second.

News of the arrest, Larry Augustine said, was a "punch in the gut" to the family, but it also "confirmed our suspicions."

Charles Augustine died several weeks after he suffered a stroke in 2003. One of his critical care nurses was Higgs.

Charles Augustine's family had believed he was recovering from the stroke and had expressed suspicions about Higgs having had a possible role in the death.

DOJ_NMG_0072992

Just three weeks after he died — leaving Kathy Augustine a Las Vegas home and a $1-million life-insurance policy, according to news reports — she took a trip to Hawaii and brought Higgs along. Friends were surprised when she returned and announced their marriage — her third, his fourth.

Higgs had blamed what he termed Augustine's heart attack on the corruption ordeal — a theory offered just before he slit his wrists in an unsuccessful suicide attempt shortly after her death.

He was released from the hospital the same day but did not attend his wife's funeral the following day.

Kathy Augustine's brother, Phil Alfano, told the Associated Press on Friday that family members were "saddened but not surprised" to hear of the arrest.

"There were a lot of things that we saw in terms of his behavior during her hospitalization … that made us very suspicious," Alfano told AP, referring to the three-day period between her sudden collapse at home and her death.

"At this point," Alfano said, "we just hope that he does the right thing and cooperates with police and spares us any additional grief."

Nevada Fugitive Found In Hampton (DPHR)

By Shawn Day 247-4816

Daily Press, October 2, 2006

Police detained Chaz Higgs, who is accused of killing his politician wife, Controller Kathy Augustine.

HAMPTON -- A Nevada man wanted on suspicion of killing his politician wife this summer was arrested Friday evening in Hampton.

Chaz Higgs, 42, had just parked along Cavalier Road and stepped out of a black BMW at about 6 p.m. when Hampton police and FBI officials took him into custody, Hampton Police Cpl. Allison Good said.

Police in Reno, Nev., had issued an arrest warrant late Wednesday for Higgs.

An autopsy and toxicology report performed on his wife, Nevada state Controller Kathy Augustine, revealed a drug in her system when she died in a Reno hospital's intensive care unit July 11.

The drug, succinylcholine, relaxes the muscles - including those used for breathing - and is used in hospitals to help place breathing tubes in patients. The drug's effects can occur within minutes.

Higgs, a critical care nurse, reported that his wife suffered a heart attack at their Reno home on July 8. An autopsy cast doubt on Higgs' report, however, when no signs of heart disease were discovered during the exam.

Police said the 50-year-old Augustine appeared healthy and had no history of heart problems. Investigators also received an anonymous tip that Augustine's death might not have been accidental.

Higgs has denied being involved in his wife's death. He tried to kill himself three days after Augustine died, according to news reports, but was released from the hospital the day before her funeral. He didn't attend the service.

Higgs had been the nurse for Augustine's previous husband, Charles Augustine, who died three years ago in Las Vegas.

His death certificate says he died of complications from a stroke.

Three weeks after her husband's death, Kathy Augustine married Higgs in Hawaii.

A controversial figure in Nevada politics, Augustine, a Republican, was running for state treasurer when she died. She became state controller, or chief fiscal officer, in 1999.

She was later impeached - and convicted - for using state equipment during her 2002 re-election campaign. Her punishment included a censure, and Republican leaders called on her to resign but she refused.

Steve Frady, a spokesman for Reno Police Department, said Friday that investigators from his department had been working with the FBI and Hampton police after learning Higgs was visiting family in Hampton.

They also learned the descriptions of vehicles that Higgs might be driving or riding in, which led them to Cavalier Road about 6 p.m., Frady said.

Reno police detectives spent several hours questioning Higgs at Hampton's police headquarters.

Shortly after 9 p.m., police took Higgs to the Hampton City Jail, where he was booked as a fugitive.

Offending The Law (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

CALIFORNIA ALREADY HAS some of the toughest sex-offender laws in the country. Late last month, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed a batch of new ones, including measures increasing prison terms for most convicted offenders and barring them from loitering near schools and parks once they're released. Now comes Proposition 83, known as Jessica's Law, which would duplicate many of those measures while adding several costly and questionable features that would do little to reduce crime. Californians should resist letting fear and emotion trump reason and vote no.

The new state laws strengthen all sentences for child rape to 25-years-to-life, elevate possession of child pornography from a misdemeanor to a felony and extend parole for violent sex felons to 10 years.

Proposition 83 includes nearly identical provisions but goes a few disturbing steps further. It would require registered sex offenders to wear electronic monitoring devices for life, regardless of the offense or the likelihood of recidivism. The proposition would also prohibit ex-offenders from living within 2,000 feet of schools, parks and other locations chosen by local governments.

These may sound like effective crime prevention tools, but they wouldn't be. Most evidence shows satellite tracking devices don't reduce sex crimes. The program could cost tens of millions of dollars a year when fully implemented, possibly more. The housing restrictions would make it effectively impossible for parolees to find homes in most California cities, pushing them into rural areas or underground.

The proposition also fails to define just who it would cover. Backers say it would apply only to newly released offenders, but the writing is vague enough that it could retroactively apply to all of California's 90,000 registered sex offenders, increasing the costs of administering the program. Proponents say: Don't worry, the Legislature can clarify the law with a two-thirds vote. But that's an excellent argument for having lawmakers deal with the issue in the first place.

Sex offenders prey on the most innocent and vulnerable among us, and they have rightly been the target of much tough-on-crime legislation. They pose some of the most difficult challenges to an open society. But Proposition 83 isn't the answer.

CIVIL LAW:

Ex-hospital Owner Ordered To Pay $64 Million (CHIT)

By Bruce Japsen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 2, 2006

Judge: Peter Rogan knew of fraud scheme

In one of the largest civil health-care fraud judgments in Chicago history, a federal judge Friday ordered the one-time owner of Edgewater Medical Center to pay more than $60 million for his role in engineering a massive fraud scheme to bilk government health programs.

U.S. District Judge John Darrah ordered Peter Rogan of Valparaiso, Ind., to pay $64.2 million in damages and penalties, saying he had a key role in engineering an elaborate kickback scheme that paid doctors and others to admit patients for unnecessary care from the mid-1990s through 2000.

"This is the largest civil fraud judgment--not even just health care--in this office," said Linda Wawzenski, deputy chief of the civil division of the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago. "We are pleased with the ruling. The judge found that the government's witnesses were credible, even those that are currently serving jail time, and he found that Mr. Rogan was not credible."

While four doctors and a vice president went to prison in a health-care fraud investigation that led to the shuttering of Edgewater Medical Center in 2002, Rogan faced no criminal charges.

Five who worked at the hospital pleaded guilty for their roles in luring homeless or elderly people and others into the North Side hospital at 5700 N. Ashland Ave. for medical care they did not need.

During the three-week civil trial in April, government attorneys called the case "a long-overdue day of reckoning for Mr. Rogan."

In his 64-page opinion and order Darrah said Rogan knew of the scheme and made efforts to conceal his role, citing conversations Rogan had that were taped by physicians cooperating with the FBI. Rogan told his fellow managers he "smelled a rat" and said he would be on guard when talking to physicians he believed were taping his conversations, the judge's order says.

"The evidence at trial demonstrated that Peter Rogan knowingly and for the purpose of obtaining reimbursement from the government caused Edgewater to submit numerous false claims," Darrah said in his order.

Neither Rogan nor his attorneys, Neil Holmen and Joseph Spiegler of Chicago law firm Winston & Strawn, could be reached Friday night for comment.

In earlier interviews and court proceedings Rogan has refused to take any of the blame for the collapse of a hospital that critics say has cost taxpayers tens of millions and a French bank more than $50 million.

Rogan, 60, quietly turned around Edgewater Medical Center in the early 1990s and, along the way, made himself millions on various deals tied to owning and selling the facility and then maintaining a paid management role with it.

DOJ_NMG_0072994

A one-time health-care consultant at the former Ernst & Whinney, later Ernst & Young, Rogan bought Edgewater in 1989 for $1 million plus assumption of nearly $10 million in debt and liabilities. Edgewater's board wanted to get out from under the hospital's troubles and sold it to Rogan, who ran it as his own for-profit hospital for six years.

In 1994 Rogan sold the hospital to California-based, not-for-profit Permian Health Care Inc. for $35 million. Of that, public records show, Rogan got $31 million. In court his lawyers said he got more than $10 million.

Rogan and his lawyers did not deny he made a lot of money. In fact, the lawyers said, because he made so much money he had no reason to be involved with a fraud scheme at the facility.

Judge Orders Ex-hospital Owner To Pay $64.2 Million For Fraud Scheme (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 2, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge has ordered the former owner of a now-shuttered Chicago hospital to pay $64.2 million in damages and penalties for his role in a scheme to bilk government health programs.

Peter Rogan was a key player in the fraud at Edgewater Medical Center on Chicago's North Side, U.S. District Judge John Darrah said in a 64-page opinion issued Friday.

"This is the largest civil fraud judgment - not even just health care - in this office," said Linda Wawzenski, deputy chief of the civil division of the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago. "We are pleased with the ruling. The judge found that the government's witnesses were credible, even those that are currently serving jail time, and he found that Mr. Rogan was not credible."

Rogan, 60, did not face criminal charges for the scheme, which paid doctors and others to admit homeless or elderly people for unnecessary care from the mid-1990s through 2000. Four doctors and a vice president went to prison and the hospital closed in 2002.

Rogan, of Valparaiso, Ind., did not immediately return a telephone message Saturday from The Associated Press. His attorneys also did not return calls for comment left after business hours.

Rogan knew of the scheme and tried to conceal his role, Darrah said, citing taped conversations Rogan had with doctors who cooperated with the FBI.

"The evidence at trial demonstrated that Peter Rogan knowingly and for the purpose of obtaining reimbursement from the government caused Edgewater to submit numerous false claims," Darrah said.

Rogan bought Edgewater in 1989 for $1 million plus assumption of nearly $10 million in debt and liabilities. In 1994 he sold the hospital to Permian Health Care Inc. for $35 million.

Rogan's attorneys have argued that because of his wealth, Rogan had no reason to be involved in a fraud scheme.

During a three-week civil trial in April, government attorneys called the case "a long-overdue day of reckoning for Mr. Rogan."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Va. Ban's Reach Is At Center Of Fight (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Backers of a state constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage contend that the measure wouldn't change life for Virginians, gay or not, one iota.

So why are they asking voters to alter the state's 230-year-old Bill of Rights -- a document that served as a model for the U.S. Bill of Rights -- for the first time in a decade?

Supporters say action is needed to protect the commonwealth's laws against same-sex marriage from state judges who could rule that they are unconstitutional, as happened in Massachusetts in 2003 and in Maryland in January when a circuit court judge ruled that a law banning same-sex marriage was discriminatory.

"Nothing will change," said Del. Robert G. Marshall (R-Prince William), one of the amendment's sponsors. "All this would do is prevent the gay rights crowd from gaining any perceived right to marry by going to the courts."

Opponents of the measure vehemently disagree with the notion that the ballot question simply enshrines the status quo for Virginians. They have largely based their campaign on convincing voters that the amendment could have all sorts of unintended consequences, including jeopardizing contracts between unwed heterosexual couples, threatening safeguards for unmarried victims of domestic violence and hurting Virginia's business climate.

What impact, if any, the proposed amendment would have on the everyday lives of Virginians has become the defining issue in the fight over the measure, which will appear on the Nov. 7 ballot. The debate has split lawmakers, legal scholars and some of the state's highest elected officials as the campaign heads into its final stretch over the next five weeks.

The battle reflects those in other states where similar measures have appeared on the ballot. Since 1998, 20 states have passed constitutional amendments banning same-sex marriage. In many of those states, opponents have argued unsuccessfully that the amendments go too far. Several other states are considering measures this fall.

The portion of the Virginia amendment in question states: "This Commonwealth and its political subdivisions shall not create or recognize a legal status for relationships of unmarried individuals that intends to approximate the design, qualities, significance or effects of marriage. Nor shall this Commonwealth or its political subdivisions create or recognize another union, partnership or other legal status to which is assigned the rights, benefits, obligations, qualities, or effects of marriage."

Opponents argue that because current law specifically bans "same-sex" couples from such rights and because the amendment says the state should not "recognize a legal status . . . for unmarried individuals" -- without specifying what kind -- it jeopardizes all relationships. They have released their own legal analysis, signed by more than 100 Virginia lawyers, backing their claims.

"One says same-sex couples, the other says unmarried couples -- they don't mean the same thing," said Claire Guthrie Gastanaga, campaign director for the Commonwealth Coalition, the organization leading the opposition. "If the General Assembly meant 'same-sex couples' for the constitutional amendment, they would have said 'same-sex couples.' "

Opponents say that the language could ban heterosexual couples from making contracts on health-care decisions and property ownership. Married people get these rights automatically through long-established common law; unwed couples, both gay and heterosexual ones, use legal documents to ensure they can will property to a partner or allow the partner, rather than family members, to make end-of-life decisions.

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), who is against same-sex marriage, said the "broad" wording of the measure could threaten protective orders and additional safeguards for unmarried victims of domestic violence by barring all legal recognition of unmarried family or household members. Kaine has also said the amendment has the potential to hurt the state's business environment because it could stymie a company's efforts to recruit talent.

Supporters, including Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R), who voted for the amendment last year when he was a delegate, say the commonwealth is not in jeopardy of having existing laws invalidated. They argue that the right to enter into a contract isn't exclusive to marriage.

"I can't see how a judge would rule that basic rights such as wills and other contracts can be seen only as marital rights," said Lynne Marie Kohm, a professor of law at Regent University in Virginia Beach.

Nonetheless, several legal experts who have studied similar amendments said that, rather than clarifying legal questions, the measure will raise additional ones and that Virginia is sure to face court challenges.

In Ohio, where a similarly worded constitutional amendment was adopted in 2004, two appellate courts have concluded that it exempts unmarried couples from prosecution under domestic violence laws, while eight other courts have ruled otherwise. The matter is now before the Ohio Supreme Court.

"We don't know how far-reaching this type of amendment would ultimately be interpreted by the court. . . . That's the problem with the way this is worded," said Cheryl Lynn Hepfer, president of the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers and an expert in contractual law. "Often people don't understand the consequences until the courts interpret it. And sometimes it's interpreted more broadly and sometimes less broadly."

Aside from the legal arguments, opponents have also questioned the motivation of the amendment backers, saying that the ballot measure has been designed specifically to help U.S. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) drive conservative voters to the polls to win reelection.

"This is a contrived initiative straight from Karl Rove's playbook," said Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Alexandria). "It has nothing to do with marriage and everything to do with partisan politics."

Republican drafters of the amendment point out that dozens of Democrats in the legislature voted to place it on the ballot.

"Opponents are looking for every single nuance to say why we've put this on the ballot," said Del. John A. Cosgrove (R-Chesapeake), another sponsor of the amendment. "All the brouhaha about unintended consequences and any partisan motivations are just scare tactics."

Former Officer Pleads Guilty (JACKPROG)

Jacksonville (TX) Progress, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072996

TYLER — Pleading guilty to retaliation against a witness and two counts of violation of civil rights, former Jacksonville Police Officer Larry Pugh and his attorneys asked U.S. Magistrate Judge John Love to accept a plea bargain Thursday at the U.S. Federal Courthouse in Tyler.

Love accepted the plea, and the maximum punishment of 12 years in prison will be recommended at a sentencing likely to be held in 45 to 60 days.

"This is a plea bargain only for his (Pugh's) three federal charges," said Pete Galbraith, supervisory senior special agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation during a press conference immediately following the proceedings. "The Cherokee County charges will have to be folded into this."

Pugh, 33, was originally indicted in 2005 for five counts of violation of civil rights (sexual assault while on duty), and three of the charges were later dismissed. Another violation of civil rights charge was added, along with charges of giving a false statement to an FBI official.

Thursday's charges included another charge, added in August, after Pugh attempted to drag one of the female witnesses in the case into his vehicle with his belt. The belt broke, allowing the woman to flee and contact JPD.

Pugh was arrested Aug. 8 for aggravated assault of the woman, which led to the federal retaliation charge (because it was against a witness in a federal case).

Appearing in court, slightly thinner with more hair than his most recent police mug shot in August, Pugh appeared content and observant. Love asked Pugh numerous questions to ensure he understood each court action leading to the final guilty pleas.

"Are you pleading guilty because you are in fact guilty?" Love said.

"Yes Sir," Pugh answered.

According to Pugh he was not forced in any way to accept the plea bargain instead of going to trial in November.

However, Pugh's sister, Linda, and his mother, Jaquita Smith, said Pugh was forced to accept the agreement, which includes the maximum jail time.

"They all had him take the plea for two reasons – his safety and because with a jury he could have gotten 30 years to life for just one charge," Linda said. "There's not a violent bone in his body."

Pugh's mother expressed concern with JPD and the FBI stating the plea occurred "because Jacksonville is just railroading him."

"My son, well you saw his wife, do you think he has any reason to have sex with someone else?" Smith said.

Pugh's wife, Jennifer, and one of the female victims in his case were present at the court proceedings. Jennifer Pugh adhered to the press, but she spoke only briefly. The victim declined comment.

During a press conference at the U.S Department of Defense in Tyler, John Ratcliffe, first assistant U.S. Attorney, and other FBI and law enforcement officials gave a summary of the court proceedings and answered questions.

"More specifically, Mr. Pugh was admitting that on two separate occasions in 2005, while on duty and while in uniform, he forced two different women to have sex with him," Ratcliffe said.

The 12-year prison term includes one year for each civil rights violation and 10 years for the retaliation charge.

"It is unfortunate and sad that someone with law enforcement had betrayed the law. It makes it more difficult for other officers in the area to do their job," Ratcliffe said.

One stipulation in the agreement mentioned the possibility that Pugh not be required to register as a sex offender. However, Cherokee County District Attorney Elmer Beckworth said he believes Pugh may be required by the state to register as a sex offender after he has served his jail time.

Assistant JPD Chief of Police John Page and JPD Detective Travis Cearley were also in attendance. Page said he feels "justice was served."

Page said JPD and the FBI worked together to resolve the case. JPD officials initially investigated the allegations against Pugh, and later contacted FBI.

Pugh joined JPD in January 2003. He was suspended for allegations of misconduct Oct. 21, 2005 and later fired upon his arrest by the FBI in February 2006.

He will remain in custody of U.S. Marshals until his sentencing, Love said.

EX-JACKSONVILLE OFFICER ENTERS PLEA OF GUILTY (TYMT)

By KENNETH DEAN,, Staff Writer

Tyler Morning Telegraph, October 2, 2006

A former Jacksonville police officer accused of violating the civil rights of two women by forcing them to have sex with him while he was on duty, entered a guilty plea in federal court Thursday morning.

The officer's family claims the man is being punished for taking drugs and drug money off Jacksonville streets.

Larry Pugh, 33, pleaded guilty to three counts, including retaliation against one of the female victims, stemming from separate incidents where he allegedly forced women to have sex with him.

"According to evidence introduced by prosecutors, Pugh admitted that on two occasions in 2005, while a Jacksonville police officer, he violated the civil rights of two women by forcing them to have sex with him while he was on duty and in uniform," John Radcliff, U.S. Attorney's Office, said during a Thursday morning press conference.

Radcliff said in one incident Pugh arrested the woman and then released her after she had sex with him. In the other incident Pugh offered the woman a courtesy ride then took her to a mobile home where he had sex with her then drove her back to her neighborhood.

Pugh also admitted to retaliating against one of the victims because she was cooperating with law enforcement.

"Specifically he admitted that he confronted the woman. Wrapped his belt around her neck and attempted to drag her into his van," Radcliff said. "In doing so the woman suffered physical injuries."

Law enforcement officials said the plea showed the determination of authorities to protect the rights and lives of citizens from officers who use their badge to inflict harm on others.

"No one is above the law and it's unfortunate and sad that someone entrusted to protect the public would use their position to commit a crime against citizens," Radcliff said.

NEW CHARGES

Both Pugh's defense and the U.S. Attorney's Office are recommending a 12-year sentence in the federal system, but that will be left up to the discretion of the judge in the case.

Elmer Beckworth, Cherokee County district attorney, said a grand jury indicted Pugh on state charges Monday, but he would not go into details.

"The indictment is sealed at this time, because we have not arrested him on these charges," he said. "But the grand jury returned a true bill in the indictment we put before them and we will be arresting him soon."

His family said he accepted the plea because defense attorneys were worried a jury might convict him and ask for a tougher sentence.

"He will go in an innocent man and will come out an innocent man," Linda Pugh, the man's sister, said after the plea was entered. "These allegations were made by women who have lengthy criminal records and why their credibility over a police officer was accepted is beyond me."

Ms. Pugh said her brother has four children, ages 5, 3, 2 and 11 months, and that his wife Jennifer is standing by her husband.

"The truth is that he took more drugs and drug money off the streets of Jacksonville, and some in the police department didn't want him doing that," she said. "He was targeted because he was a threat to the Jacksonville drug business."

FBI Special Agent Pete Galbraith said the women were credible and Pugh, by accepting the plea, admitted he committed the acts listed against him.

"We felt the witnesses were credible in this case and we were able to corroborate their statements with evidence," he said. "I am very proud of the courage of these two witnesses in this case, because it's very hard to stand up against someone who is a police officer."

Jacksonville Assistant Police Chief John Page said the plea gave the department and city a chance to heal and move forward.

Page said that when the women reported the incidents to Jacksonville police they began an investigation and took their initial report to the district attorney and the FBI for further assistance in the case.

"We began this investigation and asked for help as it progressed. I think today's events will give the city and the department some closure," he said. "I think with his plea we came to an equitable resolution and the department is moving in a positive direction."

Former Jacksonville Police Officer Admits Forcing Women To Have Sex With Him (LUFDN)

Lufkin Daily News, September 29, 2006

TYLER — U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwig announced Thursday that a 33-year-old former Jacksonville police officer has pleaded guilty to civil rights violations and retaliating against a witness.

Larry M. Pugh admitted to the charges before a U.S. Magistrate Judge in Tyler, according to a press release issued by Orwig's office.

DOJ_NMG_0072998

Pugh admitted that on two occasions in 2005, while a Jacksonville police officer, he violated the civil rights of two women by forcing them to have sex with him while he was on duty and in uniform, according to evidence introduced by prosecutors.

In one incident, he had arrested the woman and then released her after she had sex with him. In the other incident, Pugh offered the woman a courtesy ride, then took her to a trailer house where he had sex with her and then returned her to her neighborhood.

Pugh also admitted to retaliating against one of the women for providing information to law enforcement officials. Specifically, he admitted that he confronted the woman, wrapped his belt around her neck and attempted to drag her into his van. In doing so, the woman suffered physical injuries.

In the plea agreement, Pugh and the United States agreed that he should receive a sentence of 12 years in federal prison. He also faces a fine of up to $450,000. A sentencing date has not been set.

The case is being investigated by the FBI, Cherokee County District Attorney's Office and the Jacksonville Police Department. The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorneys Alan Jackson and Wes Rivers.

From Inmate To Mentor, Through Power Of Books (WP)

By Lonnae O'neal Parker

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The young black guys, in baseball caps and shorts, striped polos and slouchy pants, sit in a circle. They have "Letters to a Young Brother" by Hill Harper open on their laps, but the conversation has strayed from book talk to boy talk -- hip-hop, sports, school.

"When I asked, 'Why is everybody white, except the janitors are black?' the teacher sent me to the office," complains 12-year-old Kyle Turner of Columbia, and there are nods and murmurs of assent.

Teachers have it in for us.

"That's rare," counters group leader Reginald "Dwayne" Betts of Clinton. With cocoa skin and a head full of twists, he looks like one of the teenagers, but he's 25. "The thing I'm trying to get us to address is: Sometimes when we've got problems with teachers and people in our lives, sometimes the problem is not with them, it's with us."

He offers his life as parable.

"I had a teacher who honestly, legitimately didn't like me," Betts says. "But I legitimately, honestly was not a likable person."

The boys, ages 11 to 16, nod as they let his words settle around their heads.

In February, nearly a year after he got out of prison, Betts started the YoungMenRead book club at Karibu Books in Bowie because he loves to read. Because he wanted to create a place where it was cool for black boys to hang out, speak up and be smart -- a place he says he never had.

Betts was a 16-year-old honors student and class treasurer at Suitland High School when he carjacked somebody, was charged as an adult and spent more than eight years in prison. He wasn't that bad, he says. He just drifted a bad way, and there simply weren't enough safety nets to head him off -- not enough teachers or organizations, mentors or black men.

Betts knows how easily black boys can live hermetically sealed lives in which guns and drugs and dying are all viable options. And with everything in him, he wants to save them from that mistake, from everything he has been through.Smart but Disruptive

Gloria Hill used to wait every day for her son's teacher from the talented and gifted program to call and say, "Dwayne is trying to take over my class." "This went on until fourth grade," Hill says, when one teacher started making him read whenever he was disruptive. She gave him "Gifted Hands," a biography of surgeon Ben Carson.

Reading kept him quiet, so from then on, teachers and his mother gave him books. On his own, he read cereal boxes and encyclopedia entries on sports heroes. Later it was spiritualist Richard Bach and essayist James Baldwin. Still, nothing fully settled him.

Betts's parents separated when he was a toddler, and he grew up with his mother, a resource specialist with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. They lived in a Suitland neighborhood of apartments that he says was nice but never truly middle class. "Not everybody had a car," he says. "I knew people who sold drugs."

Hill says Betts was her world. But she had to work, and he was home alone a lot. She didn't date, so he had few adult men in his life. In eighth grade, Betts was suspended four times for being a smart mouth. "What are you worried about?" Betts asked his mother after he was suspended a fifth time for setting off a stink bomb. "Malcolm X had to go to prison to become the man he was meant to be."

Hill says her son thought he could talk his way out of anything.

In ninth grade, Betts entered the gifted program at Suitland High School and did just enough to maintain his 3.0 grade-point average, telling himself, I could always get A's if I wanted.

DOJ_NMG_0072999

Instead he was getting high with neighborhood friends after classes. They played ball, cracked jokes, smoked weed. "I lived in a couple of different worlds," Betts says -- his books and his boys. "I wasn't comfortable in my space."

Betts had never been in trouble with police, "but I wasn't fully law-abiding, either." He'd never stolen a car, but he'd ridden in stolen cars. He was an honors student who hung out with guys who made nearly all F's. One friend was shot to death because of a drug rivalry. Betts thought some of his friends might go to prison. "I aspired to college even though I didn't act like it," he says.

Betts says he didn't turn bad suddenly, didn't make some Bigger Thomas, "Native Son," black-boy-got-the-inner-city-blues lurch toward violence and nihilism. No, he just veered off, and nobody caught him. "I guess I didn't set off any alarms in anybody's head," he says.

"We really didn't know that side of him that was slipping away," says Evelyn Carter, Betts's high school literature teacher. "He was too smart, too sharp, too articulate."

Early in his junior year, a favorite teacher went on maternity leave, and then another teacher declined to let him compete on the school's It's Academic team, citing Betts's bad attitude. He spent long days in a reefer cloud and cut his afternoon classes.

In December of that year, he and a friend drove a neighborhood junkie's stolen car to Springfield Mall. They found a man asleep in a car. Betts pointed a borrowed pistol at the window. They took the man's wallet and drove off with his car. The next day, Betts and his friend tried to buy $300 worth of clothes at the Pentagon City mall with the man's stolen credit card. A clerk called security. Police caught them near the Pentagon.

Betts cried after his first court appearance. He was going to miss Christmas. At 16, he was charged as an adult with carjacking, use of a firearm during a felony and attempted robbery. He was the first of his neighborhood friends to go to prison.

For years, he struggled to make sense of how he got where he was, moving between denial and acceptance. Carjacking was simply "in my realm of possible things to do," he says. "It's not like we had this plethora of options, not like I could have gone boating."

"Basically," Betts says, "I did it because I wanted to and because I could and because I didn't think it would define me for the rest of my life."Serving Time

In his first two years in prison, Betts spent nearly a year in isolation for twice assaulting a guard. He saw a guy who'd been beaten to death. He saw people get stabbed. He was scared all the time.

"There was the very real fear of violence," he says. He stayed alert and watched what people did.

After a while, an initial fear of rape was replaced by a more subtle fear, informed by the slow creep of time. He worried about turning into somebody he didn't want to be. Would he stab somebody who threatened him or flirted with him? He got so used to seeing violence that he wondered whether he'd wind up too hard to ever really go home.

He turned again to books. He read everything he could get his hands on, fantasy and philosophy. He wrote his mother every week. He started writing essays.

For the first time, he decided he could be whomever he wanted. "There is no more fear of failure after you've been to prison," he says.

He made friends -- a skateboarder and a 45-year-old white former Marine who called him "the antithesis" because he worked in the law library -- and always had a book. He had his first serious conversation with a black man older than 35. He got a reputation for being smart, which brought him a measure of respect -- which gave him a space. He taught himself Spanish by studying five hours a day, six days a week.

"I didn't want to sit around and waste eight years," Betts says. He read poetry books and tried his hand at it. "I guess I got good," he says, smiling.

I come from a bullet in an unfired .45, tofu scrambled with garlic and purple onion slices, and every day the small muscles in my finger threatened to pull a trigger, slight and curved like my woman's eyelashes
-- Dwayne Betts

The Book Club

In March 2005, Betts was released from prison with little idea of what he wanted to do. He'd completed high school in prison, so he applied to Prince George's Community College.

A few months later, he met Yao Glover, co-owner of Karibu Books. Within seconds, it was clear to Glover that "the way he was dialoguing with literature was different."

Glover told Betts that he should work for him and followed up with a call. In June 2005, Betts was hired as an assistant manager at Karibu in Bowie. "I got three felonies, and this guy is letting me make $3,000 deposits," Betts marvels.

That August, he started community college and made straight A's. In his second semester, he was accepted into the honors academy, which comes with automatic admission and partial scholarships to the University of Maryland and American University, and a full scholarship to Howard University. He got straight A's that semester, too.

He became a manager at Karibu in January. He got the idea for a book club for black boys and started telling everyone who came in the store. For the first meeting, he bought 20 books, copies of "Bronx Masquerade" by Nikki Grimes and "The Legend of Buddy Bush" by Sheila P. Moses. Eight boys showed up. Since then, attendance has varied from four to 20 youths, and titles have included "Life in Prison" by Crips co-founder Stanley "Tookie" Williams, who was later executed, and the Pulitzer Prize-winning "Fences" by August Wilson.

"Young people don't read because they don't see other people they can associate with being cool reading," Betts says. "I've got a space where we can come together."

At the last book club meeting of the summer, Jibril Sinclair, 12, of the Bronx, N.Y., is eager to talk about "Letters to a Young Brother." He visits his grandfather in Northwest Washington every summer and heard about the book club from his tutor. "The idea that young African American men read a book and share their thoughts about it is so very, very positive," says his grandfather, Carl A. Grimes.

Tell me something you related to in the book, Betts says.

"The fact that [Hill Harper] grew up with a single parent, and I'm only growing up with my mom," Jibril says.

Ellington Barron, 13, of Bowie likes the fact that Harper was named after his grandfather. "My mom, she really liked Duke Ellington," he says. "I really want to get into the Duke Ellington School of the Arts."

This is the kind of space Dwayne Betts wanted but never had. He has mentors now: He has interned at the Hurston/Wright Foundation, and he has studied with former poet laureate Rita Dove. He quit the bookstore to focus full time on maintaining his grades and figuring out his next school. Glover counsels him to center himself and stay patient.

Betts is trying to make up time. It takes focus and resources and people to help you develop character, he says -- to grow into "who you want to be in the world."

And, Betts says, it takes a space, where it's really okay, cool even, for black boys to read. He offers his own life as parable.

ANTITRUST:

Weyerhaeuser, Safeco Among Big Businesses On High Court's Docket (AP)

AP, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court is about to plunge into an agenda laden with business sector issues, including cases involving the Weyerhaeuser Co. and Safeco.

Of the 38 cases the court has agreed to consider so far in the term that begins today, 17 are business related, "an unusually high fraction," Washington lawyer Roy Englert says.

Chief Justice John Roberts was managing partner of a major law firm that had a very sizable portfolio of business clients and is "comfortable with the issues presented in business cases in ways that Chief Justice William Rehnquist" was not, Pepperdine University law professor Douglas Kmiec says.

The Weyerhaeuser case is one of two antitrust cases set for this term so far. The Bush administration wants the justices to throw out a $79 million verdict against lumber industry giant Weyerhaeuser in a lawsuit brought by a smaller company. At issue is whether "predatory bidding," or paying too much for raw material, is an anti-competitive practice.

In the second antitrust case, the largest phone companies are accused of dividing up the market to protect regional monopolies.

In the realm of consumer rights, two insurance companies are fighting allegations that they should have notified people about adverse information in their credit reports. The consumers say Geico and Safeco denied them insurance or increased premiums based on data in the reports.

Philip Morris USA is fighting an $80 million punitive damage award to the widow of a lung cancer victim who smoked two packs of Marlboros a day.

Duke Energy Corp. is trying to protect its lower court victory enabling aging, refitted generating units to operate at full throttle without costly pollution-control equipment. In this case, the environmental movement is determined to finish a fight begun when the Clinton administration sued Duke.

Companies looking for help from the conservative wing of the court may have their work cut out for them.

For example, liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg and conservative Justice Antonin Scalia are allies when it comes to punitive damages. Scalia says the issue is "the province of state governments," ominous words for Philip Morris' position.

Court Back In Session With Full Docket (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

The US Supreme Court could be about to rewrite some fundamental rules governing the economy as it begins a new term on Monday with a docket that has an unusually high number of business cases.

Half of the docket so far is business cases – including potential landmark cases involving punitive damages, patent, antitrust and environmental law – and more could be added. "It's a very important term for business," says Jonathan Franklin, of the law firm Fulbright & Jaworski.

US companies will be watching closely to see how the reshaped court – with two new justices whose views on many business issues have not been tested – will rule in areas that can mean millions of dollars to individual companies.

The justices will weigh in on the debate over how to punish corporate wrongdoing by considering whether to tighten limits on punitive damage awards, the big fines levied by juries to protest and deter corporate misconduct that are often out of all proportion to actual damages. The case before them involves a $79m (€64m, £41.5m) award won by the widow of a former smoker against Philip Morris, the cigarette maker.

But it reaches far beyond tobacco, and could have big implications for every company that makes or sells products in the US.

The court has tried several times to rein in punitive damage awards, but many lower courts have ignored these rulings. In the Philip Morris case, the punitive award was nearly 100 times the damages awarded to compensate the victim.

The court must decide whether such large awards are constitutional, where the defendant's conduct was particularly reprehensible (as the Oregon Supreme Court found in the Philip Morris case). The justices will also decide whether juries can award punitive damages for harm to people who are not involved in the lawsuit – for example, all Oregon smokers, as they did in the Philip Morris case.

Both of these issues are crucial for business, but it is far from clear how the court will rule. Both new justices, Chief Justice John Roberts and Samuel Alito, have little record on punitive damages and they face an awkward choice: should they defend the right of business to avoid unconstitutionally excessive awards or should they uphold the right of individual states to protect their citizens by letting the states regulate punitive amounts?

The vote of the new justices could tip the balance.

The justices will also hear a potential watershed patent case, which could set a standard for determining when an invention is too obvious to deserve patent protection.

Legal experts say the decision could affect virtually every patent case, since every patent application must pass the test for "non-obviousness".

Critics of the US patent system say that too many obvious inventions are patented – like the adjustable accelerator pedal at issue in KSR v Teleflex, the case before them.

If they tighten that standard, says Professor Jay Thomas of Georgetown University Law Center, it could effect a "broad transfer from patent owners to the public domain", and many controversial business method patents could be threatened.

Later this week the court will hear another patent case, MedImmune v Genentech, that could determine whether it will be easier in future to challenge questionable patents in court. "This is a technical case but one of very great importance to the business community," says Kenneth Starr, former Whitewater special prosecutor and a Supreme Court expert at the law firm Kirkland & Ellis.

"The court seems to have the feeling that something is wrong with US patent law. They don't know what it is and they don't know how to fix it, but they are looking for the right case," says Mr Franklin.

Competition law is another newfound interest of the justices: they will hear a case, Bell v Twombly, that could set a new standard for alleging conspiracy in antitrust cases.

Roy Englert, Supreme Court litigator at the law firm Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck and Untereiner, describes the case as "a pitched battle between the business community and the class action bar" because of its potential to alter the power of lawyers to strongarm companies to settle such cases.

The court will also hear a duo of important environmental cases, including one that tests whether the Environmental Protection Agency has the right to refuse to regulate greenhouse gas emissions. That case could also affect the power of interest groups to challenge the Bush administration's controversial environmental policies more broadly.

Group To Buy U.K. Water Firm AWG (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

DOJ_NMG_0073002

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

An investment group consisting mainly of pension funds plans to announce today that it has agreed to buy British water utility AWG PLC for about £2.2 billion ($4.12 billion), according to people familiar with the situation.

The group of Australian and Canadian pension funds and British venture-capital and private-equity firm 3i Group PLC have agreed to bid £15.55 ($29.12) a share for AWG, which operates mainly in southeast England and serves about six million industrial, commercial and residential customers. AWG announced it had been approached about a takeover Sept. 14.

The deal comes as three of Britain's largest water utilities are the subjects of potential buyouts. Like power companies across Europe, water providers are attractive takeover targets for private-equity firms -- and similar investment firms, such as pension plans -- because they earn stable returns that can be leveraged with borrowed money to make a buyout potentially lucrative.

Four groups of possible buyers are involved in a process of bidding for Thames Water PLC in a deal that would value the utility that supplies water to London at more than £7 billion. That auction was started when Thames Water's controlling shareholder, German energy giant RWE AG, decided to sell the company earlier this year. A deal isn't expected until the end of the month or later this year.

In addition to 3i of London, the firms involved in the AWG acquisition are CPP Investment Board of Toronto and Colonial First State of Sydney, a division of Commonwealth Bank of Australia, and Industry Funds Management of Melbourne. People close to the matter have said AWG hasn't received an approach from any other group, though other potential bidders are believed to be considering a higher, rival bid.

An AWG spokesman declined to comment. Representatives from the bidding group couldn't be reached for comment.

AWG said last week that the financial performance of its Anglian Water division was "materially above management's expectations" for the six months through Sept. 30, due in part to strong demand for water as a result of a "very hot, dry summer" in the U.K.

Based in Huntingdon, England, AWG has 9,000 employees and had net profit of £78 million for its fiscal year through March 2006, on sales of £1.55 billion.

Brussels Expands Microsoft Vista Inquiry (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

European antitrust regulators have expanded their probe into Microsoft's Vista operating system, by raising concerns over plans to add encryption and handwriting recognition software to the group's new flagship product.

The new concerns are based on complaints from small European software developers who fear the bundling of these new functions into Vista will undermine their products in this area.

It is understood that the European Commission raised these concerns in a letter to Microsoft in July.

Vista, which is due to replace the group's ubiquitous Windows operating system from next year, is already at the centre of a new antitrust battle between the Commission and Microsoft.

The Brussels-based regulator fears that Vista might raise the same competition problems that led the Commission to issuea landmark ruling againstMicrosoft more than two years ago.

In particular, the regulator is concerned about the "bundling" of new features and programs into the operating system. Brussels fears the addition of an internet search engine and a rangeof software security featureswill undermine competitionfrom companies which sell similar products on a stand-alone basis.

Microsoft said yesterday that handwriting recognition and encryption software would be included only in premium editions of Vista.

These would cost more than the basic edition, thereby giving users a choice of programs from different vendors, the group added.

Though the Commission has made public some of its concerns, it has not issued a formal ruling.

The conflict between Brussels and the software group has taken on a new edge over recent weeks after Microsoft complained that the legal uncertainty hanging over Vista could further delay its launch. The company has also warned that the Commission probe might force it to market Vista without crucial security features.

This sparked an angry reaction from Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, who last week hit out at what she described as a "co-ordinated campaign" against the Commission.

The latest concerns over Vista follow a string of complaints, and people familiar with the investigation say the volume of concerns might create problems for the regulator. They say it will be almost impossible for the Commission to pursue all these complaints in formal antitrust probes.

DOJ_NMG_0073003

Should the regulator decide to bring new charges against Microsoft, it would have to narrow down its concerns to a small number of issues.

Financial Regulators Fight EU Merger Reform (FT)

By George Parker In Brussels And Mark Schieritz In Frankfurt

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

Europe's top financial regulators will today attack Brussels' plans to shake up the vetting of cross-border mergers, which aim to speed decisions and tackle national protectionism.

Charlie McCreevy, EU internal market commissioner, proposed the shake-up this month in an attempt to stop national regulators obstructing cross-border takeovers and mergers on bogus grounds. But today Europe's three main regulatory bodies, covering banking, securities and insurance, will claim that Mr McCreevy's plan would force them to work too quickly, compromising their decisions.

They will warn that they are unwilling to hand over some confidential merger material to Mr McCreevy, potentially preventing him from deciding whether national regulators are acting in good faith.

The warning comes in a letter, seen by the Financial Times, from the chairs of the three European financial services regulatory committees - CEBS, CESR and CEIOPS - representing national regulators in banking, securities and insurance respectively.

The clash comes as Mr McCreevy tries to revise the EU's banking directive to tackle protectionism, which he believes is - hampering the development of pan-European financial services companies.

Last year he fought Antonio Fazio, then governor of Italy's central bank, who tried to scupper two foreign bids for Italian banks, after they had been cleared by the Commission's antitrust directorate.

Mr McCreevy wants to rein in the powers of national regulators, who have to assess the risk to financial stability of a merger. He has proposed five clearly defined conditions under which they can oppose a deal and wants to allow the Commission access to documents to make sure they are sticking to the rules.

But the regulators are gearing up for a fight.

In the joint letter they say Mr McCreevy's proposal that they should have only 30 days to oppose a merger, down from the current three months, could lead to bad decisions.

They propose that "more complex cases" should be assessed within a longer time-frame of "ideally 65 days". "The speed of decision making, while undoubtedly important, should not be the overriding objective," they say.

Perhaps the biggest disagreement is over the regulators' willingness to hand over documents to Brussels, saying the proposal for "absolute and unfettered right of access to all confidential prudential information by the Commission is too vaguely defined".

The regulators add: "The draft proposal is not proportionate if it seeks to ensure that all confidential prudential information in the hands of the competent authorities is open to the Commission."

Their reservations could be the opening shot in a protracted power struggle between national regulators and Brussels.

Mr McCreevy will have to win national government support to push through his plans. Although member states publicly back his commitment to crack down on protectionism, an attachment to "national champions" in the financial sector and elsewhere remains strong.

Midwest Farms Reap Benefits Of Ethanol Boom (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, October 2, 2006

FRIESLAND, Wis. — When he's working on his farm, Jim Casey often glances at the ethanol plant looming over the prairie a half-mile away. “You know you're making money when you see that smoke coming out of the stack,” he says.

Ethanol plants are changing farming across the Midwest. The last time there was such a dramatic shift in agriculture was “when electricity came to the rural people” in the 1930s and '40s, says Dave Hughes, president of the township board and a farmer who invested in the plant.

Casey bought his shares in the ethanol biorefinery for $1,000 each three years ago. They're now worth almost $4,000 each. Like the other 950 shareholders in the cooperative, he has gotten $400 in dividends for each share since the plant opened in April 2005.

That's not the only way his bottom line is being helped. Casey is selling part of his corn crop this fall to the plant for 17 cents a bushel more than he was offered elsewhere. He also saves fuel when he hauls his corn just down the road instead of trucking it to an elevator miles away. Because of the plant's proximity, the value of his land has increased. “When I get old, that'll be pretty nice,” he says.

The United Wisconsin Grain Producers plant here employs 36 people, all but two of them from the area. Hourly workers make about $35,000 a year and get profit sharing, incentive pay and full benefits, CEO Jeff Robertson says.

Rising gas prices and the push for less dependence on foreign oil have increased demand for ethanol, which is made by converting the starch in corn into sugars that are fermented and distilled. When it's blended with gasoline, ethanol can reduce carbon monoxide emissions. Legislation signed by President Bush last year added urgency: It requires oil refiners to use 4 billion gallons of renewable fuel this year and 7.5 billion gallons by 2012.

Those factors have created a rapidly expanding industry that is centered in the rural Midwest.

There are 105 ethanol plants in operation; almost half are owned by local farmers, according to the Renewable Fuels Association, an industry group. Forty-one more are under construction, and seven are expanding. Capacity is 5 billion gallons a year. When the new plants are running, that number will grow to 7.9 billion.

Many small ethanol producers qualify for federal and state tax credits and loan guarantees.

“I think the boom will continue,” says Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association. “The nation needs to have more domestic renewable energy, and ethanol is going to satisfy a big part of that. … Farmers ought to be re-evaluating what they are planting and responding to the market signals.”

That's happening here.

Before the plant opened, Casey planted corn on two-thirds of his 1,500 acres and soybeans on the rest. This year, he moved 20% of his soybean acreage into corn.

Even though it can cost more to grow corn than soybeans because of the cost of fertilizer, Hughes also has shifted more of his 740 acres into corn. The plant, he says, “has changed a lot of things. A lot, and they're all positive.” Some area farmers who didn't invest in the plant, Hughes says, “are kicking themselves in the fanny.”

Friesland's 303 residents have embraced the plant, but not every town is as welcoming. Before settling on the site just off state Highway 33 here, organizers considered locating in Arlington, says Bill Herrmann, president of the United Wisconsin Grain Producers' board. The concerns of residents there about noise, odor and possible effects on a bird sanctuary prompted them to drop those plans.

Bruce Braaksma, owner of Royal Lumber here, says the plant isn't much of a nuisance. The 100 or so trucks that enter the plant daily don't usually go through town, he says. “If it's dead still, you can hear just a little bit of a hum, and the wind has to be just right to smell it. It smells like an old tavern,” he says.

Besides, Braaksma says, most people in town have been won over by a decline in property taxes since the plant was built. “When your property taxes go down $200 to $300, everybody's got a smile on their face,” he says.

The plant produces about 50 million gallons of ethanol a year. An expansion that will increase production to 80 million by the end of 2007 is underway. “The profitability of the company is such that this is happening earlier than anybody planned,” Robertson says.

“The presence of an ethanol plant really does ripple through the entire economy,” says Geoff Cooper, ethanol analyst at the National Corn Growers Association. “With the current rate of growth that we're seeing, that's going to continue for the next several years.”

There are some doubts that alternative fuels can end the country's dependence on foreign oil.

For years, studies showed that more energy is required to produce ethanol than is saved when it's used in gasoline. A University of Minnesota study released in July concluded that ethanol and biodiesel made from soybeans return more energy than is consumed in growing the grains and distilling them into fuel.

The study estimated that using all corn and soybeans grown in the USA for ethanol and biodiesel would offset only 12% of gasoline demand and 6% of diesel demand. In 2005, the U.S. Agriculture Department says, ethanol accounted for about 3% of the nation's gasoline consumption.

Ray Defenbaugh, president of Big River Resources, a farmer-owned ethanol plant in West Burlington, Iowa, says weaning the nation from foreign oil is important, but his priorities are closer to home.

“We want to create jobs for youth, preserve the community and provide a good return to the investor. The money we make goes right back into the community,” he says. “That's the reason we built it.”

Casey says his goal is to help himself and other farmers: “It's more about the end product for ourselves, to have a place to sell our corn, so we can stay in business.”

A Farmer Fears His Way Of Life Has Dwindled Down To A Final Generation (NYT)

By Charlie Leduff

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

LEBANON, Kan. — The heart of the heartland, the exact geographic middle of the continental United States, is owned by a middle-aged Kansas man named Randall Warner. He exports wheat, beef and soon his second grown son to the city. He stands in his boots in his field and wonders what's become of his way of life.

"I drive through the city and I wonder what all those people do for a living," says Mr. Warner, a sturdy, square-faced man. "I see that, and it makes me sad that my children see it too and think that there is something better there for them."

Lebanon, the nearby town where Mr. Warner learned to read and write, has lost nearly 25 percent of its population over the last 15 years.

Large corporate farmers are taking over. Mr. Warner doesn't understand the ins and outs of the international trade policies and government subsidies that are changing the landscape, only that to make it nowadays "you work harder — sunup past sundown."

Next year, Mr. Warner believes, there will be even fewer farmers here, in part because of fuel costs.

And he wonders what will become of his legacy and his land.

His son Travis, 18, wants to know more people besides his dad and the salesman at the John Deere dealership. The nearest pretty girl is 20 miles away.

He wonders if there isn't something better than stumbling out to the fields with sleep still in your eyes and working past midnight. The summer air here is as stifling as corduroy drapes. Travis hasn't spoken about this to his father, but his father suspects it just the same.

Travis is a state wrestling and hog breeding champion. He is going off to college soon and doesn't know if he'll ever come back. His brother, Dustin, left for good. "I like to work with people, I guess," Travis says. "Be around people. And we come out here every day. It's Dad and myself; that's not working with people."

He says this while sitting in the cab of his blue pickup, a dirty older model, eating the sandwich his mother made him.

His father is far off in the field, unable to hear the gloomy truth of the matter.

"I told my dad he could retire and cash-rent the land to the big farmer, but then what's he going to do with his time? This is all he knows. Come out here and work daylight to dark.

"I don't want that."

The father says he would have to hire an old hand from down the road to help him work his 3,000 acres. He'll have to do that and, if that doesn't work, then start selling off the farm in pieces to the big farmer down the way.

This is how a town like Lebanon dies. The old Lebanon bank has caved in. Main Street is a peeling veneer. It's a common scene across the Great Plains. People are losing their optimism.

Everything about Mr. Warner speaks of work. At 52, he stands erect, with skin as weathered as cattle hide. He is frugal, does not smoke or drink coffee or liquor. His home is average, a stolid two-story ranch at the edge of a wheat field with a barn outside the door. He is hardly ever home, mostly to eat and sleep, taking a half-day off for church. His wife, Linda, complains about the isolation. Is it too much to stop home while supper's warm? Or go to town occasionally to see a motion picture? His wife talks of throwing it in sometimes too.

"My whole life is wrapped up in this," Mr. Warner says while baling hay. "To tell you the truth, it can get a little monotonous. I've had four vacations my whole life."

Still, it is a good life, he says. "The best kind of life there is."

No political party seems to care much about the working man's life, Mr. Warner feels. Stick a Republican and a Democrat in a sack, shake it up, pour it out, and the same rapacious thing crawls out. Creatures from a smoke-filled room.

Mr. Warner, a Pentecostal Christian, believes in miracles. He believes in speaking in tongues. He believes that abortion is taking a life and that gay marriage is an abomination. So he voted Republican.

What crumbs do the Democrats offer him? Two men in tuxedos on the steps of City Hall with a marriage license in hand? Handouts for those who won't work? Mr. Warner says he could be peeled away from the conservatives if the liberals would talk to him about his values:

"God. Family. Work," he counts them on his fingertips and adds them up. "Heritage."

Do something to stop the corporate takeover of farm country. Give his son a reason to stay and you could have his vote. "F.D.R. was the greatest president this country ever had," Mr. Warner says. "He provided security for the farmer."

Father and son have moved on to spraying fly repellent on the cattle. The sun is going low, the sky is growing golden. The father's gotten to thinking. The boy will soon go away to college.

His voice shows no trace of his natural confidence.

“Do you think you’ll come back to rural America? And farm? Raise cattle? Raise pigs?”

He talks obliquely, toward his son.

The son mumbles. “Depends if I find something better in the next couple years.”

“What could be better?” the father asks. “What could be better than life on the Great Plains where the wind blows and you catch fresh air every day?”

“That’s what I’m going to look for,” the boy says.

The boy turns his back. He returns to his work. The father watches after him.

Snakeheads Appear At Home In The Potomac (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The northern snakehead fish seems to be expanding its territory in the Potomac River, government researchers say, after a year in which the toothy Asian transplant has appeared in new places and at higher concentrations across the area.

In the third year that the fish has been studied in the Potomac, scientists are starting to build a portrait of the snakehead at home in the area. Some of the most frightening concerns have been dispelled: The fish turn out to be well-nigh helpless on land (early reports said the snakehead could wriggle short distances out of water), and the creatures haven't gobbled up or driven out the Potomac's famous bass.

But worries remain, because the snakeheads are reproducing rapidly and starting to push outward. The next few weeks will bring a crucial test of the snakeheads' growth, and science's understanding of them, as researchers wait to see if last October's startling mass snakehead migration is repeated.

"It looks like they're becoming pretty solidly entrenched, as far as establishing that beachhead here in the Potomac," said Steve Minkkinen of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

Over the past year, the snakeheads have spread out and become endemic in about 15 miles of the Potomac and some of its tributaries south of Washington from a home base of two creeks in Virginia, he said.

That has switched scientists' focus from eradication to coexistence. "As much as we can, we're just trying to collect information," Minkkinen said.

The story of snakeheads in the Potomac may have begun as early as 1998 or perhaps as late as 2002. The key event, scientists believe, was when a male and female were dumped into the water and found each other in Fairfax County's Dogue Creek. Since then, that stream, along with nearby Little Hunting Creek, has become the epicenter of the Potomac's snakehead population, scientists say.

Now, the two creeks are also the area's premier snakehead laboratory, as researchers seek to understand the life the fish have created in an alien home.

One obvious conclusion: Snakeheads are thriving. Virginia state scientists who use electric current to stun and capture fish in these creeks used to catch one snakehead every five hours. This year, they got 6.9 fish an hour, nearly 35 times more.

But the snakeheads don't appear to have had a serious impact on the river's largemouth or smallmouth bass, which are also top predators in the river. Scientists say they believe this might be because the snakeheads prefer shallower water or different prey.

"A bass is probably more likely to eat one of them" than a snakehead eat a bass, said longtime guide Ken Penrod, who said he hadn't seen any change in the bass fishing. "It's a lot about nothing, I think."

But scientists say they still have a lot to learn. They're unsure how the snakeheads nest, for instance. In their native habitat, they are said to clear out a "doughnut hole" in a thicket of underwater vegetation and lay their eggs there. But this year, a Virginia biologist spotted a cloud of 500-plus snakehead babies -- orange and black, with a minuscule version of the distinctive snakehead mouth -- swirling in Little Hunting Creek.

It was a nest, but there was no doughnut hole.

"The fish aren't behaving here the way they might be expected to behave in Asia," said John Odenkirk, a snakehead expert and a biologist with the Virginia Department of Game and Inland Fisheries.

Researchers are similarly confused about whether the river's snakeheads migrate. One Sunday last fall, Dogue Creek was suddenly full of hundreds of fish heading upstream, so thick that fishermen snatched out at least 80. This may have been a freak event caused by a large rainfall -- or it may have been the first running of an annual ritual. Researchers are keeping watch to see what happens this year.

What little scientists do know about the snakehead's habits was gathered this spring, when Odenkirk inserted small tracking devices into the body cavities of 20 fish. He found them to be mainly homebodies, lurking in the same weedy and shallow spots week after week.

But some strayed farther afield: Fish No. 1204 crossed the deep midsection of the Potomac to visit Maryland's Piscataway Creek. Fish 1301 disappeared completely, meaning that it was perhaps speared by a heron, caught by an angler or just moved so far away that Odenkirk can't get the signal.

"It tells me that some obviously are bucking the trend and being a little more adventurous and crossing the main-stem Potomac," Odenkirk said.

This year's catch of snakeheads has made it clear how widespread the fish have become. In Maryland, the fish have been found across an unprecedented swath of creeks in Prince George's and Charles counties.

On the Virginia side, snakeheads have moved north from their epicenter to a creek near Belle Haven Marina in the Alexandria section of Fairfax. To the south, Odenkirk said, their numbers have increased substantially in the Occoquan River basin, on the border between Prince William and Fairfax counties.

They've also appeared in another place puzzlingly far afield: Kenilworth Park and Aquatic Gardens in the District. In the late spring, more than 500 baby snakeheads and a handful of larger adults were found in ponds there, having eaten almost every other fish in the water.

D.C. officials think that this may be a separate population of snakeheads, descended from fish dumped directly in the aquatic gardens.

But because the ponds share connections with the Anacostia River, there's some chance the D.C. snakeheads might be adventurous specimens from the Potomac.

For all that's known about the snakeheads' expanding reach, much more is still in question. That was obvious Wednesday, when Odenkirk and two assistants set out on the Occoquan in a shallow boat with a spindly metal claw dangling from its front. They were electro-fishing.

After a few minutes in Massey Creek, a tributary of the Occoquan, a mottled green shape thrashed in the water. Nick Lapointe, a Virginia Tech graduate student, scooped a long net, bringing up a roughly seven-inch snakehead.

"Yeah, baby!" Odenkirk exulted.

"I saw those speckles, and I knew exactly what he was," Lapointe said.

"Beady little eyes," said Ryan Saylor, a technician.

In the spring, Odenkirk's team had not found any snakeheads in this inlet. But Wednesday, they found two, which he said were probably siblings born in the creek last year.

So if two were caught, how many more could there be here?

"Hundreds?" Odenkirk speculated. He looked back at an acres-wide expanse of snakehead-friendly shallow water and thick grasses.

"I mean, you look behind us, they've got all that habitat. They could be anywhere."

When Spinach Isn't Good For You (NYT)

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Just when many of us thought that eating lots of fresh green leafy vegetables was the key to good health, along comes an outbreak of bacterial contamination in bagged spinach that has frightened consumers and led to a recall of all affected brands. The contamination, detected only in spinach packaged at a particular processing plant in central California, reveals how silly we were to assume that spinach in sealed bags would necessarily be safer than fresh spinach exposed to the environment.

So far the outbreak, caused by a virulent strain of E. coli bacteria, has sickened at least 187 people in 26 states, causing one confirmed death, 29 cases of kidney failure and 97 hospitalizations. The worrisome trend is that while illness caused by E. coli in meat has been declining, bacterial contamination of fresh produce is proportionately rising. Some 20 outbreaks of illness caused by E. coli contamination of leafy greens — 18 in lettuce, 2 in spinach — have been reported over the past decade, with no clear cause identified for most of them.

Investigators don't know yet whether the current problem arose primarily in the growing fields or at the bagging facility. Given that E. coli typically lives and multiplies in the intestines of ruminant animals, like cattle, sheep and deer, one possible source is the manure on nearby cattle farms. The bacteria can be carried into streams or tracked into the fields by wild animals and can infiltrate water used for irrigation or washing the spinach.

Roughly half of the 20 outbreaks have been traced to central California, suggesting something amiss in the environment or processes used there. Regulators are leaning on the food industry to clean up its act, and the industry is scrambling to comply.

DOJ_NMG_0073008

But the safest route is to give the Food and Drug Administration greater authority and more personnel to inspect and regulate food growers and processors. Produce farms may need greater separation from cattle, and cattle-raising practices may need to be changed to decrease the production of bacteria. We would be appalled to find human waste on our produce. We should be equally appalled to find animal manure, if that is what happened.

Bright Idea Of Tire Reef Now Simply A Blight (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- Now the idea seems daft. But in the spring of 1972, the dumping of a million or so tires offshore here looked like ecological enlightenment.

From the scrap tires, artificial reefs would grow and fish would throng, or so it was thought. A flotilla of more than 100 private boats with volunteers turned out to help. A Goodyear blimp christened the site by dropping a gold-painted tire.

"A potential grouper haven," a county report opined. Artificial reefs made from tires "appear to be the next best thing to recycling."

What happened instead is a vast underwater dump -- a spectacular disaster spawned from good intentions. Today there are no reefs, no fishy throngs, just a lifeless underwater gloom of haphazardly dropped tires stretching across 35 acres of ocean bottom.

It's not just a matter of botched scenery. Because they can roll around, the tires are pounding against natural reefs nearby.

"It's depressing as hell," said Ken Banks, a reef specialist for Broward County, who recently explored the site. "We dove in and swam for what seemed like an hour and never came to the end of it. It just went on and on."

Robin Sherman, a professor at Nova Southeastern University, led a project a few years ago to retrieve some of the tires most directly damaging Fort Lauderdale's natural reefs.

Two months later, she dived in the area again.

"It was completely recovered with tires -- it was even hard to find where we had worked," she said. "That's when I realized we have to clean up the whole thing."

So, after years in which the site was studied and then neglected, officials here are planning to clean up the environmental experiment gone awry.

Coastal America, a partnership of federal agencies, state and local governments and private groups, is trying to organize a cleanup using military salvage teams that would use the tire retrieval as a training exercise. Once the divers pulled the tires up, they would be disposed of by the state at a cost of about $3 million to $5 million.

The scale of the project -- some say there are as many as 2 million tires below -- and the number of different specialties required had prevented previous bureaucratic efforts from going forward.

Will Nuckols, project coordinator for Coastal America, called the rolling tires a "coastal coral destruction machine."

"For the past several decades, people have looked at this task and then at each other and said, 'Well I can't do that,' " he said.

With each dive team retrieving about 700 tires a week, officials estimate that the effort would take three years. They plan to begin in 2008.

"It's easy to throw something into the water," said Keith Mille of the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission. "What we're finding is it's extremely expensive to remove something from the water."

The first documented artificial reef in the United States was created off South Carolina in the 1830s. Over time, people have sunk rocks, trees, concrete, ships and barges to create reefs. When successful, they were -- and continue to be -- popular attractions with anglers and divers alike.

Artificial reefs made from scrap tires began in the United States in the late 1950s or early '60s, when the country was facing the monumental task of disposing of millions of automobile tires. At the time, stockpiled tires were creating fire hazards, fostering mosquito breeding and blighting the landscape.

Reefs made from tires seemed like an easy solution.

While coastal communities around the country -- in Texas, California, Florida, North Carolina and elsewhere -- embraced the idea, few projects, if any, were conceived on the grand scale as the one off Fort Lauderdale. Proponents touted it as the largest scrap tire reef in the world.

A 1974 Goodyear pamphlet boasted, "Worn out tires may be the best things that have happened to fishing since Izaak Walton," the author of the classic The Compleat Angler .

DOJ_NMG_0073009

"There was a lot of local enthusiasm," said Ray McAllister, one of the founders of a local group that pushed for the tire reef and now professor emeritus of ocean engineering at Florida Atlantic University. "We all thought we were doing a good job for the environment."

A tire reef had seemed to work in New England, he said, and organizers figured it would work here.

The project had received a permit from the Army Corps of Engineers and had active support from Broward County, officials said.

While there were initial hopeful reports, it was clear after a decade that the idea wasn't working. Sea creatures didn't grow on the tires. Today, the tires look the same as they did they day they were dropped.

Tires that had been lashed together for stability broke loose, making it easier for them to roll around. With the tires mobile, it was difficult for sea life to make a home there.

Today, most states have restricted or banned tires in artificial reefs, according to a 2004 joint publication of the Gulf and Atlantic States Marine Fisheries Commission.

In retrospect, McAllister said, "it was a terrible mistake and I hate to admit it. . . . The conventional wisdom, or whatever you want to call it, was not such a bright idea."

Waterfront Development Tests New Jersey's Handling Of Toxic Dumps (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WEEHAWKEN, N.J., Sept. 26 — Handsome new town houses selling for more than $2 million hug the waterfront here, and more are on the way. On a curve in the river that offers spectacular views of Manhattan and New York Harbor, earthmovers are at work on a public park.

But in the view of some environmentalists, the development on this immensely valuable sliver of shoreline is an experiment of sorts because of what lies underneath it: dirt spotted with hexavalent chromium, a manufacturing component that has been identified as a cause of lung cancer, liver and kidney damage and mutations to human DNA.

Hudson County is the nation's chromium-waste center, with almost 200 sites where it was dumped decades ago.

Of all those sites, this slice of Weehawken is the first to be reclaimed for residential development, and the reborn riverfront here — representing an investment of hundreds of millions of dollars — depends on the remedy that the state has chosen for sites polluted by chromium.

The worst spots of contamination have been removed, and most of the 96-acre property has been covered with synthetic sheeting and at least 18 inches of clean soil, called a cap. The mayor said that in the park, the soil cap would be six to eight feet deep in places.

The state and local authorities have approved everything the developer, Roseland Properties, has done, and they say the cleanup has far exceeded their standards.

But the state's policies are not settled at the moment. Rather, they are caught up in a politically charged discussion about how the state has handled the rush to turn urban wastelands into sought-after real estate.

In 2004, the state Department of Environmental Protection issued a moratorium on final approvals of chromium cleanups, and promised stricter standards and less reliance on capping.

The new rules have not yet been issued. In the meantime, the agency allowed the waterfront project to proceed even though various environmental groups and some scientists in the state agency contend that in residential areas, a cap can never be protective enough.

"We want an outside audit and review of the entire hazardous site remediation program, with this fiasco in Weehawken being Exhibit A," said Joe Morris, of the Interfaith Community Organization, which won a landmark court decision last year ordering the excavation of waste where a cap failed at a former chromium dump site in Jersey City.

A federal appeals court, upholding the order last year, scorched the Department of Environmental Protection, citing "a substantial breakdown in the agency process that has resulted in 20 years of permanent cleanup inaction."

The state's environmental commissioner, Lisa P. Jackson, said that Mr. Morris's "idea that this is Exhibit A is more than puzzling to me."

Ms. Jackson said that the agency would soon revamp its handling of toxic sites, and that the Weehawken development complied with all current regulations.

The disclosure of the Hudson chromium sites in the 1980's generated national attention, fed by gruesome recollections of workers at processing plants whose skin and nasal septums had been eaten away by the poison.

To be sure, the one in Weehawken was hardly the worst of the Hudson sites. Some of the fill used decades ago to build up the riverfront was contaminated, but chromium was never processed there.

DOJ_NMG_0073010

Still, Michael S. Friedman, the environmental consultant who manages the project for Roseland, said: "Everything we do is under a microscope. This is a high-powered lens."

Mayor Richard F. Turner said that Weehawken "has brought in outside experts, outside consultants — we don't even rely on D.E.P. consultants."

Michael Campion, the township's environmental consultant, said, "When I look at the numbers in Weehawken, and it's been tested like crazy, a cap is a reasonable remedy." He recommended approving Roseland's plan, but he acknowledged in his review that nearly all caps eventually suffer erosion.

Caps are often used on closed landfills, but much less frequently, and only recently on sites where people will live and buildings and traffic will bear down on the soil.

The chromium issue caused unusually public recriminations within the environmental agency. After a group convened to reconsider the cleanup standards recommended leaving them unchanged, one member, Zoe Kelman, a chemical engineer, wrote a 50-page dissent.

Several other agency scientists, speaking on condition of anonymity because they feared retribution, said that the Department of Environmental Protection had bent to political pressure to speed cleanups.

Ms. Kelman accused the agency of disregarding tests at one capped site, in Kearny, that found hexavalent chromium levels thousands of times higher than the agency plan had expected.

She also noted that while New Jersey sets the allowable level of hexavalent chromium in soil at 240 parts per million, Maryland's standard is 30 parts per million, and Oregon's is 23.

"I always feel the public believes we err on the side of protection, and it's obvious now that we don't," Ms. Kelman said.

The agency's critics were supported by a soil scientist at Cornell University, Murray McBride, who submitted an opinion in June 2005 that the current reliance on capping "seems to me to be a stopgap, short-term approach" that fails to account for the way chromium moves in the soil and may migrate to basements and other exposed areas.

In Weehawken, questions remain about the last known remaining concentration of chromium waste, a one-acre lot near the town houses where some of the more contaminated dirt was dumped, covered with sheeting and then paved for parking.

Mr. Morris and Jeff Tittel, the director of the state chapter of the Sierra Club, met with Commissioner Jackson this summer to argue that the mound under the parking lot should be classified as a hazardous waste dump and removed or encapsulated. They said the commissioner resisted, although Ms. Jackson said in an interview that she had never ruled out revisiting the site.

Mr. Tittel has a larger quarrel with the state's redevelopment policies, which were loosened in the 1990's — and which he said "changed from cleaning up sites to making them land banks for development."

"We have finally created social equity in New Jersey," Mr. Tittel said, "because we have people in $3 million condos living on top of toxic sites, not just working and poor people."

Property values have soared since the last of the 42 town houses was built in 2004. A house that sold less than two years ago for $1.5 million was put up for sale in September for $2.7 million, while several others are on the market for $2.4 million to $4 million. Among the residents is a principal of Roseland, Marshall Tycher.

In the old Weehawken, on the cliffs above the waterfront, a vocal minority opposed to the Roseland development is worried about the park.

"I don't know why people down there aren't screaming their heads off," said Mary Ciuffitelli, a 26-year resident of the town. "I grew up in New Jersey, so I want to know what's under my feet."

Poisoned On Eno Road (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Dickson, Tenn.

If you stand outside the Holt family home late at night, after everyone has gone to sleep, with the sound of a soft wind drifting through the trees and the damp sweet smell of abundant grass heavy in the humid air, you can easily imagine what this area was like in the days of slavery.

And then the quiet is broken by the sudden eruption of dogs barking and howling on nearby property, and you're reminded that the tiny population of blacks in Dickson County, even after all these years, is still frequently treated — literally — like garbage.

The property adjacent to the Holt family home is a government-owned landfill. The howling dogs are housed in a pound right next to the landfill. The noise is a nuisance, but it's the least of the family's problems.

Toxic chemicals from the landfill have polluted the pristine water that was once drawn from the Holt family well. Unaware that the water was contaminated, the family drank it for years. Now the Holts are convinced that the poisons that seeped for so long from the landfill into the groundwater are responsible for the potentially deadly diseases that have struck several members of the family.

The Holts were not just unaware that their water was contaminated; they had been assured by federal environmental officials way back in 1991 that the water had been tested and was safe to drink.

"They told us," said Sheila Holt-Orsted, who grew up on the property, "that the water wouldn't hurt us, and that we shouldn't worry about it."

In fact, government records show that dangerous levels of trichloroethylene (TCE), a suspected carcinogen, had been found in the water as early as 1988. The family drank the poisoned water for more than a dozen years after that.

During that time, the government warned white families that the water had been contaminated and provided them with an alternate source of drinking water. The Holts, who are black, were left oblivious to the danger. Welcome to the world of environmental racism, a subject that doesn't get nearly enough attention.

The Holts' property is on Eno Road, a quiet rustic area with an interesting history. Hundreds of acres of land along the road were acquired by blacks in the post-slavery period. Only recently freed, they were proud of being landowners. The Holts have lived in the community for many decades.

Blacks make up just 4.5 percent of the Dickson County population, and they have always been clustered in the vicinity of Eno Road. This has been a great convenience for the whites, who have run the local governments. For six decades, the Eno Road community has been designated as the place for whites to dump their garbage.

"The city and county fathers singled out this small, rural and mostly black Eno Road community to locate their garbage dumps, landfills, transfer stations, toxic waste sites — you name it," said Dr. Robert Bullard, director of the Environmental Justice Resource Center at Clark Atlanta University. "These waste sites are all located on Eno Road."

When I asked the mayor of Dickson County, Robert Stone, why that particular community had been chosen to absorb so much of the county's garbage, he said he couldn't respond because the Holts had filed a lawsuit against the county. He referred me to a lawyer, Eric Thornton, who asked why anyone would think it was peculiar to dump the garbage there.

"It has to be at some location," he said. He denied that race had anything to do with the selection process, noting that there were also whites who lived nearby.

The ingestion of TCE, commonly used as a metal degreaser, has been associated with a variety of cancers, heart disease, impairment of the nervous system, stroke, liver disease, kidney disease, diabetes and other extremely serious disorders.

At various times, the concentration of TCE in the well water of the Holt family was 24 and 29 times as high as the maximum level of five parts per billion set by the federal Environmental Protection Agency.

Sheila Holt-Orsted has undergone six surgeries and chemotherapy for breast cancer. Her father was stricken with prostate cancer. During a conversation in her front yard, less than 50 feet from the landfill, she told me: "My aunt, who lives next door, she had cancer. And then there was another neighbor who had cancer. I said, you know, 'Something is not right here.' "

Joint Chicago-DEA Drug Operations Net 16 Arrests (CST)

Chicago Sun-Times, September 29, 2006

Nine members of an international drug-trafficking ring that supplied heroin from Ghana to Chicago and other Midwest cities were charged Friday as apart of a joint investigation by Chicago Police and the U.S. DEA, according to police.

Seven of the nine were in custody as of Friday afternoon, according to a release from Chicago Police, including Moshoodi E. Ajijola, 38, of the 6600 block of North Damen Avenue. Authorities identified Ajijola as the head of the operation and charged him and eight others with federal drug conspiracy, the release said.

After a six-month undercover investigation by police and DEA agents dubbed "Operation Saheroin," authorities learned the organization imported pure heroin from Africa through Indian to America and finally to Chicago, where it was sold to customers for redistribution around the Midwest, including Rockford, St. Louis and Minneapolis, the release said.

Ajijola and six others were arrested last week, while a seventh suspect was arrested Friday, all on federal warrants. Police and federal agents used an undercover officer and wiretaps in the investigation, the release said.

In a separate drug investigation also announced Friday, federal charges were filed against nine alleged drug dealers who operated an open-air drug market in the 8800 block of South Lowe Avenue, the release said. The investigation led to the recovery of about 760 grams of crack cocaine valued at more than $93,600, the release said.

All nine of the defendants in "Operation C-Charlie" were arrested Wednesday, the release said. In addition to the cocaine, police seized small amounts of heroin and ecstasy, two semi-automatic handguns, five vehicles and $15,529, the release said.

DOJ_NMG_0073012

Court information on the suspects was not immediately available.

Heroin Ring Busted In City Hid Drugs In Suitcase Linings, Say Cops, Feds (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, September 30, 2006

Local and federal police joined forces to nab international heroin dealers who were smuggling dope from Ghana and Nigeria to Chicago in the lining of suitcases and by using human mules.

Federal charges against nine members of the international trafficking organization were announced Friday by Chicago Police and federal law enforcement authorities.

Moshoodi E. Ajijola, 38, allegedly the head of the organization, is among seven already in custody. Ajijola is suspected of importing pure heroin, which was then sold to local street gangs and customers as far away as Rockford, Minneapolis and St. Louis. The drugs also were turning up all over the city -- from the far South Chicago Police District to the far north Rogers Park Police District.

The heroin was coming to Chicago and New York through India.

Police said Ajijola, who lived in the 6600 block of North Damen, and his associates were selling out of a building in the 800 block of Eastwood in the Uptown neighborhood.

The charges came after a six-month-long investigation, based largely on a Chicago Police officer's ability to infiltrate the group, authorities said.

Agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration's Chicago field office also were involved in the case -- which one Chicago Police official said involved some of the best local/federal cooperation ever. Because the defendants spoke four different languages, the case required a lot of translation work.

"It was a team effort -- probably the best I have seen in 10 years of chasing dope," said Chicago Police Lt. John Rowton.

All of the nine defendants face federal charges, which increase the penalties and is a tactic Chicago Police are employing more and more. Of the nine, two remained at large as of Friday.

Police Bust International Heroin Connection (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Report

Chicago Tribune, September 29, 2006

Federal and local authorities said Friday that charges have been filed against nine suspects accused of belonging to an international drug-trafficking group that supplied heroin from Ghana to Chicago and other Midwest cities.

Authorities said they identified Moshoodi E. Ajijola of the 6600 block of North Damen Avenue as the head of the group. He and eight co-defendants face federal drug-conspiracy charges, with a sentence of 20 years to life if convicted, police said. Two suspects remain at large.

The undercover operation involved cooperation between the U.S. attorney's office, Cook County sheriff's office and Chicago police, said Gary Olenkiewicz, the Drug Enforcement Administration's Chicago special agent in charge.

A second drug bust on the South Side seized more than $15,500, 760 grams of crack cocaine and five vehicles, police said. Six suspects face federal drug-trafficking charges, police said.

Four Sentenced In Drug Smuggling Conspiracy (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

MONTPELIER — Four northern Vermont men were sentenced in federal court Thursday and Friday in what authorities described as a large conspiracy to smuggle millions of dollars worth of Canadian marijuana into the United States.

The four were among 12 people who have been sentenced or have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing in connection with a ring that smuggled loads of as much as 1,000 pounds of pot at a time in grain trucks entering Vermont from Quebec, the U.S. attorney's office said.

It said the "marijuana would be paid for by cash drug proceeds — commonly in amounts of a half- to three-quarters of a million dollars — concealed in tires mounted on vehicles traveling into Canada from the United States."

In hearings Thursday and Friday, Judge William Sessions III issued sentences to:

Roland Paul Lahue, 50, of East Berkshire, who was given seven years in prison, followed by five years of supervised release.

Jeffrey Tessier, 40, of Richford, who got 21 months followed by four years of supervised release.

Robert Patterson, 47, of Richford, who got time served while awaiting trial.

Mark Willey, 43, of Barton, who was sentenced to time served.

DOJ_NMG_0073013

Authorities identified the leaders of the ring as Lahue and Ronald "Ronnie Cash" Aldrich of Richford. A news release from the federal prosecutor said Aldrich had previously pleaded guilty.

The investigation was said to have involved the Drug Enforcement Administration, Vermont State Police, Internal Revenue Service and Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

During the investigation numerous assets were seized from Aldrich, Lahue and their associates, authorities said. Included were more than $930,000 in cash, more than $1.5 million worth of real estate and numerous cars, trucks, motorcycles, boats and other vehicles.

Four Vt. Men Sentenced For Smuggling Marijuana (BFP)

Burlington Free Press, September 30, 2006

Four Vermont men who authorities said arranged for large amounts of marijuana to be smuggled into the United States from Canada by foot or concealed in grain trucks were sentenced in federal court Thursday and Friday, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Burlington said Friday.

Roland Paul Lahue, 50, of East Berkshire; Jeffrery Tessier, 40, and Robert Patterson, 47, both of Richford; and Mark Willey, 43, of Barton received sentences ranging from seven years in the case of Lahue to time served for Patterson and Willey.

Court documents indicate Lahue and his partner Ronald Aldrich led the U.S. portion of the smuggling ring. Sometimes, 1,000 pounds of marijuana worth $1.5 million would pass across the border in grain trucks, prosecutors said.

Authorities said the smuggling was lucrative for Lahue and Aldrich. U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency officials said they seized $930,000 in cash and $1.5 million in cars, trucks, motorcycles, boats and other vehicles.

The smuggling operation unraveled Oct. 25, 2003 when investigators seized about 135 pounds of marijuana belonging to Aldrich that was in a storage shed on Patterson's property.

Aldrich was sentenced earlier this year. Prosecutors said Tessier, Patterson and Willey played comparatively small roles in the smuggling operations, so their sentences were lighter. Seven other people from Vermont, New Hampshire and Oregon previously pleaded guilty or were sentenced for their role in the smuggling.

In deciding the case, Judge William K. Sessions III reduced the sentences of the four men who appeared in court Thursday and Friday because prosecutors said they helped in the government's investigation into the case.

Federal Indictments Handed Down In Marijuna House Raids (KCRA)

KCRA-TV, September 29, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- Federal indictments were handed down Friday afternoon related to homes recently raided in Stockton and believe to be connection to a massive drug ring.

Investigators seized thousands of marijuana plants that being grown inside the homes.

A federal grand jury has now handed down a total of nine indictments related to the case and a joint task force has been formed that includes the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Internal Revenue Service, the U.S. Attorney General and local law enforcement.

Investigators said the homes raided in Stockton and a group of homes raided in Elk Grove are connected and that they suspect ties to organized crime in San Francisco.

Authorities have already seized millions of dollars of marijuana and large amounts of cash from the more than 50 homes they've raided in the last two months.

The operations are elaborate, the equipment inside the homes are identical and KCRA 3 Investigates has uncovered several trends.

In Stockton and Elk Grove, two real estate agents handled the overwhelming majority of homes. They represented the buyer in the transactions, which involved millions of dollars in real estate.

The joint task force is investigating everything about theses homes -- the purchase, the financing and the people buying the homes.

By tracking property records and deed, KCRA 3 Investigates has also learned that one title agent with the initials "N.C." handled 15 of the 20 homes in Stockton.

Marijuana Houses To Be Part Of Federal Probe (SR)

Stockton Record, September 30, 2006

STOCKTON - A score of indoor marijuana-growing operations uncovered this month in successive raids in several typically peaceful residential areas will become part of a larger federal probe in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0073014

A federal grand jury in Sacramento on Thursday handed down indictments on four San Francisco men arrested Sept. 13 in the first of the raids in Stockton, said Gordon Taylor, U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency assistant special agent in charge.

Federal prosecution is already under way in what investigators say is a related operation involving 21 houses in Sacramento and Elk Grove that also led to four arrests. Thursday's indictments formalize the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency's role in Stockton. Agents have been assisting Stockton police for two weeks, Taylor said.

"This is without a doubt the most sophisticated criminal syndicate that we have ever investigated in this region," Taylor said, referring to the DEA's Eastern California District, extending from Bakersfield to the state's northern border, excluding counties along the coast. "This is going to take months to wrap our arms around."

If convicted on federal charges of growing more than 1,000 marijuana plants, the four men arrested in Stockton could face 10 years to life in prison, Taylor said.

Terry Lee Tong, 24, Zhi Huo Xue, 25, Jiapei Zhou, 21, and Hong Bi Zeng, 21, were scheduled to be arraigned in San Joaquin County Superior Court this week, each on 21 counts of felony marijuana cultivation and utility theft. A conviction on those charges would have carried a sentence of up to 10 years in prison. That hearing was continued to next week before the U.S. Attorney's Office decided to prosecute the case.

Jiapei Zhou, 21 "We're moving forward under the concept that all 41 indoor groves are tied to the same organization with perhaps several different operating cells," Taylor said.

Licensed medical marijuana dispensaries in San Francisco were one likely market for the marijuana grown in the area, Taylor said.

At least 6,000 plants were seized in Stockton, along with 200 pounds of dried marijuana. A similar number of plants were found in Elk Grove and Sacramento in raids that began last month.

Stockton police Officer Pete Smith said the so-called pot houses set a record for large busts after the first night, when two homes were raided. Over two weeks, neighbors' tips and investigative leads led to 18 more.

Terry Lee Tong, 24 Past large drug stings in recent years have netted as much as 22 pounds of cocaine and 27 pounds of methamphetamine.

Tom Emery, 50, lives down the block from one raided Spanos Park West home.

He said this week he's not surprised that most residents knew nothing of what was going on inside the homes.

"Everyone's too busy," he said of his neighbors, many of whom are commuters. "I guess that's why they picked these types of neighborhoods."

Stockton Indoor Pot Farms Part Of Syndicate's Reach, Agents Say (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, September 30, 2006

Four Bay Area residents, indicted this week after a series of raids at homes in Stockton where marijuana was being grown, are part of the same organized crime syndicate behind a pot-growing network in the Sacramento area, authorities said Friday.

Described by agents as a Bay Area-based Asian organized crime network, the group is "without a doubt the most sophisticated crime syndicate we have ever investigated in this region," said Gordon Taylor, assistant special agent in charge of the Sacramento office of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

A task force consisting of the DEA, Internal Revenue Service, the U.S. Attorney's Office and the police departments of Sacramento, Elk Grove and Stockton has been formed to tackle the syndicate, Taylor said.

Authorities said they have raided 21 homes in the Sacramento area and 20 in Stockton since August, seizing at least $70 million worth of marijuana. Seven men and one woman, all Bay Area residents, have been charged in connection with the network.

Investigators "expect to find people much higher on the chain" of the network, Taylor said.

Local authorities are working with Bay Area agencies as they look into the syndicate, he said.

The IRS is helping track the home purchases. Many of the homes were purchased with 100 percent financing and the homes raided so far have all been worth at least $400,000, records show.

Investigators also are looking into where the marijuana was moved after it was grown, Taylor said. According to documents filed in federal court, agents have followed suspects from homes in the Sacramento region to San Francisco's Chinatown.

Taylor said the indoor marijuana farms have brought a dangerous criminal element into the suburbs.

"It's not just marijuana," he said. "It's organized crime now, moving into our neighborhoods."

Buyers Must Sign Log To Get Medicine; Law Aimed At Drug Dealers (DRE)

Daily Record, September 30, 2006

Beginning today, cold and allergy sufferers will have to log their name and address to purchase some of their favorite over-the-counter remedies -- thanks to new federal regulations designed to keep certain cold medicines out of the hands of drug dealers.

The regulations were included in the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act of 2005, which ordered pharmacies nationwide to move all over-the-counter cold and allergy medicines with the decongestants pseudoephedrine, ephedrine and phenylpropanolamine to a secured area and limited the amount that a consumer could purchase at one time.

The goal, according to the law, is to reduce the amount of pseudoephedrine that can be purchased at one time to limit its availability to drug dealers who use it to make methamphetamine.

In the past year, authorities broke up "meth" labs operating in Sussex County.

As of today, consumers must show an ID and sign a logbook for each purchase. Buyers must log their name, address, date and time of sale, name and quantity of the product sold, and the signature of the customer.

Retailers and pharmacies also will be required to complete a self-certification process that includes training their employees on the new regulations and procedures.

Joseph V. Roney, chief executive of the New Jersey Pharmacists Association, said on Friday that the new rules are unnecessary and outdated.

"They are turning cold-sufferers into criminals," Roney said.

The new regulations will be enforced by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency.

Roney said the federal rules are more strict than those put into New Jersey law last year. That law, with the same aim as federal regulations, limited the purchase of cold remedies with pseudoephedrine to three packages per sale.

The federal law will not hamper the makers of methamphetamine, because high-level dealers smuggle bags of pseudoephedrine into the country from laboratories in Mexico, Roney said.

Roney said he was concerned that consumers will face a confusing scenario as they try to purchase the cold remedies they need. He said his association has made materials available to its members to help smooth the transition.

Monica Contessa, pharmacist at the Madison Pharmacy, said she is not expecting any problems with the new law. She expects to have to answer some questions from customers who might not find their favorite cold remedy on the shelf.

But that has been happening since last year, she said, after the state law took effect.

Contessa said customers most likely will not be too concerned with the log-in procedures because they already have to sign forms for their insurance coverage.

Pharmacist Sri Aju at Molnar Pharmacy in Morristown also said he did not expect problems, in part because of the established nature of his business. The shop is located in a settled part of Morristown and has many regulars, he said.

He also expects to answer some questions and provide a little more explanation.

Contessa said removing cold products with pseudoephedrine from the shelves did not hamper sales because "the customers tend to know what works for them."

Janet Engle, an associate professor at the University of Illinois and a former president of the American Pharmacists Association, said that, besides the new regulations that could cause confusion, the decongestant used to replace pseudoephedrine is not as potent and, in some cases, does not work as well.

Roney said the decongestant used most often to replace pseudoephedrine is phenylephrine, and it does not work on allergy or cold symptoms as well as its predecessor.

Both Roney and Engle said Schering-Plough chose not to reformulate Claritin-D, its top-selling over-the-counter allergy medicine, and are running a series of ads touting that fact.

In the first quarter of this year, Schering-Plough's consumer health care sales decreased 6 percent to $311 million, largely due to lower sales of Claritin-D and other products containing pseudoephedrine, according to the company's annual statement.

Government Aims To Curb Meth Makers (IVDB)

Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, September 30, 2006

Customers looking for Sudafed, Claritin D and other cold medicines this weekend will likely find a bare shelf at their local pharmacy. A federal law that goes into effect today requires cold medications with pseudoephedrine to be kept behind counters or in locked cabinets wherever sold. Buyers also must show a photo ID and sign a logbook. "The additional control on pseudoephedrine will help law enforcement help target the meth problem," said Capt.

DOJ_NMG_0073016

Bill Ryan of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Narcotics Bureau. The Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act of 2005 is the latest move by the government to hinder methamphetamine manufacturers by cutting off one of their sources of pseudoephedrine - one of the key ingredients in making the drug. Many cold medicines such as Sudafed contain pseudoephedrine. The law also requires that any employee selling these cold medicines must receive training on the law and its requirements.

The process for doing that was put in place a week ago, said John Cronin, pharmacist and legal consultant to the California Pharmacists Association. The law is patterned after a 2004 Oklahoma law that officials there credit with reducing meth labs by 80 percent. Medicines containing ephedrine and phenylpropanolamine also are subject to the law. An earlier portion of the law, which went into effect six months ago, limited customers to 3.6 grams a day or 9 grams in a 30-day period.

A gram equals 1,000 milligrams, and one Sudafed pill is 30 milligrams. According to the Drug Enforcement Administration, meth is the primary drug threat in California. Also known as crank, ice, speed or crystal, meth can be inhaled, smoked or injected. The quality of the drug - as well as supply and demand -determine its price.

The current wholesale price of meth in L.A. County is $5,000 to $6,000 a pound, according to Ryan. Ice, a more purer form of the drug, goes for a wholesale price of $8,000 to $11,000 a pound. Ryan said the number of meth labs have been decreasing in the state in the past couple of years due to enforcement and to controlling the ingredients used in making meth.

There were 673 labs seized in the state in 2004 compared to 2,579 in 1999, according to the DEA. Agency officials said that the number of meth labs in Mexico has increased, however. The newly required logbooks - which could be in electronic form - will list a customer's name, address, time and date of sale, the name of the product and how much of it was sold.

Pharmacists need to keep this information for two years. The only part of the Combat Meth Act that's new for Rite Aid is the requirement for customers to sign a logbook, according to company spokeswoman Jody Cook. She said Rite Aid voluntarily started putting cold medicines containing pseudoephedrine behind pharmacy counters last year. They also already ask for driver's licenses and keep the number of the license in their computer system for 30 days, she said.

Some drug companies have unveiled products without pseudoephedrine or ephedrine. Pfizer, which makes Sudafed, came out with SudafedPE in February 2005. It doesn't contain pseudoephedrine but phenylephrine. Days before the law took effect, some local pharmacies were still not familiar with all of its provisions. On Wednesday, a lone box of Sudafed remained on the shelf at Nogales Pharmacy in Rowland Heights.

Pharmacist Par-lin Hsu said he had planned to move the box and other cold medicine behind the counter later in the week. Hsu said he hasn't received any official notice about the law. Cronin said there were still questions on how pharmacists would comply. "That guidance would come out in a federal rule. It wasn't published until Sept. 26," he said.

Some customers were unaware of what they would need to do now when buying cold and allergy medications or appear to mind the new restrictions. Outside a Wal-Mart in Industry, Carlos Orozco said he and his children use Sudafed pills to treat their colds. The Whittier man said it wouldn't bother him to show an ID and sign a logbook to get the pills.

Orozco added that people already get carded when they buy liquor and cigarettes. "Everybody just needs one box, I think," Orozco said.

Under the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act:

· Cold medicine containing pseudoephedrine will now be kept behind counters at pharmacies or in locked cabinets.

· Requires buyers to present a photo ID and sign a logbook. The logbook will contain a buyer's name and address, name of the product, amount bought plus date and time of the sale.

· Limits the amount of cold medicine one can buy to 3.6 grams a day or 9 grams in a 30-day period.

· Requires pharmacists to keep the information about the sale for two years.

· Provides an additional $99 million per year for the next five years under the Meth Hot Spots program to train state and local law enforcement to investigate and lock-up meth offenders and expand funding available for personnel and equipment for enforcement, prosecution and environmental clean-up.

· Enhances criminal penalties for meth production and trafficking.

· Requires new reporting and certification procedures of the largest exporting and importing countries of pseudoephedrine and ephedrine.

Anti-meth Law Puts Cold Medicines Behind Counter (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 30, 2006

Sudafed and its chemical cousins officially abandon the shelves and take their places behind pharmacy counters Sunday, the result of federal legislation aimed at slowing the spread of methamphetamine.

DOJ_NMG_0073017

With the new restrictions, which follow state regulations put in place in mid-2005, lawmakers have succeeded in making pseudoephedrine and two similar chemicals a lot harder to come by for home-and-garage labs brewing the illicit street drug.

They've also made getting a cure for the sniffles more time-consuming for the everyday consumer, since the ingredient is used in virtually all decongestants.

The tougher rules require the items be sold from behind pharmacy shelves or from a locked case. Buyers must provide a state or federal identification and log their name, address, date of purchase and how much of the drug was purchased. Logbooks are kept two years by the store and are open for examination by the Drug Enforcement Administration, as well as other state and federal law enforcement authorities.

The pharmaceutical industry has tried to adapt to the changes by reconstituting many of the products and eliminating the offending ingredient. But while the new products can be sold over the counter, there is some question about whether they work.

Brace yourself: Federal authorities may have another cluster of drugs in their sights, a list that includes such humble bromides as Alka-Seltzer Plus and Vicks 44 Cough Relief.

As the popularity of methamphetamine has grown, so have the sales, and theft, of cold and allergy drugs from store shelves containing the restricted ingredients. Cooking up a batch is dangerous, too: Toxic chemicals drench the premises from roof to root, rendering it fit only for a hazmat team. Sometimes, even surrounding soil has to be removed.

Drugstore crackdowns do seem to curb the number of homegrown meth labs. But another source has popped up to meet demand.

In Texas, for instance, kitchen-brewed meth began drying up just months after that state passed its own laws on drugstore sales. But that led to more meth being smuggled in from Mexico, and in an especially pure form: Mexican Ice. That was also the case with Oklahoma, one of the first states to experiment with drugstore sales.

The Florida Department of Law Enforcement acknowledges much of this state's meth comes from out-of-state labs, not suburban kitchens. However, eliminating the local labs — and their publicly funded cleanup — is a step forward, said FDLE Special Agent Rick Zenuch in an earlier interview.

Make that a hesitant step. Rules for how pharmacies handle sales came out only 10 days ago. Kevin Nicholson, vice president of pharmacy regulatory affairs for the association of drugstores, says at least some retailers won't get their DEA paperwork approved by today, "and until they get that certification, they can't sell the products."

Still unresolved are questions of whether the personal information in logs conflicts with stringent federal rules on a person's right to medical privacy.

Other ingredients in off-the-shelf drugs are also attracting attention. In August, the Partnership for a Drug-Free America reported its survey of more than 7,300 teens found one in 10 had used cough medicine to get high. Federal lawmakers this summer proposed restricting bulk sales of dextromethorpham, or DXM, the active ingredient in a broad array of cough medicines, including Alka-Seltzer Plus Cold & Cough, Tylenol Cold products and Vicks 44 Cough Relief products.

The federal proposal would have affected those pharmacists who buy ingredients, then mix and measure them. States, though, have also shown interest in restricting sales, says Nicholson. And last year, Walgreen Co. — which sells more than 200 products containing DXM — programmed its cash registers to bar sales of all products containing the cough ingredient to anyone younger than 18.

U.S. Stores Race To Meet Law Aimed At Meth (OREG)

The Oregonian, September 30, 2006

Consumers nationwide will have to show identification and sign a log book when buying cold remedies that contain pseudoephedrine starting today, under a new law aimed at depriving methamphetamine cooks of their essential ingredients.

Americans will be limited to daily purchases of pseudoephedrine totaling 3.6 grams and monthly purchases of 9 grams. At a typical dosage, that's 120 tablets a day and 300 a month.

Oregon consumers will be unaffected by the new rules under the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act, which President Bush signed in March. Oregon is exempt because the state imposed a far tougher pseudoephedrine restriction starting in July: a prescription.

Retailers in the other 49 states were scrambling this week to file paperwork with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, certifying that they had trained employees to follow the sales restrictions. The DEA estimated 89,000 businesses would be affected, and the deadline was midnight Friday.

Rusty Payne, a DEA spokesman, said stores that sell pseudoephedrine without a certification "run the risk of DEA action, such as an inspection or audit."

He declined to say how many businesses had completed the process, which the DEA announced on its Web site 11 days ago.

DOJ_NMG_0073018

"There are a number of retailers out there who won't be able to complete the process by (Saturday)," said Kevin Nicholson of the National Association of Chain Drug Stores. "So technically, they won't be able to sell the product."

Nicholson, vice president of pharmacy regulatory affairs for the trade group, said many chains waited until Friday to fill out the DEA forms online and experienced delays.

Jan Gee, president and CEO of the Washington Food Industry, said grocery stores in Washington state are doing the best they can to meet the deadline. But she called the DEA's timeframe "unrealistic."

"When you're making your best effort to achieve a new regulation or law, they're fairly flexible with you," said Gee, whose group represents 550 stores in Washington. "That's my hope."

Michael Polzin, a spokesman for Walgreens stores, said the company rushed its paperwork to the DEA within the past two days and had not received a response from the agency by Friday.

"We believe we're in compliance by having submitted that to the DEA," Polzin said.

The federal meth law follows two years of action by states to crack down on the sale of ephedrine and pseudoephedrine, interchangeable ingredients in manufacturing methamphetamine.

As of last week, 42 states had enacted some sort of retail sales restriction, according to the National Alliance for Model State Drug Laws. Some states confine the products to pharmacy counters. Others allow other retailers to sell pseudoephedrine as long as it is locked up to prevent theft. The federal law only supersedes states with looser standards.

States that lack any pseudoephedrine law tend to be in the northeast, a region with far fewer meth labs than the rest of the nation.

But even in states with no existing restrictions on pseudoephedrine sales, many Americans will see little change in their daily routines. That's because the pharmaceutical industry has already made dramatic changes in anticipation of the new federal law.

Changing cold medicine

Drug companies last year began reformulating cold medicines with phenylephrine, which can't be used to make meth.

The nation's largest drug store chains, historically the largest sellers of pseudoephedrine products, began placing reformulated products on store shelves. And many chains began voluntarily placing existing products with pseudoephedrine behind the counter, even in states that did not require it.

"People have been sort of discovering this over the course of the past year or so as states and as specific retailers have made changes on their own," said Erica Johnson, a spokeswoman for Pfizer Consumer Healthcare.

Pfizer, the first company to reformulate, now offers Sudafed PE with phenylephrine as well as traditional Sudafed with pseudoephedrine.

Some leading convenience store chains have switched entirely to the reformulated product. The 5,300 U.S. stores and franchisees of 7-Eleven Inc. stopped selling pseudoephedrine products last year in advance of the new federal law.

"We saw the direction that this was going and we just decided, let's not sell products with this particular ingredient," said Margaret Chabris, a spokeswoman.

U.S. consumption of pseudoephedrine has plummeted as a result of the changes, federal trade data show. Imports of bulk pseudoephedrine averaged 13 tons a month through July of this year, down from 49 tons a month during the same period in 2004 -- a 73 percent reduction in two years.

Gary Schnabel, executive director of the Oregon Board of Pharmacy, said sales of pseudoephedrine products have largely dried up.

"What we're hearing is that most people are just going to the reformulated products over the counter," Schnabel said.

Whether phenylephrine is as good at unplugging stuffy noses is a matter of debate at the moment.

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., called on the U.S. Food and Drug Administration last month to re-evaluate the decongestant's effectiveness.

FDA officials responded by saying that phenylephrine was approved as safe and effective by an FDA expert panel 30 years ago.

"If a consumer does not feel that phenylephrine provides the type of relief that they obtained with pseudoephedrine, they have the option of not purchasing it and purchasing pseudoephedrine instead," wrote David W. Boyer, assistant commissioner for legislation.

Johnson, the Pfizer spokeswoman, said the company's surveys showed 83 percent of people who used Sudafed in the past continue to be satisfied with the new product containing phenylephrine.

Fewer meth labs

Seizures of methamphetamine labs across the United States have declined dramatically.

DOJ_NMG_0073019

DEA data show the number of labs nationally fell 42 percent to 5,845 between 2004 and 2005. When seizures of dumpsites, chemicals and equipment are included, the total was 12,456 in 2005, a decline of 30 percent. The number of labs and waste sites in Oregon fell 60 percent during the same period, from 471 in 2004 to 189 in 2005.

Rob Bovett, legal counsel to the Oregon Narcotics Enforcement Association, said nationwide controls will prevent Oregon meth cooks from shopping for pseudoephedrine in neighboring states.

California, one of the few states still allowing retailers to sell pseudoephedrine over the counter without checking ID, will now have to follow the federal law.

And there will be other impacts, said Bovett, who openly advocates regulating pseudoephedrine "into non-existence."

"As we further change the demand for pseudoephedrine," Bovett said, "we're going to change the world market for pseudoephedrine and thereby change the supply of methamphetamine."

New OTC Policy For Allergy, Cold Meds (NSDY)

By Curtis L. Taylor, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 29, 2006

Consumers must show a photo ID and sign a log to purchase some nonprescription sinus, cold and allergy medicines such as Claritin-D and Sudafed -- drugs that will now be locked behind the counter starting Saturday.

The federal law bans over-the-counter sales of drug products containing ephedrine, pseudoephedrine and phenylpropanolamine to curb illegal production of crystal methamphetamine, an addictive drug made with the ingredients.

Officials said online purchasers will face similar restrictions under the Combat Methamphetamine Epidemic Act included in the anti-terrorist Patriot Bill signed March 9 by President George W. Bush.

"This is crazy," said Jerry McIntosh, 71, a customer at the Wakefield Pharmacy in South Ozone. "I wanted to get a little NyQuil cold medicine. I have a little cold and it makes you feel a little better, but I have to give my phone number and address. This makes no sense. If this is going to be a pain in the neck, I can live without it."

His pharmacist, Bob Mason, said that while he understood the need to curb illicit drug production, the restrictions were a major hardship to him and his customers.

"It takes time to log in the information," Mason said. "Worse, some customers just walk out without buying anything. They say, 'I am not going to do it, I just have a cold,' or 'I should not be harassed just because I have allergies.'"

Jan Engle, a professor of pharmacy practice at the University of Illinois College of Pharmacy, said the important thing is to educate consumers about where their medications are now located and about differences in the new decongestants on open shelves. Many brands are substituting ephedrine and pseudoephedrine, which have 12- and 24-hour time-release formulas, with phenlyephrine, an older drug that lasts about four hours, she said.

"If you are at work and you get congested, the last thing you want to do is stop every four hours to take your medicine," said Engle, who teaches a course on over-the-counter prescription drugs. Engle warned that consumers should be prepared to encounter lines and different policy interpretations at each pharmacy. In some states, the law calls for a two-box limit, but some chain drugstores have adopted a one-box policy.

"The bottom line for consumers is that the drug is still available, it is still safe and effective, it is just in a different place," Engle said.

Dr. Dean Mitchell, an allergist with offices in Baldwin and Manhattan, welcomed the new restrictions.

"It is going to dramatically affect my patients, but in the long run I think it will do some good," he said. "Many people overuse these drugs, which all have potential side effects.

"I see patients who take decongestants on a regular basis who come in with elevated blood pressure and insomnia," Mitchell said. "A lot are suffering from sinus conditions but have not been tested for allergies. There are now special allergy drops that can reverse this problem and they may not need the medicine."

Adam Brzezinski 81, of South Ozone, learned about the restrictions Friday while trying to buy Robitussin cough syrup. "I am lucky because I have a pharmacist that knows me, but I would not give out the information at a chain store," he said.

Who Moved My Sudafed? (TIME/CNN)

Time/CNN, October 1, 2006

The fall allergy season brings a new headache this year. Starting this week, allergy sufferers who want to treat their stuffy noses with pseudoephedrine (an active ingredient in Sudafed and similar over-the-counter remedies) will have to go to a pharmacist or salesclerk, show photo identification and sign a logbook recording their name and street address. The national rule, which echoes restrictions found in several states, is supposed to make it tougher for criminals to manufacture the illegal drug methamphetamine using packets of pseudoephedrine as its raw material. Allergy sufferers who don't want to go through the extra trouble had better have a lot of tissues on hand. The most common alternative, the nasal decongestant phenylephrine, may not be as effective.

Both compounds work by constricting the blood vessels in the nose. But, says Leslie Hendeles, a professor of pharmacy practice and pediatrics at the University of Florida, "phenylephrine doesn't get into the bloodstream very effectively" because it is so quickly metabolized by the digestive system. That made Hendeles and a colleague curious about why the Food and Drug Administration considered the drug effective in the first place. They tracked down the studies on which an advisory panel had based its recommendations back in 1976 and were surprised to learn that seven of the 11 studies showed the drug was no better than a placebo at relieving nasal congestion. Part of the problem may be that there's a lot more variation in people's response to this particular pill, making it difficult to tell if it really works--and for whom.

Fortunately, phenylephrine does a pretty good job for most people when it's sprayed directly into the nose. So a decongestant spray like Neo-Synephrine is a good bet, but only if you use it for three days or less. Using the spray any longer sets you up for something called rebound congestion, in which you become even more stuffed up than you were when you began. That warning also holds true for oxymetazoline, the nasal decongestant found in such nasal sprays as Afrin.

On the other hand, phenylephrine sprays are usually safe for folks with high blood pressure, since the medication stays pretty much in the nose and doesn't affect the rest of the body. Pseudoephedrine, by contrast, should not be used, except under a doctor's order, if you have hypertension. Also, in extremely rare cases, the drug may trigger a heart attack.

So if you have a short-lasting cold, you're covered. But allergy sufferers generally need more than three days' relief. Antihistamines will take care of the runny nose and watery eyes. For your stuffy nose, you're going to want to think about signing that logbook. And if you use a big drugstore, be sure you visit before the pharmacy section closes for the night. There's also a limit to how many boxes you can buy each month, so families may need to plan accordingly. As an alternative, you may want to see a doctor about getting a prescription for a nasal corticosteroid spray.

As with any medication, read the label to make sure you know what you're getting--even if you have used a particular product before. Manufacturers of many familiar nonprescription brands have quietly switched to phenylephrine so that their packages can stay on drugstore shelves. Allergies may be hard to avoid, but if you do your homework and follow the rules, you can still get the relief you need.

Clemens Is Named In Drug Affidavit (LAT)

By Lance Pugmire, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

The star pitcher and five other players used performance-enhancers, according to a former teammate who took steroids, prosecutors say.

Roger Clemens, one of professional baseball's most durable and successful pitchers, is among six players allegedly linked to performance-enhancing drugs by a former teammate, The Times has learned. The names had been blacked out in an affidavit filed in federal court.

Others whose identities had been concealed include Clemens' fellow Houston Astros pitcher Andy Pettitte and former American League most valuable player Miguel Tejada of the Baltimore Orioles.

The discovery ends four months of speculation surrounding the possible identities of Major League Baseball figures whose names were redacted from the search warrant affidavit filed in Phoenix on May 31. The document was based on statements allegedly made to federal agents by pitcher Jason Grimsley, who has since retired.

Grimsley, a journeyman relief pitcher who played on several teams, including the New York Yankees, Baltimore Orioles and the Angels, acknowledged using steroids, amphetamines and other drugs, investigators said in the document. He also implicated a number of former teammates, but the names were blacked out in copies of the affidavit made public in June after investigators used the warrant to raid Grimsley's house.

A source with authorized access to an unredacted affidavit allowed The Times to see it briefly and read aloud some of what had been blacked out of the public copies. A second source and confidant of Grimsley had previously disclosed player identities and provided additional details about the affidavit. The sources cooperated only on condition of anonymity.

According to the affidavit, Grimsley told investigators that Clemens "used athletic performance-enhancing drugs." He also allegedly said Tejada used anabolic steroids.

Clemens and Pettitte did not respond to requests for comment made Saturday through their agents and the Astros. Tejada had previously declined to be interviewed.

DOJ_NMG_0073021

Grimsley was questioned by investigators after he allegedly received an illegal shipment of human growth hormone, or HGH. The shipment was tracked to his Scottsdale, Ariz., home by a task force of federal agents investigating drug use in professional baseball, the affidavit said.

For a time, Grimsley secretly cooperated with investigators, they said, but stopped after retaining a lawyer.

According to the 20-page search warrant affidavit, signed by IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky, Grimsley told investigators he obtained amphetamines, anabolic steroids and human growth hormone from someone recommended to him by, a source said, former Yankees trainer Brian McNamee. McNamee is a personal strength coach for Clemens and Pettitte.

The former team trainer did not return several messages left with his wife and on his answering machine.

The affidavit also alleges that Grimsley told federal agents that former Orioles teammates Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons "took anabolic steroids." Roberts was the American League's all-star second baseman in 2005 when Grimsley was an Oriole.

All three Baltimore players declined to be interviewed. Roberts said he had "nothing to talk about" and didn't know why he was named.

A sixth player, retired outfielder and first baseman David Segui, previously came forward to say that his name was among those blacked out in the affidavit provided to the public. Segui told ESPN in June that he used HGH on the advice of his doctor as recently as the 2004 season. He did not obtain approval from the league, he acknowledged.

Government officials have declined to comment about their ongoing investigation of drugs in professional baseball.

Clemens, 44, a seven-time Cy Young Award winner who came out of retirement to pitch for the Astros the last three seasons, was a teammate of Grimsley on the Yankees in 1999 and 2000, as was Pettitte, a two-time all-star who is nearing 200 career wins. Grimsley, Tejada, Gibbons, Roberts and Segui were teammates in Baltimore during the 2004 and 2005 seasons.

Grimsley started this year with the Arizona Diamondbacks, but requested voluntary retirement in June after Major League Baseball suspended him for 50 games.

Edward Novak, Grimsley's lawyer, did not return calls. Previously, he publicly disputed the claims investigators made in the affidavit, saying his client did not volunteer the names of any teammates. He said federal agents asked Grimsley to wear a recording device to gather evidence against San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds and that Grimsley refused.

Grimsley was not arrested and has not been charged. Since June, he has complained to friends that federal agents attributed statements and disclosures to him that he didn't make.

"Jason is loyal to the death, a hardheaded guy who would not give up his friends," one of Grimsley's friends said Saturday. "The only names he discussed with those investigators were names … [the investigators] suggested to him."

The Grimsley friend, who talked about the investigation on the condition he not be named, said investigators warned the pitcher that "if he didn't continue to cooperate, they would expose him as a rat."

Rich Levin, a spokesman for Major League Baseball, said the organization and players association were "doing everything we can to eliminate the use of performance-enhancing substances and amphetamines from the game."

Regarding the investigators' affidavit, Levin said baseball officials had "no information [about] how it was obtained or its accuracy."

Clemens has surprised many in the baseball world with his late-career success. Of his 348 career wins, 55 have come since the season he turned 40. In a controversial tell-all book released two winters ago, former major leaguer Jose Canseco speculated that Clemens' late-career surge showed "classic signs" of steroid use.

"Roger says it is all nonsense," Clemens' agent, Randy Hendricks, responded to Newsday at the time. He said the pitcher "takes vitamin B-12 shots … and will pass every [drug] test."

On Saturday, the agent told the Associated Press: "I've grown weary of having to defend [Clemens] from innuendo and conjecture about every six months for the last several years when he's complied with all of the rules and regulations."

Speaking of another of his clients, Pettitte, Hendricks told AP: "Andy is just surprised and stunned, and has no knowledge of any such activity."

Pettitte, 34, pitched nine seasons and was a part of four World Series championships with the Yankees, then signed with the Astros after the 2003 season, helping Houston advance to the World Series in 2005. He has won 14 games this year for a career record of 186 wins, 104 losses.

Tejada, listed at 5-feet-9, 215 pounds, hit 30 home runs in 2000 for the Oakland A's and has established himself as one of the game's best middle-infield power hitters.

He was drawn into baseball's steroids scandal in August 2005, when then-teammate Rafael Palmeiro, who tested positive for an anabolic steroid and was suspended for 10 games, told an appeals panel the test might have resulted from injectable vitamins given to him by Tejada. After investigating, the panel cleared Tejada.

DOJ_NMG_0073022

Tejada's increasingly sullen demeanor has attracted hometown news media coverage in Baltimore, where he also has become a target of complaints from fans who accuse him of not hustling.

During the summer, he canceled an interview with The Times for this article. "I don't want to talk to you," he said. Later, Tejada referred a reporter to agent Diego Bentz, who did not return calls.

Outfielder Gibbons, a product of Mayfair High School in Lakewood and Cal State Los Angeles, spent late June on the disabled list with a knee injury in Scottsdale, Ariz. His father, Jim, acknowledged at his Lakewood home on July 5 that the player was aware of the affidavit.

"Is this about Grimsley?" the elder Gibbons asked a Times reporter. "I'm not saying anything about it. I'll let him know you stopped by."

Roberts, listed at 5-9, 175, hit 18 home runs in 561 at-bats last season, matching his combined total through the previous six years in the major and minor leagues.

After a victory over the Red Sox in Boston on Saturday, two of the Orioles told the Baltimore Sun that they denied the claims made in the affidavit.

"I don't pay any attention to what" Grimsley allegedly said about performance-enhancing drug use, Tejada said. "I know that I've never had a problem with that. I know that I've never used that, and I know I am clean. I don't worry about anybody who puts me in that stuff. I'll get checked out for anybody, any time, any moment — whenever they want."

Gibbons said: "I have passed every test administered by Major League Baseball over all the years. And I am not going to dignify these claims and accusations with any further response."

Grimsley told investigators he had used anabolic steroids beginning in 2000, tested positive during 2003 trial testing, and switched to human growth hormone, undetectable in a urine test, after that. He admitted to using amphetamines until an agreement with the players association banned them several months ago, according to the affidavit.

In a major league career that began with the Philadelphia Phillies in 1989, Grimsley played for seven organizations.

Baseball's Ugly Side Just Got Uglier (NYT)

By William C. Rhoden
The New York Times, October 2, 2006
San Francisco

By 11 a.m. yesterday, Barry Bonds hadn't heard the news.

On this, the final day of a disappointing season, Bonds, baseball's second greatest home run hitter, sat in front of his dressing area, watching his beloved 49ers get shellacked by the Kansas City Chiefs. Bonds wasn't aware that names had been disclosed in connection with the continuing peril of the use of human growth hormone.

In yesterday's editions, The Los Angeles Times reported that Roger Clemens was among six players named by a former teammate as using performance-enhancing drugs.

None of the players was named Barry Bonds.

The article said the former major league pitcher Jason Grimsley also identified Andy Pettitte, Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons as players who used performance-enhancing drugs.

The big fish in these allegations — and they are only allegations — is Clemens, perhaps the most dominating pitcher of his generation. I'm not sure how I expected Bonds to react to the news. Indignation? A sense of satisfaction? Bonds arched his eyebrows in surprise and not much else. "That's awful," he said, and let it go at that.

It is awful, and infuriating, that the hypocrisies of two industries — baseball and news media — are converging. Baseball, if it didn't encourage drug use, at least looked the other way season after season as players did what they it had to do to make it through 162 games. The news media, selectively picking and choosing who to vilify, has been on a Bonds hunt for two seasons. Now it may be confronted with Clemens. If I know my industry, there will now be calls for restraint, for withholding judgment. There will be calls for evenhandedness, for letting it play itself out, following the truth where it leads.

Right.

This hunt has never been about getting at the larger truth, never about purging, going back and finding out how baseball helped perpetuate a culture of amphetamines. Instead, we've witnessed a typically American approach to solving deep-seated problems: denial first, finding a scapegoat, initiating a public chase, holding an equally public execution and subsequently declaring the problem over.

Bonds was supposed to be that scapegoat.

The problem is that the loose string we've grabbed and pulled is undressing an entire industry, dredging up names never intended to be dredged up.

Clemens and Pettitte, teammates with the Yankees and the Astros, denied the allegations.

"I just think it's incredibly dangerous to sit out there and just throw names out there," Clemens said yesterday before the Astros played in Atlanta.

He added: "I've been tested plenty of times. My physicals I've taken, they have taken my bloodwork. I have passed every test. Again, I just find it amazing that you can throw anybody out there."

Pettitte said he was stunned by the report.

"I played with Grimsley for a couple of years in New York and had a great relationship with him," Pettitte told reporters.

Pettitte said he never used any performance-enhancing drugs. "I don't know what else to say except to say it's embarrassing my name would be out there," he said.

Indeed. The moving finger writes and having writ, moves on.

Before yesterday's game, Giants Manager Felipe Alou noted, "The minute your name comes out, even if it's not true, your name came out; it's nice to go home clean."

In June, federal agents searched Grimsley's home in Arizona after he admitted using human growth hormone, steroids and amphetamines. Grimsley was released by Arizona and suspended by Major League Baseball. Alou, who may be on his way out as the Giants' manager, was asked what he thought of the new set of disclosures.

DOJ_NMG_0073024

"I was shocked to see some of the names on television this morning," Alou said. "There are some big names. I said, 'Here we go again.' Can you imagine having to go through another year? You believe the season is going to be behind us, the season is over and all of that is behind. Now it's in front of us."

Alou predicted that more names — more big names — will surface as federal agents dig and dig in their attempt to get Bonds. The battleground is filling up with casualties.

In pursuit of Bonds, The San Francisco Chronicle published a story based on documents obtained from a grand jury. Now two of its reporters face prison time. More big-name athletes will have their reputations tarnished. Meanwhile, Bonds, the target in all of this, is sitting in front of his stall, watching a football game.

What fitting symmetry to a baseball season that began with Bonds hounded by suspicion of steroid use, despite never testing positive. The season ends with big names other than Bonds being implicated by a former teammate. Now the mob that has pursued Bonds with a single-minded vengeance must decide whether to pursue Clemens and Pettitte as well.

Asked whether he thought the news media will go as hard after Clemens as it has after Bonds, Alou said: "First of all, it has to be true. We don't know if that is true."

"But I gotta say though," he said, smiling, "that Rockets are hard to catch."

Baseball deserves this. We deserve this.

Clemens, Others Blast Grimsley Report (AP)

AP, October 2, 2006

-- Roger Clemens calls the report "dangerous and malicious and reckless." Andy Pettitte insists he never took banned drugs. Miguel Tejada says he is being smeared again by scandal.

Some of baseball's biggest stars responded with denials and denunciations Sunday following a Los Angeles Times report in which former pitcher Jason Grimsley accused five players of using performance-enhancing drugs, according to a federal agent's affidavit. The other players cited were Baltimore teammates Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons.

Grimsley once played with Clemens and Pettitte on the New York Yankees and is now out of baseball. The reliever has admitted using a variety of banned substances and was suspended for 50 games by Major League Baseball.

Clemens and Pettitte, now teammates on the Houston Astros, denied the allegations Sunday.

"I just think it's incredibly dangerous to sit out there and just throw names out there," Clemens said Sunday before the Astros played in Atlanta on the final day of the regular season. "I haven't seen (the report), nor do I need to see it."

"For the people involved it is very dangerous and malicious and reckless on the part of somebody ... to put something out there with somebody else's writing on it," he added.

Clemens said he has been tested "plenty of times" and passed every test.

Pettitte was "stunned" by the report.

"I played with Grimsley for a couple of years in New York and had a great relationship with him," the pitcher said before the Astros' game.

"I've never used any drugs to enhance my performance in baseball. I don't know what else to say except to say it's embarrassing my name would be out there."

In June, federal agents searched Grimsley's home in Arizona after the pitcher admitted using human growth hormone, steroids and amphetamines. Grimsley later was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks.

In a search warrant affidavit signed by IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky, the Times reported, he said Grimsley identified other players who had used drugs. Those names were blacked out when the document was released.

"As for Jason Grimsley's affidavit, we have no information regarding how it was obtained or its accuracy," MLB spokesman Richard Levin said Sunday.

All major league players are tested at least twice a year for banned drugs. There is no test for HGH, but it is banned by the sport. Former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell was hired by MLB to investigate steroids in baseball.

The Times said an unidentified source with access to the document _ minus the cross-outs _ allowed the newspaper see it but kept the copy. The Times said a second source who had identified the other players provided additional details about the document.

According to the affidavit, the Times said, Grimsley told investigators Clemens and Pettitte "used athletic performance-enhancing drugs."

Houston teammate Lance Berkman said he would be startled to find either of the two pitchers involved, calling the matter "irresponsible" and "unfortunate."

"You just have to be very, very careful when you make accusations like that," he said. "You better be right about it."

DOJ_NMG_0073025

The affidavit also alleged Grimsley told federal agents that Roberts, Gibbons and Tejada, all with the Orioles, "took anabolic steroids."

"What can I do? I spent one morning last year with Grimsley," Tejada said Sunday from Boston. "I mean, I already got thrown under the bus with Palmeiro. No, I don't worry about that."

Rafael Palmeiro was suspended last season for using steroids and suggested the positive test may have been the result of a vitamin B-12 shot Tejada gave him. Tejada insisted he did nothing wrong.

Gibbons has said he has passed every test administered by baseball.

"I'm as shocked as anybody else," he said.

Roberts derided the accusations as "ridiculous."

"We've had steroid testing, and I've taken all the tests," he told The (Baltimore) Sun. "There is no point in getting into verbal wars."

Novitzky also was the lead investigator in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative probe. Two BALCO officials and Barry Bonds' personal trainer, Greg Anderson, served jail time after guilty pleas in that investigation.

Grimsley has complained to friends, the Times said, that federal agents attributed statements to him that he did not make.

Randy Hendricks, who represents Clemens and Pettitte, told The Associated Press he questions the conduct of the federal agents.

"I've grown weary of having to defend (Clemens) from innuendo and conjecture about every six months for the last several years when he's complied with all of the rules and regulations," Hendricks said. "Andy is just surprised and stunned, and has no knowledge of any such activity."

Atlanta Braves star Chipper Jones called Clemens and Pettitte "iconic figures" and is convinced of their innocence.

Giants manager Felipe Alou was asked how he thinks Clemens will be treated compared to Bonds.

"I've got to say, Rockets are hard to catch," he said. "I was shocked to see those names on television this morning. Some big names. I said, 'Here we go again.'"

Three O's Players Deny Steroid Use (WP)

By Amy Shipley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Clemens, Pettitte Also Rebut Grimsley

The Baltimore Orioles issued a statement of support yesterday for their three players accused of using anabolic steroids by a former major league pitcher as the players -- Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons -- denied the charges.

Houston Astros pitchers Roger Clemens and Andy Pettitte, who were accused of performance-enhancing drug use by former reliever Jason Grimsley in a federal affidavit, also rebutted the charges a day after the Los Angeles Times revealed the identities of the players Grimsley accused.

The players' names had been blacked out in the affidavit that was filed in federal court in May.

Grimsley, who played for the Orioles, New York Yankees, Arizona Diamondbacks and other teams, admitted in the search-warrant affidavit to using anabolic steroids, human growth hormone and amphetamines. In the affidavit, he also implicated six players and an athletic trainer whose names had been unconfirmed until the Times report.

After the affidavit became public, Grimsley was suspended for 50 games by Major League Baseball and released by the Diamondbacks.

Grimsley also named retired Oriole David Segui, who previously acknowledged that his name was among those in the document. Segui told ESPN in June that he had received a prescription for human growth hormone because of naturally low levels. The trainer was Brian McNamee, formerly a team trainer for the Yankees and now the personal trainer for Clemens and Pettitte, according to the Times.

Grimsley played with Tejada, Roberts and Gibbons in 2005 and Clemens and Pettitte in 1999 and 2000 when he was with the Yankees. The charges against Clemens have received particular emphasis because Clemens, 44, has become the sport's measuring stick for fitness, durability and toughness.

"I just think it's incredibly dangerous to sit out there and just throw names out there," Clemens said yesterday before the Astros played in Atlanta, according to the Associated Press. "I haven't seen [the report], nor do I need to see it."

"I've been tested plenty of times. My physicals I've taken, they have taken my blood work. I have passed every test. Again, I just find it amazing that you can throw anybody out there."

Pettitte said he had a "great relationship" with Grimsley and was "stunned" by the report, according to the AP.

"I've never used any drugs to enhance my performance in baseball," Pettitte said. "I don't know what else to say except to say it's embarrassing my name would be out there."

DOJ_NMG_0073026

Their agent, Randy Hendricks, noted that Grimsley has said through his attorney that he did not disclose names to federal investigators.

"Roger and Andy deny using performance enhancing drugs," Hendricks said in an e-mail. "Roger passed Olympic-standard blood testing for the World Baseball Classic this year. . . . He is a phenomenal baseball player who does not deserve to have his name bandied about in the public domain based upon an affidavit of an investigative agent to get a search warrant. Roger and Andy never worked out with Grimsley and Grimsley would have no personal knowledge of anything they did."

Grimsley said Clemens and Pettitte "used athletic performance-enhancing drugs" and Roberts, Gibbons and Tejada "took anabolic steroids," according to the affidavit signed by IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky, the Times reported. The newspaper said it was allowed to view the unredacted version by someone with "authorized access" to it.

"What can I do? I spent one morning last year with Grimsley," Tejada said yesterday before the Orioles played at Boston, according to the AP. "I mean, I already got thrown under the bus with [Rafael] Palmeiro. No, I don't worry about that."

The night before, Tejada told the Baltimore Sun: "I know that I've never had a problem with that. I know that I've never used that and I know I am clean."

Gibbons told the Sun he has never failed a drug test.

"And I am not going to dignify these claims and accusations with any further response," he said.

"Our players have addressed the accusations quite strongly and we support them," Orioles Vice President of Player Personnel Mike Flanagan said in a statement. "We have not seen the affidavit and therefore will not comment on it further."

US/Central Afghanistan Mulls Herbicide In Drug War (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

(AP) JALALABAD, Afghanistan With profits from this spring's record opium crop fueling a broad Taliban offensive, Afghan authorities say they are considering a once unthinkable way to deal with the scourge: spraying poppy fields with herbicide.

Afghans including President Hamid Karzai are deeply opposed to spraying the crop. After nearly three decades of war, Western science and assurances can do little to assuage their fears of chemicals being dropped from airplanes.

But U.S. officials in Kabul and Washington are pushing for it. And on Thursday the country's top drug enforcement official said he would contemplate spraying opium crops — even with airborne crop-dusters — if other efforts fail to cut the size of the coming year's crop.

"This year, we'll wait and see how it goes. Next year, the 2008 season, we will consider it," said Lt. Gen. Mohammed Daoud Daoud on the sidelines of an anti-poppy gathering in Jalalabad, the ancient and verdant capital of Nangahar province, once the heart of Afghanistan's poppy belt.

This year Nangahar was a success. Poppy cultivation stayed low amid a boom that saw Afghanistan produce 82 percent of the world's opium, providing for 90 percent of its heroin, according to U.S. and United Nations figures.

Opium eradication is one of the great failures of the five-year period since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. In 2000, under the Islamist Taliban government, Afghanistan produced virtually no opium.

Planting has skyrocketed since then, jumping 59 percent this year, enough to produce 6,700 tons of opium that fetched around $750 million for Afghan farmers and eventually sold for $50 billion on the street, mainly in Europe, according to a U.N. report.

Opium poppies have become Afghanistan's chief crop and economic mainstay even as Washington and Britain have pumped hundreds of millions of dollars into eradication schemes and complex efforts to create markets for legal crops.

In the meantime, drug money nourishes the insurgency. In the opium-rich southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, Taliban commanders protect growers in return for a 30 to 40 percent tax, which is spent to recruit fighters, experts in the region say.

Retired U.S. Gen. Barry McCaffrey, the Clinton administration drug czar, said crop dusters may be the only way to preserve Washington's project in Afghanistan, before drug profits undermine the country's elected government.

"We know exactly where these fields are. They're absolutely vulnerable to eradication. And it is immeasurably more effective to do it with an airplane," McCaffrey said by telephone from Virginia. "I've been telling the Pentagon, if you don't take on drug production you're going to get run out of Afghanistan."

But in Helmand, home to 42 percent of this year's crop, Daoud said it remains too dangerous to spray. A former mujahedeen commander, Daoud said the Taliban can down low-flying planes.

"They have rockets," the bearded general said, fingering a string of prayer beads. "We can't spray there."

U.S. and U.N. experts here say eradicating the drug from this Texas-sized country will take decades.

Inside Afghanistan, with just 150,000 opium users among its 30 million people, poppy eradication is seen as an outside issue. Two speakers at the counternarcotics conference here said it was more urgent to stop people drinking wine.

DOJ_NMG_0073027

"We want all drugs banned. Not only poppy," said provincial council chief Fazal Hadi Muslim Yar.

If Karzai approves herbicide, he risks losing the support of 3 million people involved in poppy growing. But without eradication, he could see his government undermined by drug-funded insurgents.

Karzai has said in the past that herbicides pose too big a risk for families and livestock, contaminating water and killing grapes, melons and vegetables grown alongside poppies. But the president approved Afghan eradication teams that used tractors to eliminate thousands of acres of poppies this year.

"Anywhere we eradicate a field, we must immediately provide the farmer with an alternative livelihood," Karzai spokesman Khaleeq Ahmad said on Saturday.

Aerial spraying is especially feared. Rumors have coursed through farm communities blaming sicknesses on secret poppy spraying, said Mohammed Nabi Hussaini, the head of Afghanistan's Poppy Eradication Program.

"There were diseases in children who ate apricots and parents said they saw helicopters nearby," Hussaini said. "But how long can we wait? The longer you wait the more it will get out of control."

McCaffrey said crop-dusting with common herbicides like Roundup was key in drug eradication programs that found success in Thailand and Peru.

Crop spraying is not the preferred option of the United Nations, but would be considered as part of a broad rural development program, U.N. spokesman Dan Norton said on Saturday.

Tens of thousands of Afghan farmers are now making crop decisions, weighing options between poppies and Afghanistan's robust vegetables and melons.

For now, the government counternarcotics campaign is friendly. Afghan government officials held a tent rally at the former winter palace in Jalalabad. With 200 turbaned elders and clerics listening, Daoud urged them to snuff out the illicit trade before it turned Afghanistan into a narco-state.

"Addiction will destroy the young generation that is Afghanistan's future," Daoud told the crowd. "Once you're addicted you're a burden to your family."

Across Afghanistan, tougher action is coming. Counternarcotics officials warned local leaders that they will be fired if cultivation rises.

Finally, Kabul officials drove the message home using the twin pillars of God and honor. Assadullah Sajid, an imam in a starched white tunic and long beard, pointed forcefully at the elders and policemen, invoking the Quran and warning them not to disgrace Nangahar.

"Last year our governor was honored because we didn't cultivate," Sajid said sternly. "Let's keep that honor."

Opium eradication is one of the great failures of the five-year period since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. In 2000, under the Islamist Taliban government, Afghanistan produced virtually no opium.

Opium poppies have become Afghanistan's chief crop and economic mainstay even as Washington and Britain have pumped hundreds of millions of dollars into eradication schemes and complex efforts to create markets for legal crops.

Councilman To Idaho Town: Get Your Guns (USAT)

By Gwen Florio

USA Today, October 2, 2006

The Town Council in Greenleaf, Idaho, is considering a recommendation that all households keep and maintain guns because of the crime that might come with the encroaching growth from nearby Boise.

To date, violent crime is nearly unheard of in Greenleaf, population 890, admits City Councilman Steve Jett, who proposed the ordinance the council will take up Tuesday. Even so, Jett says it's only a matter of time.

"The biggest thing I was looking at is preparation," Jett says.

When asked about violent crime in Greenleaf, which doesn't have its own police force, Albert Erickson, police chief of neighboring Wilder, says, "I don't remember any."

Erickson, whose department covers Greenleaf, finally recalled a domestic-violence complaint there last year. "But I don't even know that it went to court."

Boise is not exactly a hotbed of violence. Its violent crime rate last year was 383 per 100,000 people, below the national average of 469 but higher than Idaho's rate of 257 per 100,000, according to the FBI Uniform Crime Report.

Greenleaf's proposal is not surprising, especially in the West, says David Kopel of the Denver-based Independence Institute, a free-market think tank.

Kopel, author of The Samurai, the Mountie, and the Cowboy: Should America Adopt the Gun Controls of Other Democracies?, ranks Montana as the state with the strongest gun rights, closely followed by Idaho and Wyoming.

"These laws are more suggestive of culture and attitude than a real attempt to arm everybody," says Gary Marbut, president of the Montana Shooting Sports Association.

The Montana Legislature routinely considers resolutions urging residents to own guns. Aumsville, Ore., considered, but rejected, an ordinance similar to Greenleaf's proposal in 2001, a year after the tiny southern Utah town of Virgin passed one.

In a nod to Greenleaf's Quaker roots — it takes its name from Quaker abolitionist and poet John Greenleaf Whittier — Jett says his proposal is merely a recommendation, not a requirement like Virgin's. The wording exempts convicted felons, others prohibited from owning guns and those who object to gun ownership.

The ordinance is modeled on a 1982 law in Kennesaw, Ga., a town that, like Greenleaf, found itself becoming a suburb to a sprawling state capital. "It was basically the law heard 'round the world," says Kennesaw Mayor Leonard Church. He says he has received inquiries from as far away as Australia about Kennesaw's measure.

Although the law is largely a formality — "We don't go door to door, saying, 'Show me your gun' " — Church says studies show enactment of the law coincides with a marked drop in burglaries and violent crime.

Peter Hamm, spokesman for the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, says the group doesn't oppose Greenleaf's proposal.

"There aren't too many rural towns in Idaho where everybody doesn't already have a gun," he says. "And we fully support the right of law-abiding citizens … to own a firearm for self-defense, or hunting, or sporting purposes."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration In Herndon (WP)

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

CONGRESS LEFT town having failed to pass the comprehensive reform of immigration laws that President Bush claimed to want but didn't do much to promote at crunchtime. The failure leaves millions of illegal immigrants sought after by U.S. employers but with no path to legal status. The nation wants and needs their labor but can't bring itself to deal honestly with the situation. Among the victims of this hypocrisy and gridlock on the national level are the nation's local governments, which are left with little guidance in handling the challenges posed by rapid immigration.

You can get an early sense of how this increasingly will play out in Northern Virginia's town of Herndon, which is back in the news with more ideas on how to clamp down on illegal immigrants. The proposals are small-minded and, if enacted, are likely to be futile in resolving any problems. But we understand local officials' frustration with the federal government's inability to craft an immigration policy for the country.

Herndon is proposing to train local police to enforce federal immigration laws and to place new restrictions on businesses. Anyone seeking a business license would have to prove valid immigration status, and anyone wanting to do business with the town would have to show that workers for the business are in the country legally.

The new initiatives are, as one official conceded, an effort to just do something. But, toward what end, and at what cost? The business proposals duplicate existing laws. Letting the police officer on the corner take over the federal role in the complex world of immigration law could lead to heartbreaking mistakes and unintended consequences. People who look "foreign" to one police officer or another might become targets for unfair scrutiny. Many law enforcement authorities fear that such policies will chill relations with immigrant communities and, as a result, more serious crimes will go unreported and unsolved.

Officials in Herndon say they are still in the early stages of studying their proposals; let's hope that, instead of the emotion that shaped much of last year's debate on day laborers, a more analytical and reasoned examination will be undertaken. Congress would do well to take the same advice.

TAX:

Income Tax Cuts Benefit All Payers (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, October 2, 2006

Americans of every income have benefited from a drop in federal income tax rates as Bush administration tax cuts enacted since 2000 took effect, an independent analysis of newly released IRS data shows.

But those earning $75,000 to $500,000 are shouldering a larger share of total taxes paid as millions more of them earn higher incomes and get hit with the Alternative Minimum Tax, the analysis also found.

The review by the Tax Foundation, a non-partisan research group that favors low taxes, provides one of the first detailed looks at the impact of federal tax changes phased in between 2000 and 2004.

Alluding to the political debate that often surrounds tax issues, Gerald Prante, a Tax Foundation economist, said, “It is true that in dollar amounts the rich have gained the most. But everybody's tax rates have fallen.”

The analysis showed, for example, that a taxpayer who earned $35,000 in 2000 would have paid 8.54% of that income — $2,989 after credits — in federal taxes. In 2004, federal taxes would have accounted for 5.12% of that taxpayer's annual income, or $1,792. That represents a 40% decrease in tax burden.

At the higher end of the income brackets, a $1.75 million earner would have paid $513,625 in 2000 federal taxes, when the rate for that earning bracket was 29.35%. Four years later, when the rate dropped to 25%, that earner would have paid $437,500. That represents a 14.8% cut in tax burden, the analysis shows.

Millions of upper-middle and moderately high-income earners also benefited from tax rate cuts. But the analysis shows their savings was limited by the Alternative Minimum Tax, which eliminates some deductions and credits they could otherwise claim on federal tax returns. The levy particularly hits those whose high state and local taxes become ineligible for federal tax deductions.

For instance, taxpayers who earned between $100,000 and $200,000 in 2004 paid 22.5% of all federal taxes, up from 19.4% four years earlier. Those who earned between $200,000 and $500,000 in 2004 paid 17.9% of all federal taxes, up from 15.4% in 2000, the analysis showed.

Prante said the federal government “cut ordinary income tax rates but left AMT alone. So the middle range (of taxpayers) ended up getting less of a reduction.”

The Tax Foundation also found that:

·Millions of lower-income Americans — those earning $25,000 annually or less — have been taken off the federal tax rolls. In 2000, roughly 29 million tax returns had no federal tax owed. Four years later, the number rose to about 43 million returns.

The increase resulted from the doubling of the child tax credit from $500 to $1,000, as well as the Earned Income Tax Credit, a federal benefit program for low-income workers.

·Income for the highest-earning Americans dropped sharply from 2000 to 2002, following the end of the bull stock market of the late 1990s, then grew rapidly from 2002 to 2004 as the economy recovered.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Reconfigured Supreme Court Takes Up Cases (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073030

WASHINGTON — Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., President Bush's two appointees, will have a chance to shift the law to the right on two charged issues — abortion and race — during the Supreme Court term that starts today.

The court will decide whether doctors can be prosecuted for using an abortion procedure that critics have labeled "partial-birth abortion." And it will rule on whether school boards can maintain integrated schools by assigning some students based on their race.

In the past, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor provided the fifth vote for majority rulings that struck down abortion regulations and allowed schools and colleges to use affirmative action. Now that O'Connor has been succeeded by Alito, the balance may tip the other way.

The session will also see the court take up global warming for the first time. Environmentalists are asking the justices to force the Bush administration to limit vehicle emissions believed to contribute to climate change.

Business lawyers and consumer advocates are closely watching another case involving cigarette maker Philip Morris to see whether the high court will strictly limit "punitive" damage verdicts against corporations.

And California's system for sentencing criminals is under attack. In recent years, the high court has said juries, not judges, should decide the key facts that call for longer prison terms.

In California, a judge may impose a longer prison term if certain "aggravating factors" are found.

If the court declares this sentencing system unconstitutional, thousands of state inmates could win the right to have their sentences reconsidered.

Abortion remains the most divisive issue before the court.

Until now, a 5-4 majority has held to the view that the government may not regulate abortion in a way that threatens the life or health of pregnant women.

Relying on that principle, the court six years ago struck down a Nebraska law that made it a crime for doctors to use a second-trimester surgical procedure that critics call "partial-birth abortion."

Some physicians, including litigant Dr. Leroy Carhart of Bellevue, Neb., seek to remove the fetus intact before cutting its umbilical cord. This procedure, known as D&X, for dilation and extraction, carries less risk of bleeding and infection than other procedures, the doctor maintains.

The high court, in a 5-4 decision upholding the practice, agreed with him in Stenberg vs. Carhart, saying that "significant medical authority supports the proposition that, in some circumstances, the D&X procedure would be the safest procedure."

The dissenters called the procedure "gruesome" and "horrific" and said it bore "a strong resemblance to infanticide."

Afterward, Congress passed the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, and President Bush signed it into law in 2003. Contradicting the court's conclusion, lawmakers said the disputed procedure was "never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother."

Judges in Omaha and San Francisco conducted trials and heard testimony from leading medical experts.

Both concluded that the disputed D&X procedure was a variant on the standard dilation and evacuation method of abortion at this stage of pregnancy. And both agreed with medical experts who said it was often safer.

"This is a medical matter, and the court has never deferred to Congress on a medical issue like this," said Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights, which is representing Carhart.

But U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said Congress' conclusion that the D&X procedure was not needed to protect women was "entitled to great deference."

The oral argument in Gonzales vs. Carhart is set for Nov. 8, the day after the elections.

The high court has also been closely split on race and affirmative action.

Three years ago, with O'Connor speaking for a 5-4 majority, the court ruled that colleges and universities may consider race in the admissions process to bring more diversity to the student body.

But the court's conservatives say schools and colleges should not treat students differently because of race, regardless of the reason.

The court agreed to hear a challenge to public school integration policies in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., that sometimes lead to children being barred from certain schools because of their race.

In Louisville, officials said at least 15%, and no more than 50%, of a school's students had to be black. The parent of a white child sued when her son was turned away from the school nearest her home.

Bush administration lawyers joined the case on the side of the parents and argue that "racial balancing" is unconstitutional. However, school officials say that because housing is segregated in many cities, they need to use race-based guidelines to maintain integrated schools.

DOJ_NMG_0073031

If the guidelines in Seattle and Louisville are struck down, the ruling could affect several California districts. Last year, the Los Angeles Unified School District was sued by the Pacific Legal Foundation for using race as an enrollment factor in its magnet schools.

College officials will also be watching the outcome. A ruling striking down school integration policies will be seen as a signal that college affirmative-action policies are in danger as well.

The schools case will be heard Dec. 4.

The global warming case tests whether a coalition of states can force the Bush administration to take action against greenhouse gases.

This dispute, to be heard Nov. 29, turns on the words of the Clean Air Act, which says the Environmental Protection Agency must take steps to limit "any air pollutant" coming from cars and trucks that could "endanger public health or welfare," including changes in the climate or weather.

The EPA administrator refused to adopt new emissions standards for motor vehicles.

The agency's experts said that greenhouse gases such as carbon dioxide were not true air pollutants.

A dozen states — California, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington — sued the EPA.

The court's decision could also determine the fate of California's newly adopted rules for cleaner vehicles to be sold in the state beginning in 2009. Those pending rules are also being challenged in lawsuits brought by the automakers.

"It will help California a lot if the court says carbon dioxide is an air pollutant," said UCLA law professor Ann Carlson, an expert on environmental law.

"It's also very significant if the states and environmentalists can force action on this issue when the administration is recalcitrant."

The punitive-damages case, which will come up Oct. 31, tests whether juries, acting on a single claim, can punish companies for wrongful behavior that may have hurt tens of thousands of people.

After Jesse Williams, a lifelong smoker, died of lung cancer in Oregon, his wife sued Philip Morris for fraud. A jury awarded her $21,000 in compensation for his death and $800,000 for pain and suffering. Then, to punish Philip Morris for concealing the dangers of smoking, it added nearly $80 million in punitive damages.

The Supreme Court has been searching for a way to limit these punitive awards, and three years ago said they rarely should "exceed a single-digit ratio between punitive and compensatory damages."

WASHINGTON — In the session that begins today, the Supreme Court is scheduled to consider a number of cases on hot-button issues, among them abortion and school integration.

Question: Can Congress outlaw a midterm abortion procedure referred to by opponents as "partial-birth" abortion?

Answer: Six years ago, the court on a 5-4 vote struck down a similar state ban on the grounds that it could threaten the health of some pregnant women. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, now retired, was in the majority, and she has been replaced by President Bush's appointee Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. (Gonzales vs. Carhart and Gonzales vs. Planned Parenthood)

Q: Can school districts maintain a racial balance in schools by limiting the percentage of white and black students, or does this use of race violate the rights of students who are excluded?

A: Lawyers challenging the integration guidelines used in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky., say any such use of race is unconstitutional. (Parents Involved in Community Schools vs. Seattle School District and Meredith vs. Jefferson County Board of Education)

Q: Can the Bush administration refuse to regulate the emissions of cars and power plants that are blamed for global warming, or does the Clean Air Act require the government to restrict such pollutants?

A: The court will hear an appeal from lawyers for Massachusetts, California and 10 other states that have demanded that the Environmental Protection Agency take action. (Massachusetts vs. EPA)

Q: Can juries award millions of dollars to a single plaintiff to punish a company for a pattern of wrongdoing?

A: An Oregon jury awarded $80 million in damages to the family of a longtime smoker who died of lung cancer. The Supreme Court has been searching for a limit on such punitive damages. (Philip Morris vs. Williams)

Q: Are immigrants convicted of drug possession subject to deportation under a strict federal law?

A: The 1996 law says immigrants who commit an "aggravated felony" are to be deported, and the government says low-level drug crimes are felonies. (Lopez vs. Gonzales, Gonzales vs. Duenas-Alvarez)

Q: Is California's system of sentencing criminals unconstitutional because it lets a judge increase a defendant's term based on "aggravating factors"?

A: In several recent rulings, the court has said juries, not judges, should decide the factors that call for longer sentences. (Cunningham vs. California)

For Supreme Court's New Term: Rise Of A New Centrist (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

Abortion regulations and race-based public school enrollment plans are among major national issues at the US Supreme Court this year in a term that offers the first real insight into the constitutional vision of the high court under Chief Justice John Roberts.

Constitutional scholars and other analysts are watching closely to see if respect for legal precedent - the principle of stare decisis - emerges as a defining approach, or whether the Roberts court will seek to build on the conservative agenda of the Rehnquist court, with sweeping rulings that erode or erase liberal precedents.

A major factor in the direction of the court, whose 2006-2007 term begins Monday, is Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is emerging as a primary centrist power on the court following the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Analysts say he may provide the swing vote in several key cases.

"The absence of Justice O'Connor will be one of the most fundamental changes the court has seen," former acting solicitor general and Duke Law School Professor Walter Dellinger told reporters in a recent preterm briefing.

"It is difficult to overstate the significance of that shift," said former solicitor general and Pepperdine Law School Dean Kenneth Starr, in the same briefing. "All eyes will be on Kennedy."

Justice Kennedy's new judicial clout will be on full display in both the race and abortion cases. Similar cases were decided by 5-4 majorities in recent years with Justice O'Connor joining the court's four liberal justices. In contrast, Kennedy dissented in both cases.

Last term was a year of historic transition for the court with the passing of Chief Justice William Rehnquist and the retirement of O'Connor. It marked the arrival of Mr. Roberts as chief justice and Samuel Alito as an associate justice.

The change in the high court's roster is expected to swing the balance of power to the right, possibly overturning legal precedents on a range of hot-button issues, including both the abortion and race cases, analysts say.

Although it is not clear how Roberts and Justice Alito will vote in these cases, many analysts suggest they are likely to align with the court's conservative wing and that Kennedy will be in position to provide the decisive fifth vote. Partial-birth abortion is key case

At issue in the abortion case is the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. The law was passed by the Republican-controlled Congress in open defiance of an earlier Supreme Court ruling that so-called partial-birth abortions could not be banned by states unless lawmakers provided an exception in cases where a woman's health might be threatened by the unavailability of the banned procedure.

Congress swept aside the court-imposed requirement by declaring in its law that there were no circumstances when a partial-birth abortion might be medically necessary. If no circumstances exist, lawmakers concluded, there is no need for a health exception. That Congressional finding disregards the testimony of some medical experts who say the procedure can be necessary in certain cases.

One key issue in the case is whether the high court should defer to Congress on what is medically necessary or set the standard itself.

Three district courts and three federal appeals courts have struck down the 2003 statute, ruling that it is unconstitutional because it fails to provide a health exception as required by the Supreme Court.

Despite universal defeat in the lower courts, supporters of the law hope that O'Connor's retirement and Alito's arrival may have tipped the balance of power on the issue.

In 2000, the Supreme Court struck down a Nebraska law nearly identical to the federal law by a 5-4 vote. Justice Kennedy wrote one of the most impassioned dissents of his 18 years on the court. "The majority views the procedures from the perspective of the abortionist, rather than from the perspective of a society shocked when confronted with a new method of ending human life," he wrote. He stressed in his dissent that he opposed "the decision, the reasoning, and the judgment." Will Kennedy stick to precedent?

With the possibility of the court divided 4-4 on the issue, Kennedy may wield the decisive vote. If he sticks to the analysis in his dissent in the Nebraska case, court watchers say the law will be upheld. If he adheres to his strongly held belief in stare decisis - affirming precedent even when a justice disagrees with it - the federal law will be struck down.

But Kennedy's dissent in the Nebraska case suggests another possibility. In 1992, Kennedy helped author a major abortion decision, Planned Parenthood v. Casey, which reaffirmed the central holding in Roe v. Wade that established a woman's right to choose to have an abortion. Part of Kennedy's contribution to the Casey decision was a guarantee that the states could regulate abortion procedures provided the regulations didn't create a substantial obstacle to obtaining an abortion. In his dissent in the Nebraska partial-birth abortion case, Kennedy complained that the five-justice majority swept aside the guarantee he apparently wrote into the Casey opinion.

Now, six years later, Kennedy could uphold the 2003 federal law under the theory that the same leeway guaranteed to state lawmakers in the 1992 Casey decision also exists for federal lawmakers. In effect, he would be applying stare decisis to his interpretation of Casey - an interpretation that would undercut the Nebraska ruling as being an unfaithful application of the 1992 Casey precedent. One complicating factor to this scenario, however, is Justice Antonin Scalia's insistence that the Casey abortion precedent (and Roe) must be overruled.

That's not the only complication. A federal abortion regulation runs counter to Kennedy's view of states' rights and federalism. Medical care is generally an area left to state regulation, not federal micromanaging. And some analysts question whether Congress has the power under the Commerce Clause to impose a national ban on a medical procedure that many states wish to retain.

The court will hear arguments on the partial-birth abortion issue on Nov. 8.

Kennedy may cast the deciding vote in the other potential megacase of the term. It involves race-based enrollment plans that seek to maintain integrated public schools in Seattle and Louisville.

The programs are aimed at balancing the racial composition of public schools by excluding whites and admitting blacks to white-majority schools and excluding blacks and admitting whites to black-majority schools.

Parents who want their children to attend their neighborhood school sued, claiming the programs violate the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment by using race to determine who can and who cannot attend certain schools.

The same 5-4 split that some analysts say may decide the partial-birth abortion case could also determine the school race cases. In 2003, the court upheld an affirmative action plan at the University of Michigan Law School. The justices split 4-4 on the issue, with O'Connor casting the deciding fifth vote.

Now Kennedy, who dissented in the Michigan case, could reverse or limit that 2003 holding by casting the deciding vote in the Seattle and Louisville cases.

The court's new term also includes a case examining the scope of government regulation to fight global warming, and a legal issue of keen interest to the business community - whether large punitive damage awards violate the Constitution's due process requirements. Key issues for the Supreme Court's new term

Abortion: Is the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003 unconstitutional because it lacks an exception in instances where the procedure is deemed medically necessary to protect a woman's health? Or should the courts defer to Congress's determination that the procedure is never necessary?

Race: Do race-based student enrollment plans in public schools in Seattle and Louisville violate the constitutional requirement of equal protection? Or are they justifiable efforts to achieve a better mix of black and white students in certain schools?

Federal regulation: Can the Environmental Protection Agency be forced by a group of environmentalists and certain states to regulate greenhouse gases emitted from motor vehicles and shown to contribute to global warming?

Punitive damages: Does a jury verdict ordering the Philip Morris tobacco company to pay $79.5 million in punitive damages to the widow of a former chain smoker violate constitutional guarantees of due process?

Free speech: Do unions have a First Amendment right to spend fees collected from nonunion members on partisan political campaigns when the nonmembers have not given their consent?

Criminal law: Should a 2004 landmark Supreme Court decision barring the introduction as evidence of out-of-court "testimonial" statements be applied retroactively in cases where defendants were not given an opportunity to cross-examine those witnesses?

Criminal law: Should another 2004 major Supreme Court decision be applied retroactively in cases where judges used evidence never presented to a jury to enhance a convicted criminal's sentence?

Federalism: Do state governments or the federal government have power to regulate state-chartered companies (like mortgage firms) that are subsidiaries of national banks?

Roberts Court May Be Defined In Second Term (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — If Year 1 was the transition for the new Roberts court, Year 2 is likely to be the test.

DOJ_NMG_0073034

During the first term under the leadership of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., the justices were able to find common ground with some regularity by agreeing not to decide much. By the time the term ended in late June, the extent to which the members of the newly configured court were prepared to confront either precedent or one another remained unclear.

Chances are high that the new term, which begins on Monday, will be different. The cases that the court has agreed to decide — 38 so far — offer few off-ramps, requiring instead that the justices proceed to rulings that will define the new court in both substance and style.

Less than six weeks from now, for example, the court will hear the Bush administration's defense of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003. While there are some secondary issues, there is no escaping the fact that at the end of the day, the Supreme Court will have to declare whether the federal statute is constitutional. In doing so, it will have to grapple with the meaning of a 5-to-4 decision that struck down a similar state law six years ago. The administration will argue that if the federal statute cannot coexist with that precedent, the court should overrule the earlier case.

Two cases on whether public school systems can take race into account in maintaining balance in individual schools do not confront the court's precedents quite as directly. But coming only three years after a sharply divided court permitted the continued use of race in university admissions, the decisions in these cases will provide the first clear indication of where the center now lies on questions of race and public policy after the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Justice O'Connor held the balance of power on such questions for years, and wrote the opinion three years ago in the case from the University of Michigan Law School.

The business community is watching several cases closely, particularly an appeal of a $79.5 million award of punitive damages against the cigarette maker Philip Morris, upheld by the Oregon Supreme Court on behalf of the family of a smoker who died of lung cancer.

Of all the areas of Supreme Court doctrine most likely to be affected by the court's change in membership, punitive damages ranks high on the list. It is also something of a wild card, because the question of whether the constitutional guarantee of due process places any substantive limits on the award of punitive damages by state courts has divided the court in a way that follows no ideological pattern, and the inclinations of the new justices are unknown.

The consistent dissenters from the court's effort to curb punitive damages have been Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice O'Connor were in the majority in seeking to limit punitive damages. If their successors, Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., agree with the dissenters, the court's shift could be abruptly and bitterly disappointing to those encouraged by the court's halting but increasingly assertive steps in setting boundaries on punitive damages.

The new chief justice has made some notable administrative choices since the last term ended. As his administrative assistant, he hired Jeffrey P. Minear, a senior lawyer in the office of the solicitor general and a longtime familiar figure at the court.

The title of administrative assistant understates the role its holder plays in the day-to-day management of the court. Previous administrative assistants have come from a variety of backgrounds; Chief Justice Rehnquist's last assistant, Sally M. Rider, had held several top-level positions as a government lawyer. But none has ever been the chief justice's professional peer, as Mr. Minear clearly is. His 56 Supreme Court arguments, in fact, surpass Chief Justice Roberts's 39. Both men are the same age, 51.

In another development, the court has revised its practice of waiting two or three weeks to post argument transcripts on its Web site. Beginning on Tuesday (in observance of Yom Kippur, the court has scheduled no arguments on Monday), the court will post transcripts on the day of argument at www.supremecourtus .gov. While the court continues to resist television coverage of its sessions, the change is a step toward public access that would have been unthinkable only a few years ago.

These are some of the leading issues for the new term:

Abortion Rights

Two federal appeals courts, in St. Louis and San Francisco, declared the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003 unconstitutional, basing their rulings on the Supreme Court's decision in Stenberg v. Carhart, which struck down Nebraska's similar law six years ago. The new cases, Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380, and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382, are the Bush administration's appeals of those rulings.

The statute outlaws a surgical procedure that doctors use to perform abortions after about 12 weeks of pregnancy. In its decision six years ago, the Supreme Court held by a vote of 5 to 4 that the law had to take into account medical judgments that the procedure was sometimes necessary for a pregnant woman's health.

Congress responded by enacting a federal law without a health exception, declaring that the procedure was never necessary to protect a pregnant woman's health. Among other issues, the new cases therefore present the issue of the respective roles of Congress and the court in defining the scope of constitutional rights, an issue on which Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a dissenter in the case six years ago, has been particularly protective of the court's role.

Racial Quotas in Schools

Federal appeals courts upheld student assignment plans in Louisville, Ky. (Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915) and Seattle (Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1, No. 05-908). Both cities have long struggled to achieve integration, and now seek to maintain it by taking race into account in limiting students' choices of which schools to attend.

While many justices are wary of "this divvying us up by race," as Chief Justice Roberts phrased it in a voting rights case last term, the same justices also tend to support local education policies. The National School Boards Association is filing a brief supporting the school systems, while the Bush administration is arguing that the assignment plans are unconstitutional.

Punitive Damages Limits

The court has laid down various markers for curbing the discretion of state court systems to award punitive damages. In Philip Morris USA v. William, No. 05-1296, the Oregon Supreme Court upheld the $79.5 million award, nearly 100 times the compensatory damages a jury had awarded the smoker's widow.

This is far greater than the 10-to-1 ratio that the court's most recent decision, State Farm v. Campbell in 2003, suggested as the outer limit of due process. On the other hand, earlier cases concerned economic rather than physical injuries. The court's new membership aside, this case is sufficiently distinctive in several ways so as to make the outcome unpredictable.

Air Pollution Regulation

Two cases present interpretive issues under the Clean Air Act. In Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency, No. 05-1120, 16 states and other parties are challenging the Bush administration's view that Congress has not authorized federal regulation of motor vehicle emissions that contribute to global warming. The question in Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy Corporation, No. 05-848, is what the law requires of utility companies seeking to modernize aging power plants.

Court Ruling Fuels Dispute In West Over Eminent Domain (WP)

By Blaine Harden And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

SEATTLE -- Libertarians and land developers have found populist fodder in a contentious Supreme Court decision from last year that favors eminent domain over private property.

This fall, they are trying to harness anger over the ruling in an effort to pass state initiatives in the West and federal legislation that could unravel a long-standing fabric of state and local land-use regulations. Among other things, the rules control growth, limit sprawl, ensure open space and protect the environment.

The property-rights movement, as it is known, has a major new benefactor -- Howard Rich, a wealthy libertarian real estate investor from Manhattan. He has spent millions -- estimates run as high as $11 million -- to support initiatives that will appear on ballots throughout much of the West.

The initiatives -- and legislation approved Friday in the House -- have alarmed many city and state officials, along with environmental organizations, budget watchdog groups and smart-growth advocates. They complain about "bait-and-switch" tactics.

"They bait you with eminent domain, but you end up voting to destroy all land-use regulation," said Elaine Clegg, a nonpartisan member of the city council in Boise, Idaho.

Following the lead of an Oregon initiative that in 2004 derailed the nation's strongest laws against sprawl, measures this November aim to do much the same thing in Idaho, Arizona, California and Washington. They would compel state and local governments to pay cash to property owners when land-use rules, such as zoning regulations, reduce the value of their land. Some of the measures say that if government can't pay up, owners can develop their land as they see fit.

In Oregon, there is no money to pay claims that total $5.6 billion, so land-use rules are being waived. In Washington, passage of a "pay-or-waive" initiative could cost state taxpayers $7 billion to $8 billion in the next few years, according to studies by the state and the University of Washington. In California, where there is no provision to waive payment, Proposition 90 has aroused opposition from staunchly conservative groups such as the California Taxpayers Association, which is concerned that the initiative could cost the state billions of dollars, triggering tax increases and slow growth.

The federal bill, which was approved in the House by a vote of 231 to 181, would revamp land-use regulation nationwide, allowing developers and property owners to challenge local and state rulings in federal court, rather than in state court.

The National Association of Home Builders has been pushing the measure for years, but the Supreme Court's eminent-domain decision finally "brought the bill back into the limelight," said Jerry Howard, the association's chief executive.

DOJ_NMG_0073036

The bill's author, Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio), who chairs the Judiciary subcommittee on the Constitution, said property-rights disputes that can drag on for years deserve speedy resolution in federal court.

"The Fifth Amendment says you can't take a person's property without due process," he said, comparing property rights with freedom of speech and freedom of religion.

Opponents of the bill, including 36 attorneys general and a slew of environmental advocates, say the measure will undermine state and local governments' ability to oversee growth and preserve open space.

In Idaho, a measure called Proposition 2 would halt eminent-domain seizures of the kind allowed by the Supreme Court in 2005 in Kelo v. New London . That ruling upheld the right of local governments to condemn private property and then hand it over to someone else for commercial development. Since Kelo , 26 states have passed laws that ban the use of eminent domain for economic development purposes.

But the Idaho initiative, as with others in the West, is about much more than just eminent domain. It would require state and local governments to compensate landowners for regulations that restrict what they can do with their land.

About three-fourths of the more than $330,000 spent to put Proposition 2 on the ballot came from groups funded by Rich, in a pattern of spending that has been repeated in many Western states.

Groups bankrolled by Rich have this year spent about $11 million in 12 states in support of measures to restrict land-use planning, cap state spending or limit judicial power, according to state campaign finance reports compiled by the Ballot Initiative Strategy Center, a Washington-based group that is supported by labor.

Rich was not available to comment on his spending or the goals of his property-rights groups.

John Tillman, president of one of those groups, Americans for Limited Government, declined in an e-mail to comment on the amount of Rich's spending, saying that campaign finance reports "speak for themselves." He did not dispute the $11 million figure.

Tillman did note that the Supreme Court decision in Kelo has alarmed the public, putting "everyone on notice that property rights are on shaky ground and that the time to act is now."

In some states, grass-roots opposition to land-use rules existed well before Kelo and before Rich began spending money. For the past 15 years in Washington state, the Washington Farm Bureau has fought laws that limit what some farmers can do with their land in heavily populated places such as King County, which includes Seattle.

In Oregon, which had been a national leader in land-use planning, the consequences of rolling back the rules are becoming clear. At last count, there were 3,038 claims by property owners involving more than 173,000 acres, according to a tally kept by Portland State University. Of the 2,630 claims that have been decided, 90 percent have gone in favor of landowners, with state and local governments waiving land-use rules. Most of the claims come from owners of what had been protected farm and forest land bordering fast-growing urban areas.

"The agenda behind these initiatives is to make it so expensive for local and state governments to regulate land use that they can hardly function at all," said John Echeverria, executive director of the Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute.

In recent weeks, courts in Nevada and Montana have knocked some initiatives off ballots. The Nevada ruling was on technical grounds, but a state judge in Great Falls, Mont., found "a pervasive and general pattern of fraud" in the gathering of signatures for three ballot measures aimed at reining in government power.

"A number of paid out-of-state signature gatherers used bait-and-switch tactics to fraudulently induce countless Montanans to sign petitions other than the petitions they thought they were signing," wrote Judge Dirk M. Sandefur.

The ruling has been appealed to the Montana Supreme Court. Nearly all of the money for signature gatherers came from Montanans in Action, which declines to reveal its donors.

Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer (D) has said that Rich is bankrolling the measures and has challenged him to debate their merits. Rich has not responded to this request nor to a similar debate offer from Gov. Ted Kulongoski (D) of Oregon, where Rich's money has been instrumental in putting a spending-cap initiative on the ballot.

Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! (TIME)

Time, October 2, 2006

Counsel, sharpen your legal arguments. The Supreme Court returns for its new term this week, and it's expected to be a corker. This will be the court's first full term with Samuel Alito in Sandra Day O'Connor's old seat. And on the docket are a raft of high-profile cases on hot-button issues that should give the best indication yet of the decision-making dynamics and working style of the John Roberts era. Here's a look at what to expect.

1 UNANIMITY IS JOHN ROBERTS' GOAL

DOJ_NMG_0073037

During Chief Justice Roberts' honeymoon term, about half the court's decisions were unanimous--nearly double the typical tally in recent years. This term, big cases on divisive social issues mean Roberts is likely to struggle to build such consensus. Still, he'll try in order to boost the court's "stature and legitimacy," he said in July. When the court can choose either a narrow but unanimous ruling or a sweeping, landmark decision by a 5-4 vote, he said, "I think it's better to decide on the former ground, and let it go at that."

2 ANTHONY KENNEDY, THE SWING JUSTICE

With Sandra Day O'Connor retired and his colleagues evenly divided, centrist Kennedy is the likely swing vote in tight cases. He began to play the role last term--with characteristic moderation. He sided with conservatives to limit the reach of the Clean Water Act but voted with the liberals to declare unconstitutional the Bush Administration plan to try alleged terrorists before military tribunals.

3 FLASHPOINT NO. 1: ABORTION

Watch for Kennedy's leanings in November, when the court hears arguments on the constitutionality of the 2003 federal ban on dilation-and-extraction (a.k.a. partial-birth) abortions. In 2000, when the court struck down a similar ban enacted by Nebraska, Kennedy voted with the minority. This time the question is whether he'll be swayed more by his aversion to abortion or his respect for precedent.

4 FLASHPOINT NO. 2: AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

In December, the court will wrestle with whether race can be used to assign pupils to public elementary and secondary schools. White parents from Louisville, Ky., and Seattle, backed by the Bush Administration, argue that using race as a deciding factor violates the constitutional right to equal protection. The most recent precedent: 2003, when the court ruled 5-4 that race could be used as a factor in admissions to public universities. Kennedy, who dissented in that case, could swing the decision the other way now.

Whose Court Is It Anyway? (NYT)

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

The Roberts court officially began last year, but the term that starts this week should give the first clear picture of what kind of court it will be. The docket includes major cases involving abortion, affirmative action and the environment.

The justices in the Supreme Court's now solidly conservative majority will be given a chance to prove what sort of conservatives they intend to be: those who issue rulings to match their personal ideology, or those who want to keep the court on a steady path by respecting precedent.

The cases that have so far attracted the most attention are a pair of challenges to a federal law that criminalizes so-called partial birth abortions. The law, passed by Congress in 2003, does not have an exception for procedures necessary to protect the health of a pregnant woman. The court struck down a nearly identical ban in 2000 by the State of Nebraska. That ruling was 5 to 4, and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor — the court's perennial swing vote before she retired — sided with the majority.

The "partial birth" cases should reveal a lot about the views of Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. If they are as hostile to abortion rights as many court watchers believe, there may now be five votes in favor of the ban, which could outlaw many second-trimester abortions and endanger the lives of women.

But if they are true to the statements they made at their confirmation hearings about respecting precedent, they should not want to reverse a decision the court made on this subject as recently as 2000.

The court has also agreed to hear a pair of challenges to admissions policies at K-12 public schools in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., that take race into account to promote diversity. These cases revisit many issues the court considered in 2003, when it upheld the University of Michigan's use of race in law school admissions. That was another 5-to-4 decision with Justice O'Connor casting the deciding vote. That ruling was right to say that schools should be able to take race into account, and the court should not change its stance now — opening the door to even more challenges to affirmative action.

Among the other important cases the court will hear is one about global warming. A group of states and environmental organizations have sued the Environmental Protection Agency for failing to do its duty under the Clean Air Act to regulate new cars' emission of carbon dioxide and other pollutants. The court can and should prod the Bush administration to do more to protect the earth from the buildup of greenhouse gases, by requiring it to enforce the law that Congress passed.

If Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito turn out to be conservatives with a deep respect for precedent, the court is likely to remain fairly centrist. But the biggest factor is likely to be Justice Anthony Kennedy, who began last term to fill Justice O'Connor's role as a voice of moderation. We hope he continues to do so.

Dues On The Docket (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073038

It's no secret that the political power and influence of U.S. public-employee unions derives from their ability to collect mandatory dues. But the issue of whether these forced dues can be used for political activities without explicit permission to do so from workers could use some legal clarification.

That might happen now that the Supreme Court has agreed to hear an appeal from the state of Washington, where even nonmembers of unions can be compelled to pay collective-bargaining dues as a condition of employment. In 1992 Washington voters overwhelmingly approved a so-called "paycheck protection" initiative that forbade unions from using compulsory fees of nonmembers for political purposes without their consent.

Nevertheless, the state teachers union, the Washington Education Association, continued to spend dues money on politics without permission, finally prompting a lawsuit from then-Attorney General Christine Gregoire in 2000. The state won that case, but the union ultimately appealed to the state supreme court, where it argued that the paycheck protection law was unconstitutional and the court agreed.

In its March decision striking down the law, the state court said that requiring consent to spend dues on political programs is "too heavy an administrative burden" for unions. The court also held, strangely, that the opt-in provisions of paycheck protection violate the First Amendment rights of the union. Why? Due to the "obvious, significant expense involved in complying with" the law, the court averred.

In other words, it is too burdensome to ask a teachers union to do what every other group in the U.S. must do if it wants to raise money for a political cause: Identify, contact and persuade people to contribute. This is the "burden" of groups on both the left and right -- from the Sierra Club to the National Rifle Association. This union exception isn't very persuasive, and we'd be surprised if the U.S. Supreme Court buys it.

In a landmark 1988 decision, Communications Workers v. Beck, the Supreme Court held that workers under union contracts couldn't be forced to pay dues for activities not directly related to collective bargaining. But enforcement, which falls to the Labor Department and National Labor Relations Board, has often been weak or nonexistent. Moreover, under Beck, workers must opt-out of their dues money going to partisan political causes. Many are unaware that they have this right, and unions have become expert at creating obstacles to discourage those who want to exercise it.

The temptation for the Justices in the current case will be to rule narrowly on the First Amendment issue raised by the Washington supreme court and stop there. But the Court could do a service for the country by addressing the issue more fundamentally. Six states have passed paycheck protection laws that organized labor has opposed vigorously. And in 28 states workers can still lose their jobs for not joining the union.

The High Court now has an opportunity to set some national guidelines regarding the constitutionality of both paycheck protection laws for nonunion workers and the more general practice of unions extracting money from any worker involuntarily. Let's hope they don't take a pass.

Archbishop's Call For Court Blessing Steers Clear Of Issues (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — Speaking to Supreme Court justices, cabinet members, politicians and hundreds of judges and lawyers gathered here on Sunday to celebrate a special Mass marking the start of the judicial calendar, Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl of Washington rejoiced in what he called the resurgence of faith in the shaping of public policy and urged those before him to remain rooted in their religion.

"What we do and how we act, our morals and ethics, follow on what be believe," Archbishop Wuerl told a standing-room crowd at the Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. Matthew downtown. "The religious convictions of a people sustain their moral decisions."

Officially called the Solemn Votive Mass of the Holy Spirit, "votive" indicating that it is being celebrated for a particular intention, Red Masses are held all over the country, typically at the start of a judicial year. The Supreme Court's new term begins Monday.

Worshipers ask for the blessing of the Holy Spirit on those who administer justice, in a tradition that goes back to 13th-century Europe. The service is called the Red Mass because of the red vestments clergy members wear.

This year, the Mass was celebrated by the new leader of the Washington Archdiocese, Archbishop Wuerl, to bless a Supreme Court that has a Catholic majority for the first time. The five Catholics on the court are Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia and Samuel A. Alito Jr.

All but Justice Alito were in attendance Sunday, as were Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; several other cabinet members; Mayor Anthony A. Williams; and Lt. Gov. Michael Steele of Maryland, a Republican candidate for the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0073039

Many non-Catholics attend Red Masses, as a sign of respect. Last year, President Bush came; generally, presidents attend at least one during their terms.

A procession of priests and bishops was followed by a police color guard. A Ralph Vaughan Williams hymn was followed by the national anthem.

Having earned a reputation as a skilled diplomat in his previous tenure as bishop of Pittsburgh, Archbishop Wuerl did not overtly talk about issues the church has championed, like prohibiting abortion, although the court this session will review the constitutionality of a ban on a type of late-term abortion.

Instead, he said the values formed by religion could not be separated from the insight and judgment brought to bear on law and policy.

"The two spheres, church and state, while distinct, are always interrelated," Archbishop Wuerl told the worshipers. "Politics, law, faith are mingled because believers are also citizens. Church and state are home for the same people."

For those who may have been looking for some clue to the archbishop's approach to political issues, he strode the range of Catholic social teaching without focusing on a particular topic, as he called for "speaking out against racial discrimination, social injustice or threats to the dignity of life."

Advocates on the right and the left have said that, historically, personal religious beliefs have not necessarily directed the way justices vote on a case. But when Justice Alito was confirmed in January, the news media and others noted the Catholic majority on the court.

Few may have raised the issue of the justices' religion if they had all been Methodist, for instance, said John H. Garvey, dean of Boston College Law School, in a telephone interview. But Mr. Garvey said it was valid to discuss the religious composition of the court because some people would assume the justices voted a particular way because of their Catholic faith.

"They are not a voting bloc," Mr. Garvey said. "The Catholic Church is a very big tent with people from the far left and the far right in it. The fact that the Catholic members of the court are center-to-right rather than center-to-left says more about President Bush than about the Catholic Church."

Lucia A. Silecchia, professor of law at Catholic University of America in Washington, said it was too soon to tell whether the Catholic justices held common views. "Where it gets complicated is that all five identify themselves as Catholic, but they aren't necessarily consistent with one another," Professor Silecchia said.

The Mass ended with "America the Beautiful" and the hymn "O God Beyond All Praising." The archbishop descended the altar and left smiling and chatting with Chief Justice Roberts.

Later, on the steps of the cathedral, two young men approached Archbishop Wuerl to have him bless their rosaries and to take pictures with him.

As the archbishop stood with one man, the other, holding the camera, said happily, "Here's to the union of church and state!"

The archbishop laughed, but gently corrected him. "No," he said, "remember, I said they were two distinct spheres."

Archbishop Stresses Ties Between Morality, Faith At Mass With Justices (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

At a Mass attended by four U.S. Supreme Court justices, Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl said yesterday that religious faith is an enduring "cornerstone" of American life and that morality and ethics "cannot be divorced from their religious antecedents."

The archbishop delivered the homily as he celebrated his first Red Mass, held annually as the Supreme Court convenes at which worshipers seek God's blessing and guidance for those who administer justice.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. sat in the first pew during the service at the Cathedral of St. Matthew of the Apostle in Northwest Washington alongside Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony M. Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was among five members of President Bush's Cabinet who attended the service, which began with the 1,000 worshipers rising and singing the national anthem and ended with "America the Beautiful."

One group that routinely seeks to hold prayer vigils outside the Red Mass was not allowed to get close to the officials in attendance.

On Thursday, a federal judge rejected the Christian group's claim that their faith demands that they demonstrate and pray in support of the public display of the Ten Commandments -- and that to do so properly they must be allowed to cross arbitrary security barriers around the cathedral. U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth said the group, led by Presbyterian Rev. Patrick Mahoney, Christian activist Troy Newman and the Christian Defense Coalition, could demonstrate but behind security barricades. No demonstrators, however, appeared immediately outside the church.

DOJ_NMG_0073040

In his homily, Wuerl, who took over the Archdiocese of Washington in June, described spirituality and religious faith as an integral part of American life, one that endures even as some resist its place in political discourse.

"The assertion by some that the secular voice should alone speak to the ordering of society and its public policy, that it alone can speak to the needs of the human condition, is being increasingly challenged," Wuerl said.

"Looking around, I see many young men and women who, in such increasing numbers, are looking for spiritual values, a sense of rootedness and hope for the future," he said. "In spite of all the options and challenges from the secular world competing for the allegiance of human hearts, the quiet, soft and gentle voice of the spirit has not been stilled."

Religious faith, the archbishop said, has long played an important role in U.S. society, from the Mayflower Compact, which established law, to the Declaration of Independence. George Washington, he said, told Americans in his farewell address that "we cannot expect national prosperity without morality, and morality cannot be sustained without religious principles."

"What is religion's place in public life?" Wuerl asked. "Politics and faith are mingled because believers are also citizens. Both church and state are home to the very same people."

The Red Mass originated in medieval Europe and has been celebrated in the United States in New York since 1928. The service has been held annually in the District since 1953, sponsored by the John Carroll Society, a Washington-based organization for Catholic professionals.

Government Needs Faith, Wuerl Says (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

Catholic Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl yesterday invoked the legacies of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and their ideals of American law and religion while celebrating his first Red Mass, held each year on the Sunday before the Supreme Court's fall session.

"George Washington, after whom this city is named, was not the first, but perhaps the most prominent American political figure to highlight the vital part religion must play in the well-being of the nation," Archbishop Wuerl said at the 53rd annual Mass at the Cathedral of St. Matthew the Apostle in Northwest. "His often-quoted farewell address reminds us that we cannot expect national prosperity without morality. And morality cannot be sustained without religious principles."

Archbishop Wuerl also cited the Declaration of Independence and the writings of Thomas Jefferson, which he said were intended to be "an expression of the American mind and to give to that expression the proper tone and spirit."

Four Supreme Court justices and other government and Catholic officials were among the 1,500 people who filled the 111-year-old church for the 80-minute service.

Fire marshals had to close the church doors, off Rhode Island Avenue, shortly after the service began at 10 a.m. as a safety precaution for the overflow crowd.

The Red Mass is named after the clergy vestments and the color of fire, a symbol of the Holy Spirit. The masses began centuries ago in Rome, Paris and London.

The justices attending yesterday were Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., Anthony M. Kennedy, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, all Roman Catholics.

Other U.S. officials included Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Alphonso R. Jackson, Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael O. Leavitt and Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, who conducted the second reading of Mass.

The first reading was performed by Anita B. McBride, chief of staff to first lady Laura Bush.

Also attending were ambassadors from Argentina, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Ireland, Italy, Jordan, Malta, Norway, Portugal and Venezuela.

At conclusion of the Mass and as normal Sunday services began, the justices, other officials and their spouses went to brunch at the nearby Renaissance Mayflower Hotel for the presentation of awards by the John Carroll Society to two lawyers and a staff member for "outstanding volunteer legal services to low-income people in the Washington area."

Lawyers Kevin C. Fitzgerald and William E. Lawler III were recipients. Legal staffer Francine L. Higginbotham was honored for supervising and managing the taking of telephone calls from poor people needing legal services.

Last year, according to the archdiocese's Community Services, $10 million in free, legal services were provided to 6,000 needy people by more than 280 lawyers and 55 law firms.

High Court Justices Attend Pre-term Mass (AP)

By Ann Sanner, The Associated Press

AP, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073041

WASHINGTON (AP) — An audience that included four of the Supreme Court's Roman Catholics heard Washington's new archbishop on Sunday describe how religion has been a guiding principle in American history.

In a worship service traditionally held the day before the high court's new term, Cabinet members and foreign ambassadors joined the capital's legal community at the annual Red Mass.

Four of the five Roman Catholics on the high court — Chief Justice John Roberts, Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas — came to worship at the Cathedral of St. Matthew the Apostle.

Justice Samuel Alito, who gave Catholics a majority for the first time when he joined the nine-member court in January, did not attend the Mass.

In his first Red Mass in Washington since being appointed in May, Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl spoke of religion's relationship to public life.

"Morality and ethical considerations cannot be divorced from their religious antecedents," Wuerl said in his homily. "What we do and how we act, our morals and ethics, follow on what we believe. The religious convictions of a people sustain their moral decisions."

Wuerl said politics, law and faith mingle "because believers are also citizens. Church and state are home for the same people."

He called religious faith a "cornerstone in the American experience."

"May our religious faith, as a foundational part of our national experience, continue to nurture and sustain each branch of this society so that by its very connectedness to the vine, we can blossom and flourish," Wuerl said.

The service has been held at the cathedral since 1953 by the John Carroll Society, a group of Washington professionals who are Catholic.

Cabinet members attending the service included Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt and Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson.

Celebration of the Red Mass dates to the 13th century and is conducted to ask the Holy Spirit for guidance for those who seek justice. The Mass takes its name from the red vestments, symbolizing the Holy Spirit, worn by the celebrants.

The Supreme Court this term is dealing with familiar issues such as abortion and race. Bush's two conservative appointees, Roberts and Alito, give opponents of abortion and affirmative action reason to hope the high court will move in their direction.

Roberts, Gonzales Speak On Judicial Independence (LAW)

By Tony Mauro

Law.com, October 2, 2006

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. has made his strongest plea yet for judicial independence, even warning fellow conservatives to back off from attacking judges for unpopular decisions.

Speaking Thursday and Friday before a historic D.C. gathering of federal and state judges, lawyers, academics and business leaders aimed at preserving a "fair and independent" judiciary, Roberts recalled former President Ronald Reagan's definition of a judge's duties.

"The judge's commitment to the preservation of our rights often requires the lonely courage of a patriot," Roberts quoted Reagan as saying 25 years ago. "To the extent that attacks on judicial independence come from conservative quarters, I would commend to those quarters the words of the leading conservative voice of our time."

But Roberts also said attacks on the judiciary are "utterly bipartisan," and a key to warding off such attacks is to use "self-restraint" in decision-making.

"Judges are insulated from political pressure precisely because they are not supposed to be making political decisions but deciding cases according to the rule of law," said Roberts.

But the chief justice urged all to defend the judiciary. "Just as attacks on judicial independence come from all parts of the political spectrum, so should the defense of judicial independence."

At the same conference, sponsored by Georgetown University and the American Law Institute, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales offered similar remarks, defending the judiciary while warning judges not to overstep their authority.

"It is essential that judges be courageous enough to do the right thing, motivated solely by a respect for the law, undeterred by criticism or the possible outcome of the next election," said Gonzales. But he urged judges to retain "a proper sense of judicial humility."

Though he couched his comments in largely general terms, Gonzales went on to criticize high court rulings that have struck down Bush administration wartime measures. The Constitution gives the courts "relatively few tools" to intervene in military and foreign policy, Gonzales said, adding, "Judges must resist the temptation to supplement those tools based on their own personal views about the wisdom of the policies under review."

While blended with implied criticisms of some decisions, the defense of the judiciary by Roberts and Gonzales was a notable response from two top Bush appointees to recent sharp criticisms, mainly by Republican lawmakers, of federal judges. Even as the conference was getting under way, the House Judiciary Committee endorsed a bill that would create an inspector general to oversee disciplinary complaints against federal judges -- an idea that was bitterly criticized in corridor discussions throughout the conference.

But the conference also focused on problems facing state courts, besieged by increasingly costly and political judicial elections. Though the consensus of the more than 200 participants was that judicial elections should be eliminated, there was equal recognition that these elections are here to stay in most of the 39 states that have them.

Other areas of consensus were the need for enhancing jury service, increasing legal services to the poor, and improving public understanding of the courts. Participants urged the chief justice to give an annual "state of the judiciary" address that would highlight court developments in a visible way to parallel the president's State of the Union address.

Another measure urged by many, according to Stanford Law School professor Pamela Karlan, who summarized ideas offered by participants, was allowing broadcast coverage of Supreme Court hearings. "You are your own best advertisement for judicial independence," Karlan said to the justices in attendance.

The conference was conceived and launched by retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Justice Stephen Breyer. At various times during the day-and-a-half-long meeting, five other Supreme Court justices attended, along with numerous state chief justices. Seeking to expand the discussion beyond lawyers and judges, O'Connor also persuaded the likes of billionaire investor Warren Buffett and Washington Post Chairman Donald Graham to attend.

If O'Connor was the unstoppable force organizing the event, Breyer was its motivational speaker, offering an impassioned speech on Thursday that sought to explain the need for independent courts in terms that citizens could understand.

Fair courts, independent from politics and pressure, are the key to economic and political stability, Breyer said. "You want prosperity? You want judges." Businesses, he said, need to rely on enforceable contracts to expand.

And when the Court tackles controversial issues ranging from abortion to the outcome of a presidential election (as in Bush v. Gore), Breyer said the public's trust in the courts explains why its decisions will be obeyed. "No paratroopers -- none. No bullets. No rocks thrown in the streets. That's not what you do in the United States. It's the rule of law."

No Bill Too Small For GOP Incumbents In Tight Elections (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

In a bid to help embattled incumbents win tough reelection campaigns in November, House Republican leaders last week muscled through more than 165 bills that their members can use to win over voters back home -- and deflect attention from the scandals they left behind in Washington.

The scandal brewing around former Florida representative Mark Foley's inappropriate e-mails to teenage boys is only the latest in a series of indictments, resignations and accusations to rock Washington. In the face of such ill winds, House Republican leaders have urged GOP candidates to focus their campaigns on local issues and personal accomplishments. The last days of legislating were devoted to giving the candidates the specifics to run on.

Dozens of the made-to-order bills that flew through the House bear the names of the endangered lawmakers, from Pennsylvania Rep. Jim Gerlach's Open Space and Farmland Preservation Act to Connecticut Rep. Christopher Shays's reauthorization of the HOPE VI housing program, to measures to preserve Native American languages and assist in water planning for Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.).

"If you've got people with must-do pieces of legislation, you want to help them out," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the vice chairman of the House Republican Conference.

To be sure, larding up bills for endangered incumbents is nothing new. But with money tight and only two spending bills completed, this year's efforts focused less on home-district spending and more on substantive measures tailored to specific constituents -- a "suburban agenda" for embattled Republicans in the suburbs of Philadelphia, bills to appeal to Christian conservatives for troubled Midwestern Republicans and expressions of independence for Republicans from districts that have turned against President Bush.

Kingston said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), in his first end-of-session rush in that post, proved masterful at filling blank spots on the House's agenda with long-sought legislation.

The name of Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.), one of the most threatened incumbents, was blazed across the Public Expression of Religion Act, which passed the House Tuesday and would deny legal fees to anyone winning a lawsuit to block the display of religious symbols in public places. The little-noticed "GOP Suburban Agenda" that cleared the House in recent weeks included eight bills, seven of which were authored by Republicans in jeopardy.

"People care about these issues," said Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick (R-Pa.), an endangered freshman who returned to Bucks County over the weekend to tout an "online predators" bill and a measure to promote charitable giving for open-space preservation to counter Democratic attacks that have been fixated on the war in Iraq.

"I've got the quintessential suburban district," Fitzpatrick said. "When I go home and go to the ball fields with my wife, this is what people want to talk about, parklands and 'my space.' "

On the campaign trail, such small-bore bills are likely to be featured far more prominently than the measures that captured more headlines in Congress's last days, such as legislation creating military commissions to try suspected terrorists, a House-passed bill authorizing Bush's warrantless wiretapping, final approval of a 700-mile fence on the U.S.-Mexico border, and bills covering port security, defense policy, military spending and homeland security funding.

Democratic campaign chiefs remain confident that such local measures will have little impact in an election year that they say remains a referendum on the president's leadership.

"There are forces bigger and more powerful at work," shrugged Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Democratic leaders have not let up in criticizing what they call a "do-nothing Congress," which has delayed action on a legion of big-ticket items. Despite personal promises from Republican leaders in the wake of influence-peddling scandals, changes to the rules governing lobbying were never made. Nine of 11 annual spending bills haven't passed. High-profile efforts to authorize Bush's warrantless wiretapping, open offshore areas to oil drilling and reform the rules on foreign investment after the Dubai ports fiasco all fell short of a presidential signing ceremony.

Bush's top three domestic priorities -- a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws, a remaking of Social Security and simplification of the tax code -- went nowhere. The minimum wage has not been raised for a decade. And the last, best chance for conservatives to virtually eliminate the estate tax permanently may have passed if Democrats gain seats in the House and Senate in November.

But in a year when National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) has implored candidates to resist national themes in their campaigns, major legislation may be beside the point, GOP aides say. Not when Rep. Chris Chocola (R-Ind.) will get money to deal with leaking underground storage tanks in his district, when Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.) will get to tout his National Dam Safety Act and when Rep. Mark Green (R-Wis.) can claim bragging rights for the transfer of national forest land to the towns of Laona and Wabeno, Wis., as he campaigns for governor.

"I asked for help and I got it," Gerlach said of the leadership's last-minute scheduling of a vote on his open spaces and farmland preservation bill. "It was legislation my district wants. It was something my legislative district has a need for."

The effort to achieve such successes went to extraordinary lengths last week, even almost bringing down a major defense policy bill. House and Senate negotiators nearly failed to reach agreement on the defense bill, not because of issues such as the prohibition on torture that held up the bill last year, but because of an issue that had nothing to do with national defense -- a measure to clamp down on illegal immigrant gangs.

During a rare news conference, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) publicly challenged Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), saying he would not bring the defense policy bill to the House floor without the gang provision. Asked why Hastert had singled out the gang measure for his stand, one senior House leadership aide pointed to the person standing next to the speaker: freshman Rep. David G. Reichert (R-Wash.), the provision's author, who is running neck-and-neck with Microsoft executive Darcy Burner.

In the end, Hastert relented, but he offered Reichert a promise to be used on the campaign trail. The gang measure will be one of the first revisited when Congress returns after the election.

Trading Votes For Pork Across The House Aisle (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — For more than a decade, Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania has operated a political trading post in a back corner of the House of Representatives.

A gang of about two dozen Democrats mill around his seat. A procession of others walk back to request pet spending projects, known as earmarks. And Republicans come by, asking him to enlist some of those Democrats to join them on close votes. “Whether they get what they want in the bill or they get the votes they are looking for, nobody ever leaves completely disappointed,” said Representative Paul E. Kanjorski, a Pennsylvania Democrat often found in what is known as the Murtha corner.

DOJ_NMG_0073044

Outside Washington, Mr. Murtha, a Vietnam veteran and longtime hawk, may be best known for his break with the president over the Iraq war last fall. But inside the Capitol, he is best known for turning earmarks into power. As the top Democrat on the House military spending subcommittee, he often delivers Democratic votes to Republican leaders in a tacit exchange for earmarks for himself and his allies.

In the last year, Democratic and Republican floor watchers say, Mr. Murtha has helped Republicans round up enough Democratic votes to narrowly block a host of Democratic proposals: to investigate federal contracting fraud in Iraq, to reform lobbying laws, to increase financing for flood control, to add $150 million for veterans' health care and job training, and to exempt middle-class families from the alternative minimum tax.

In one case that particularly irked Democratic partisans, Mr. Murtha led three others in voting against a politically vulnerable Louisiana Democrat's proposal to divert money intended to be spent on base closings to research prosthetic limbs for veterans. It failed by one vote.

For their "nays" on that and other matters, all four Democrats were rewarded. In the weeks after the vote, they claimed credit for a total of more than $250 million in earmarks in the 2006 appropriations bills. Mr. Murtha alone brought home about $80 million for his district and $120 million for his state, according to Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan group that tracks such projects.

Mr. Murtha, who announced a bid this spring to become the next House Democratic leader, acknowledges that some Democrats grouse about his history of leading others across the aisle. (Several Democrats said as much, but none would speak publicly.) He confirmed working with Republicans on the Iraq war spending vote that blocked the Democratic corruption investigation, but said he did not remember the others. He said he always acted on principle, working with Republicans either because he agreed with them or to uphold private agreements about spending bills.

"You just need to get the things done, so you give them the votes to get the things done," he said in an interview. "There is no question that some projects come out of it for our members, and that is not a bad thing." He added, "Deal making is what Congress is all about."

Mr. Murtha can punish lawmakers, as well. Those who do not support the defense spending bill, for example, discover their next earmark requests go nowhere. "Let me tell you the facts of life," Mr. Murtha said he tells balky legislators. "If you vote against this bill, you won't have any input at all the next time."

Earmarks — often buried deep in complex bills by unidentified lawmakers — have come under new scrutiny since the conviction last fall of Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican on the defense-spending panel who accepted more than $2.4 million in bribes from contractors. The cost of earmarks has tripled in the last decade to about $64 billion a year, according to the Congressional Research Service. Mr. Murtha and other lawmakers say many earmarks are worthwhile, but critics charge that they waste taxpayers' money, encourage cronyism and foster self-dealing.

Some members of Congress complain that earmarks corrupt lawmaking in other ways. "They are used as internal bribery in order to get members to vote for a piece of legislation they wouldn't ordinarily give two minutes to," said Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee.

No one is more adept at such trading than Mr. Murtha, say current and former members, Congressional aides and outside observers. "He delivers Democrats for key votes, which increases his clout and ability to get more earmarks, which then increases his ability to get Democratic votes," said Steve Ellis, a vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense.

Mr. Murtha leans right on abortion rights and gun control but left on labor, tax and economic issues. And he consistently opposes ethics reform or disclosure requirements, including a proposal this year that would have required lawmakers to sign their names to earmarks, on the grounds that voters police lawmakers' actions.

He has sided with Republicans 169 times on close votes since 1994, more often than all but three of the most conservative Democrats. Many of those votes have been on nonideological but politically pivotal questions. For example, Mr. Murtha has often led members from his corner crowd to vote for procedural rules that limit potential amendments or debate on Republican bills — votes that typically follow party loyalty.

Dick Armey, a former Republican majority leader, said his party's strategists would often tell him, "Murtha will get us some votes."

At 74, Mr. Murtha remains an imposing figure: 6 feet 3 inches tall, with giant hands spread wide as he talks and size 12 shoes stuck out into the aisle. His corner perch is the only seat informally reserved for an individual lawmaker. "No one else dares sit there," said Representative Mike Doyle, a Pennsylvania Democrat and Murtha protégé.

He can also be very persuasive, thanks to his position on the spending committee. "If Jack Murtha tells you he needs your vote, then you would have to think very hard before not delivering it," said Representative James P. Moran, a Virginia Democrat who sits on the subcommittee and in Mr. Murtha's corner. "There are just too many chits out there."

Members have watched with envy as Mr. Murtha has used earmarks to remake Johnstown, Pa., an impoverished former steel town that now includes a Murtha highway, a Murtha airport and Murtha health centers. He has steered billions of dollars to his district over the years, including more than $80 million in the defense spending bill passed Friday, according to a preliminary tally.

Mr. Murtha's patronage has transformed Johnstown into a national hub of the defense business, attracting giants like Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman. He even built one contractor from scratch. In 1988, Mr. Murtha asked the chancellor of the University of Pittsburgh to set up a nonprofit that could use Navy money to establish a Center for Excellence in Metalworking in Johnstown.

Since then, Mr. Murtha has delivered earmarks to the organization, now called Concurrent Technologies Corporation, for work like consulting on counterterrorism, designing ejection seats for pilots and developing software. The military and other federal agencies have paid Concurrent nearly a billion dollars in grants and contracts since 1999. In the most recent defense bill, Mr. Murtha inserted $1.3 million for Concurrent to research Army tank designs.

"It is Murtha's pet rock," said Stephen Gage, chief executive of an Ohio economic development organization that once worked with Concurrent.

Concurrent's executives, in turn, have given more than $114,000 to the congressman's campaigns over the last three elections, making it one of his biggest corporate donors. The organization pays about $500,000 a year to a lobbying firm, the PMA Group, whose executives and clients have given Mr. Murtha more than $1.2 million in donations since 1999.

Mr. Murtha's brother, Kit, recently retired from a smaller lobbying firm, KSA Consulting, that sought defense earmarks and represented many companies in Mr. Murtha's district. From 1998 through 2003, he received more contributions from military contractors than has any other member of the House, according to the Center for Public Integrity, a nonpartisan group.

Elected to the House in 1974, Mr. Murtha learned the politics of parochial projects from former Speaker Tip O'Neill, who named Mr. Murtha to the defense appropriations subcommittee and used him as his eyes and ears on the floor.

He survived a brush with scandal during the 1980 Abscam investigation, when he did not accept but did not rule out taking a $50,000 bribe from undercover agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation; he eventually became a cooperating witness.

After becoming chairman of the defense spending panel in 1989, Mr. Murtha imposed a new discipline. Previously, the House often debated defense spending bills, which account for about half of federal discretionary spending, for weeks of contentious amendments and speeches, both in the committee and on the floor. Most Democrats often voted against the measures. "It took day after day after day," Mr. Murtha recalled.

Not any more. Mr. Murtha installed a new system that the Republicans have continued: the chairman and ranking member work out the details behind closed doors, pack the bill with plenty of earmarks, and link future projects for members to their support for the bill. The appropriations committee now typically debates and approves the bill in less than eight minutes and the full House in less than half an hour. (The $437 billion measure passed last week took under 20 minutes.)

"The defense community has some presence in almost every Congressional district — or so long as you vote for the bill, it does," said Mr. Moran, the Virginia Democrat. Mr. Murtha would "see to it" that members understood that those with earmarks in the bill who considered voting against it "better set their sights lower the next time," Mr. Moran said.

Mr. Murtha gave up the chairman's gavel when the Republicans took over the House in 1994 but managed to retain an unusual share of power. He has sole authority to grant nearly half the panel's earmarks and decide on all requests from Democrats, he said. Many minority appropriators work closely with their subcommittee chairmen, but Mr. Murtha's collaboration was especially close. He has worked for decades as a partner with the committee's senior Republicans. He still receives frequent visits from Representative Jerry Lewis, the California Republican who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee and is now under scrutiny in a federal investigation that grew out of the Cunningham scandal.

Mr. Murtha has used his influence in the caucus to place friends in strategic positions on appropriations committees and other House panels. Representative Nancy Pelosi, a California liberal who is the current Democratic leader, is a close Murtha ally. He put her on the appropriations committee early in her career and managed her campaign to be leader.

His friends say Mr. Murtha often guides their votes, especially on defense matters. "He is sort of like the general and we are the lieutenants," Mr. Doyle said.

Mr. Murtha takes care of his troops. Beginning with $1.5 million in 2003, for example, he has earmarked several million for the Doyle Manufacturing Technology Center to help lure military contractors to Mr. Doyle's district.

Mr. Kanjorski, the Pennsylvania Democrat, said he had help on "8 to 10" projects, including a $9.5 million deal four years ago for research by a firm partly owned by his nephews. In an interview, Mr. Kanjorski said his relatives "just happened to be the only people who would take responsibility" for developing the technology, which involved using water jets to pulverize materials. He said he recently gave Mr. Murtha a pair of high-tech disease-resistant socks made with silver fibers by a company in his district. After padding around in them, Mr. Kanjorski said, Mr. Murtha was so pleased that he agreed to an earmark to buy them for soldiers.

Other lawmakers have learned not to cross him. Aides to Representative Allyson Y. Schwartz, a freshman from the Philadelphia suburbs, say she has become a regular in the Murtha corner in part because her predecessor, a reform-minded Democrat who sometimes clashed with Mr. Murtha, suffered in his ability to obtain earmarks. In contrast, Mr. Murtha has helped Ms. Schwartz obtain a $7 million contract for a local defense firm and $150,000 to refurbish a historic inn in her district.

A spokeswoman for Ms. Schwartz said only that "she is proud of her relationship with Mr. Murtha." (The predecessor, Joe Hoeffel, now a Pennsylvania development official, acknowledged disagreements with Mr. Murtha but said they had worked well together.)

Mr. Murtha said he and his staff did their best to vet every earmark request but ultimately relied on the judgment of the members. He said he always asks, "Is this worthwhile not only to your district but to the country?"

Since Mr. Murtha announced his ambition to become party leader if the Democrats take the House this fall, supporters of his rival, Representative Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who is the party's whip, have begun quietly questioning Mr. Murtha's deal making. They argue that Mr. Murtha's pacts with Republicans should disqualify him for the job. Mr. Hoyer declined to comment.

Mr. Murtha, for his part, argued that his experience brokering votes would be an asset if Ms. Pelosi became the speaker. Running the House with a slim majority would require bipartisanship and party discipline. "I come across a little tougher," he said. "And I do have a lot of people that vote with me on an awful lot of issues."

GSA Will Try To Fix Procurement Problems With A New Service (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Legislation that would permit the General Services Administration to revamp troubled operations and create a new purchasing service has been sent to the president for his signature.

Once the bill is signed, the GSA will roll out a new Federal Acquisition Service, which will combine the agency's Federal Supply Service and Federal Technology Service. Officials plan to have the FAS operating within 60 days after President Bush acts.

Sponsors of the legislation, including Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) and Sens. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) and Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), hope the reorganization will help improve the agency's financial controls and make for more efficient purchasing of services, equipment and supplies used by federal agencies.

In recent months, the GSA has been tagged as a problem agency. Its business began slumping in fiscal 2004, and the technology service began operating in the red. Some field offices were investigated for improper contracting activities; some federal agencies became dissatisfied with GSA services and took their business elsewhere.

Lurita Alexis Doan , who took office as the head of the GSA in May, is moving to restore morale at the agency and contends that most agencies would be better served if they stick to their primary missions and let the GSA handle procurement. She has recruited a commissioner for the new FAS, Jim Williams , an experienced project manager who has worked at the Department of Homeland Security and the Internal Revenue Service.

Most federal agencies rely on congressional appropriations for their programs, but GSA obtains most of its funding by contracting on behalf of federal agencies. It buys goods and services each year from the private sector and resells them to agencies, charging a fee for its management services.

The agency's technology service buys computers, software and telecommunications for the government, and the Federal Supply Service buys vehicles, property and general supplies. Congress hopes that consolidating the two services and their funding streams into the new FAS will help the GSA resolve its budget problems.

The GSA projects a loss of $96 million to $110 million for fiscal 2006 in the technology service but will not have a tally until financial statements are compiled in mid-November, officials said. Part of that loss stems from a decision to write off a $71 million in-house contract management system, GSA Preferred, that had not met expectations.

In hopes of breaking even in fiscal 2007, which began yesterday, the agency has cut costs -- dropping some internal projects, cutting back on travel and canceling some support contracts.

About 150 GSA employees have taken cash buyouts, which also will help reduce the agency's costs in the coming year. The GSA, which has about 13,000 employees, hopes to avoid staffing cuts if it can improve its financial outlook.

Sponsors of the reorganization legislation hope that creation of the FAS will help the GSA better coordinate how it buys and sells products and services. With the merger of the GSA's technology and general supply funds, officials expect more sales to federal customers. The two funds handle about $56 billion in annual sales and produce revenue of $7 billion to $8 billion to cover GSA operating expenses, officials said.Saving Money on a Move

Congress has extended a test program for reimbursing federal employees who are directed to move to new duty stations. The experiment, authorized for four years, gives employees more flexibility in arranging their moves and, based on previous trial runs, should reduce the government's costs.

Under travel rules, employees are entitled to reimbursement for certain expenses, including real estate and settlement costs and the transportation and storage of household goods. The government provides relocation assistance to about 28,000 civil service employees a year at an estimated cost of more than $800 million, according to a Senate report accompanying the bill.

The FBI and U.S. Customs and Border Protection reported substantial savings when they allowed employees to volunteer for a fixed-rate reimbursement, the report said.

For example, Border Patrol agents were offered $5,000 to $20,000 as a lump-sum payment for relocating during a 2004-05 test project. The average cost for a move was $16,888 during that period, much less than the average historical cost of $72,000 under federal travel rules, the report said.

The bill, sponsored by Collins, has been sent to the president for his signature.

Study Finds Missed Messages On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

When citizens send e-mails to their congressmen through the Web sites of lobby groups, they expect those messages to zip electronically to the place they intended.

It turns out that isn't always the case.

A new study by a company that routes thousands of these e-mails to Congress shows that plenty of constituent e-mails never reach lawmakers' offices.

"Citizens would be understandably upset if they knew that letters they sent through the U.S. Post Office were never delivered," writes Dennis W. Johnson, a George Washington University professor who oversaw the study for the e-mail company, Capitol Advantage. "Unfortunately, there is strong evidence that much of the electronic mail that citizens assume is reaching Congress is ending up in an electronic trash can."

Congress has had an e-mail problem for years. It is deluged with an estimated 200 million constituent messages annually, the vast majority of them electronic. The number is so large and is growing so quickly that lawmakers are desperate to find ways to throttle the volume.

The number of e-mails has mushroomed in part because of the now-common practice among interest groups to rally their troops via cyberspace. Generally, a lobby will send an e-mail to its most eager members, which directs them to a Web site. Once there, the members fill out a form that routes to lawmakers e-mails that advocate whatever it is the group is pressing for at the moment.

Lawmakers have come up with ingenious methods to undermine the effectiveness of such programs. As readers of this column know, some congressional offices are now insisting that would-be e-mailers solve a simple math problem (to prove they are real human beings and not some machine spamming them with the push of a button). Many offices are also demanding that constituents disclose what issue they want to communicate about and to reveal information about themselves: Zip code, street address, e-mail address, phone number and the like.

Now we know that these efforts are working well. According to the Capitol Advantage study, six of the 10 leading companies that run Web sites that send e-mails for interest groups failed to deliver even half of those e-mails through their systems.

That is a big disappointment. After all, aren't public officials supposed to be open to the public?

The survey wasn't as comprehensive as I might have liked and the companies that set up the Web sites are disputing its findings. But its overall conclusion is difficult to contradict: Lobby organizations are having a hard time getting e-mail to Congress.

"There's a lot of resentment toward us on Capitol Hill," said Bill Pease, chief technology officer of GetActive Software Inc., a vendor of public policy programs for the Web.

Lawmakers tend to think that e-mail communications and, in fact, almost all mass mailings are fake and can easily be disregarded, several executives said.

To get around the hurdles, Web site operators have taken to faxing the e-mails to legislators. For example, the Business Industry Political Action Committee, or BIPAC, routinely faxes to Congress messages that started out as e-mails typed into its sites by constituents. So does Democracy Data & Communications LLC, which also runs regular hand deliveries to Capitol Hill so it can be doubly sure that messages reach targets.

All of this, of course, is absurd. Electronic messages are being delivered on paper. Many of the missives that actually reach their targets are not accorded attention by the people who matter. Faxes, in particular, have low credibility with lawmakers.

Which leads to the more interesting question: Can democracy be conducted through shortcuts?

The Internet allows interest groups to mobilize their members with incredible ease and speed. Hundreds, even thousands of messages can be directed to individual lawmakers with a single, well-placed e-mail alert to trained zealots back home. Even with the obstacles placed in the way of these communications, e-mails roll into Congress at an amazing rate.

So amazing, in fact, that it is possible that lawmakers have become inured to the sheer volume and have learned not to care as much about them.

An earlier poll of congressional staffers, also underwritten by Capitol Advantage, touched on this. It discovered that half of the aides it surveyed thought the folks whose names were attached to the e-mails they receive aren't aware that the e-mails were sent to Capitol Hill. Another 25 percent of staffers questioned whether those communications were legitimate.

That strikes me as the bigger issue: Not whether every e-mail is getting through to Congress but how many of them are being read with serious interest. I bet a closer look at that issue would be even more unsettling to Web site operators and their clients than the latest estimate of delivery rates.Qorvis Branches Out

Qorvis Communications LLC has bought Sparky's Garage. No, the fast-growing public relations firm isn't going into the auto repair business. Sparky's Garage is a local advertising firm, and Qorvis has bought the seven-person shop in the belief that commercials will play an ever larger role in lobbying.

But not just any commercials. "A lot of issue advertising turns out to be very expensive memos to Congress or the administration," said Qorvis's Michael J. Petruzzello. "And it's hard to quantify if it's reaching its target audience and whether it's effective."

Sparky's Garage, now known as Qorvis Advertising, "will bring a fresh approach to issue advertising," Petruzzello promised, by integrating its commercials with the Internet and grass-roots lobbying. And adding some pizzazz.

The five-year-old ad agency's founder Bill Replogle (who called himself the chief mechanic) has worked on accounts that range from Harley-Davidson to the Washington Nationals. Those kind of clients don't normally cross paths with public policy types. But maybe the mixture will wake up the Washington wonks. That's what Qorvis is betting.

Treating War's Toll On The Mind (USN)

By Betsy Streisand

U.S. News and World Report, October 1, 2006

Thousands of soldiers have post-traumatic stress disorder. Will they get the help they need?

As they take their seats in the movie theater, Eric and Raquel Schrumpf could be any young couple out on a summer night in Southern California. No one notices as Schrumpf, 31, a former Marine sergeant who served in Iraq, scans the rows for moviegoers who may be wired with explosives under their jackets. No one pays attention as a man who appears to be Middle Eastern, wearing a long coat with bulging pockets, takes a seat in the same row as the Schrumpfs and Eric starts watching him intently. No one listens as Schrumpf instructs his wife to "get as low to the ground as you can if something happens." Then something does. Schrumpf hears metal jangling as the man reaches into his pocket. Convinced he is a suicide bomber about to strike, Schrumpf lunges at him. The man jerks away and his deadly weapon falls to the floor: a can of Coke.

Schrumpf has everyone's attention now, as he and his wife quickly leave the theater. The Schrumpfs can't even remember what movie they went to see. Not that it would have mattered. Eric Schrumpf had room for only one movie in his head, the one where he is in Iraq. Now, more than two years later, Schrumpf has a good job, a strong marriage, a couple of pets, and a life that looks startlingly like everyone else's in Orange County, Calif. But he is still never more than a sound, smell, or thought away from the war. He gets anxious in a crowd, has been known to dive for cover, even indoors, at the sound of a helicopter, reaches for nonexistent weapons to be used in nonexistent circumstances, and wakes up screaming from nightmares about burning bodies and rocket-propelled grenades. "I'll never be the same again," says Schrumpf, who as a weapons and tactics instructor with the 5th Marine Regiment was part of the initial push into southern Iraq in 2003. "The war will be part of my life and my family's life forever."

Reliving the war. Like thousands of soldiers who have returned from Iraq and Afghanistan, Schrumpf is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, a chronic condition whose symptoms include rage, depression, flashbacks, emotional numbness, and hypervigilance. It can be brought on by a single event, such as when a grenade landed next to Schrumpf, ticking off his death and then failing to explode. Or it can be the result of repeated exposure to trauma such as house-to-house firefights or the accidental killing of civilians. "Soldiers who are routinely exposed to the trauma of killing, maiming, and dying are much more likely to bring those problems home," says Army Col. Kathy Platoni, a clinical psychologist and leader of a combat stress-control unit that works with soldiers on the battlefield. At its most basic, PTSD is the inability to flip the switch from combat soldier to everyday citizen and to stop reliving the war at so high a frequency that it interferes with the ability to function.

The problem is as old as war itself. But this time, American soldiers have been assured by the government and the military that the solution will be different: Iraq will be nothing like Vietnam, with its legacy of psychologically scarred veterans whose problems went unrecognized, undiagnosed, and untreated. "The hallmark of this war is going to be psychological injury," says Stephen Robinson, a Gulf War vet and director of government relations for Veterans for America in Washington, D.C. "We have learned the lessons of Vietnam, but now they have to be implemented."

Since the war began, the departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs have stepped up efforts to address the mental health needs of soldiers before, during, and after they are deployed. And more effective treatments for PTSD have been developed. But as the war drags on, the psychological costs are mounting and so is the tab for mental health care. Troop shortages are driving already traumatized soldiers back into combat for three and sometimes four tours of duty. Those who make it home often feel too stigmatized to ask for treatment lest they jeopardize their military careers. And if they do ask, they often can't get the care they need when they need it.

In addition, there are concerns among veterans groups that the Bush administration is trying to reduce the runaway cost of the war by holding down the number of PTSD cases diagnosed (and benefits paid), and that the promise to protect the mental health of nearly 1.5 million troops is not being kept. "Throughout this war, everything has been underestimated-the insurgency, the body armor, the cost, and the number of troops," says Paul Rieckhoff, an Iraq war vet and founder of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America in New York. "Now, the psychological problems and the needs of these soldiers are being underestimated, too."

Just how many troops will bring the war home with them is impossible to know at this point. But the numbers could be substantial. In a study published in 2004 in the New England Journal of Medicine, researchers at the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research found that nearly 17 percent of soldiers who have returned from Iraq, or nearly 1 in 6, showed signs of major depression, generalized anxiety, or PTSD. A report in the Journal of the American Medical Association earlier this year found that 1 in 5 soldiers met the risk for concern. And those numbers are virtually certain to grow as the war enters its fourth year. "I do think we're going to see a whole lot more PTSD as time goes on," says Platoni.

The VA, short of doctors, therapists, and staff in some areas, is straining to meet the mental health needs of the troops who have already returned from Iraq and Afghanistan. Soldiers often wait weeks or even months to see a psychiatrist or psychologist. A 2004 study by the Government Accountability Office found that six of the seven VA medical facilities it visited "may not be able to meet" increased demand for PTSD. "I don't think anybody can say with certainty whether we are prepared to meet the problem because we don't know what the scope is yet," says Matthew Friedman, a psychiatrist and executive director of the VA's National Center for PTSD in White River Junction, Vt. "What we do know is that the greater the exposure to trauma, the greater the chance that someone will have PTSD."

Danger zone. There may be no war better designed to produce combat stress and trauma. Operation Iraqi Freedom is a round-the-clock, unrelenting danger zone. There are no front lines, it's impossible to identify the enemy, and everything from a paper bag to a baby carriage is a potential bomb. Soldiers are targets 24-7, whether they are running combat missions or asleep in their bunks. "There is no moment of safety in Iraq," says Andrew Pomerantz, a psychiatrist and chief of the Mental Health and Behavioral Science Service at the VA Medical Center in White River Junction. "That's one of the things we're seeing in people when they come back-a feeling of an absolute lack of safety wherever they are."

Stories of vets who sleep with guns and knives and patrol the perimeters of their homes obsessively are as common as tales of valor. Marine Lt. Col. Michael Zacchea, 38, who trained Iraqi troops and was in about 100 firefights, knows that paranoia all too well. "Every time I get on the road," says Zacchea, who commutes from Long Island to Wall Street, "it's like I'm back in the streets of Baghdad in combat, driving and running gun battles, with people throwing grenades at me." Zacchea, a reservist, is now being treated for PTSD at a VA hospital, but had it not been for chronic dysentery, migraines, and shrapnel wounds in his shoulder, he says he probably would have been redeployed in September, emotional scars and all.

And he still may be. The military's need to maintain troop strength in the face of historic recruiting lows means many service members, including some suffering from psychological problems like Zacchea, have no choice but to return. President Bush recently authorized the Marine Corps to call up inactive reservists, men and women who have already fulfilled their active-duty commitment. "They're having to go deep into the bench," says Robinson, "and deploy some people who shouldn't be deployed."

Multiple tours. Robinson is referring to the increasing number of reports of service members who stock antidepressants and sleeping pills alongside their shampoo, soap, and razor blades. The Defense Department does not track the number of soldiers on mental health medications or diagnosed with mental illnesses. But the military acknowledges that service members on medication who may be suffering from combat-induced psychological problems are being kept in combat. "We're not keeping people over there on heavy-duty drugs," says Army Surgeon General Kevin Kiley, who estimates that 4 to 5 percent of soldiers are taking medications, mostly sleeping pills. "Four to five percent of 150,000, that's still a lot of troops. But if it's got them handling things, I'm OK with that."

Handling things is a relative term. Army Pvt. Jason Sedotal, 21, a military policeman from Pierre Part, La., had been in Iraq six weeks in 2004 when he drove a humvee over a landmine. His sergeant, seated beside him, lost two legs and an arm in the explosion. Consumed by guilt and fear, Sedotal, who suffered only minor injuries, was diagnosed with PTSD when he returned from his first tour in early 2005 and given antidepressants and sleeping pills. Several months later, while stationed at Fort Polk, La., he sought more mental health care and was prescribed a different antidepressant.

Last November, Sedotal was redeployed. "They told me I had to go back because my problem wasn't serious enough," Sedotal said in an interview from Baghdad in mid-September. Sedotal says he started "seeing things and having flashbacks." Twice a combat stress unit referred him to a hospital for mental health care. Twice he was returned to his unit, each time with more medication and the second time without his weapon. "I stopped running missions, and I was shunned by my immediate chain of command and my unit," says Sedotal, who returned to Fort Polk last week.

Cases like Sedotal's prompted Congress earlier this year to instruct the Department of Defense to create a Task Force on Mental Health to examine the state of mental health care for the military. It is expected to deliver a report to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld in May 2007 and make recommendations for everything from reducing the stigma surrounding disorders to helping families and children deal with the traumatized soldier.

Sending military members who suffer from PTSD back into combat goes straight to one of the toughest issues of the war: how to protect soldiers' mental health and still keep them fighting. It is well-established that repeated and prolonged exposure to combat stress is the single greatest risk factor in developing PTSD.

At the same time, there is tremendous resistance to sending home soldiers who are suffering from psychological wounds, in all but the most severe cases. "If a soldier has some PTSD symptoms," says Kiley, "we'll watch him and see how he does." The expectation "is that we're all in this boat together and we need to drive on to complete the mission," he says, adding that if the situation gets worse, the soldier would most likely be given a couple days of rest to see if he recovers. Once soldiers are evacuated, "they are much less likely to come back."

With that in mind, the DOD has designed a program to manage combat stress and identify mental health problems when they occur. It will include so-called battle-mind training for recruits, which focuses on the emotional fallout of seeing and contributing to the carnage of war and how to deal with it. Once they are in Iraq, there are psychologists and combat stress-control teams, such as Platoni's, who work side by side with troops to help them deal with their emotions and decompress immediately after battle. "Soldiers suffering from combat stress do better if they are treated early, efficiently, and as close to the battlefield as possible," says Col. Charles Hoge, chief of the Department of Psychiatry and Behavioral Sciences at Walter Reed Army Institute of Research.

Currently, there are more than 200 psychiatrists, therapists, social workers, and other mental health experts working with soldiers "in theater." They lend an ear, encourage soldiers to talk about their experiences with each other, and administer whatever short-term remedies they can, including stress-reduction techniques, anger-management strategies, or medications. However, their mission, first and foremost, is to be "force multipliers" who maintain troop strength. Their success is judged by their ability to keep soldiers from going home for psychological reasons. Soldiers are often their allies in this effort, as they feel such guilt and shame over abandoning their units they'll most likely say anything to keep from leaving. "It's a very sticky wicket," says Platoni. "We don't know if our interventions are enough to help them stay mentally healthy, or if they'll suffer more in the long term."

Last year, for instance, Platoni spent four months in Ar Ramadi, near Baghdad, where her battalion was under constant attack by insurgents. "They were watching their fellow soldiers burning to death and thinking they might be next," says Platoni. When a break came, one platoon was removed from combat for 48 hours so they could rest, shower, have a hot meal, and talk to psychologists about what they'd been through. "When they returned to the fighting," says Platoni, "they were able to deal with their fears better and focus on what needed to be done."

When soldiers do return home, the true emotional trauma of war is often just beginning. They go through a cursory post-deployment medical screening and a quick interview with a healthcare worker, who may or may not specialize in mental health. And returning soldiers are far more likely to downplay emotional problems for fear of being shifted from the "go home" line into the "further evaluation" line and being prevented from seeing families and friends.

Macho warrior. Three to six months after they return-the time when PTSD symptoms are the most likely to start becoming obvious-troops are given another mental health screening and may be referred for further evaluation, although the chances are slim. A GAO report issued in May, for instance, found that of the 5 percent of returning veterans between 2001 and 2004 who tested as being at risk for PTSD, fewer than one quarter were referred for further mental health evaluations. William Winkenwerder, assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, took issue with the study: "We're doing more than any military in history to identify, prevent, and treat mental health concerns among our troops. It is a top priority for us." Even with a referral, many veterans and active-duty soldiers will not seek help for fear of being stigmatized. To help break down the barriers, the DOD has begun encouraging high-ranking soldiers to openly discuss the effects that combat and killing can have on a person's psyche. Even so, the military remains dominated by the image of the macho warrior who sucks it up and drives on. According to the VA, the number of PTSD cases has doubled since 2000, to an all-time high of 260,000, but fewer than 40 percent of veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan have sought medical treatment. "This is the military culture," says Schrumpf, who now gets regular therapy and takes medication to help with his PTSD. "If it gets out that you even went to see the medical officer, and it always does, then you're done as a career marine."

In a surprising admission, former Georgia Sen. Max Cleland, who lost three limbs in Vietnam, announced in August that he is being treated for PTSD in the hopes of encouraging other vets to do the same. One of the biggest problems for Vietnam veterans, for instance, was that their psychological wounds went unrecognized and unattended for so long that, by the time they got treatment, many were past of the point of being helped. Cleland is one of a growing crowd of Vietnam vets who are finally seeking help-and competing for VA services-as a result of long-buried feelings stirred up by the Iraq war.

In the past few years, in part because of events such as September 11, there have been advances in therapies for PTSD. "Just because you have PTSD, it doesn't mean you can't be successful in daily life," says Harold Wain, chief of the psychiatry consultation and liaison service at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., the main Army hospital for amputees. Many of the patients Wain sees have suffered catastrophic injuries and must heal their bodies as well as their minds.

Reimagining the trauma again and again, or what's known as exposure therapy, has long been believed to be the most effective way of conquering PTSD. It is still popular and has been made even more effective by such tools as virtual reality. However, therapists are increasingly relying on cognitive behavior therapy or cognitive reframing, putting a new frame around a thought to shift the way a soldier interprets an event. A soldier who is racked with guilt because he couldn't save an injured buddy, for instance, may be redirected to concentrate on what he did do to help. Other approaches such as eye movement desensitization and reprocessing use hypnosis to help soldiers.

For some soldiers, simply talking about what happened to them can be therapy enough. When Zachary Scott-Singley returned from Iraq in 2005, he was haunted by the image of a 3-year-old boy who had been shot and killed accidentally by a fellow soldier. With a son of his own, Scott-Singley couldn't get the picture of the child and his wailing mother out of his head and became increasingly paranoid about his own child's safety. "I was constantly thinking about how people were going to attack me and take him," he says. Scott-Singley twice sought mental health care from the Army. The first time he says he was told that since he wasn't hurting anybody, he didn't have PTSD. The next counselor suggested he buy some stress-management tapes on the Internet and practice counting to 10 whenever he felt overwhelmed. (The VA is legally precluded from discussing a soldier's medical records.) Ironically, Scott-Singley found his therapy on the Web anyway, with his blog A Soldier's Thoughts (misoldierthoughts.blogspot.com). "It feels so much better to know I am not alone."

Outcry. Many veterans say they would also find it therapeutic to hear Bush acknowledge PTSD and the psychological costs of the war instead of downplaying them. Earlier this year, for instance, the Institute of Medicine was asked by Congress to re-evaluate the diagnostic criteria for PTSD, which was established by the American Psychiatric Association in 1980. Critics claim the review was ordered by the Bush administration in an effort to make it harder to diagnose PTSD, which would in turn reduce the amount of disability payments. The number of veterans from all wars receiving disability payments for PTSD, about 216,000 last year, has grown seven times as fast as the number receiving benefits for disabilities in general, at a cost of $4.6 billion a year. And that figure does not include most of the more than 100,000 Iraq and Afghanistan veterans who have sought mental health services. The IOM report, released in June, supported the current criteria for diagnosing PTSD.

Now the institute is looking at the accuracy of screening techniques and how to compensate and treat vets with PTSD, widely regarded as an easy condition to fake. And in another move that infuriated veterans groups, the VA late last year proposed a review of 72,000 cases of vets who were receiving full disability benefits for PTSD to look for fraud. The move prompted such an outcry that it was called off.

Studies and reviews aside, there isn't enough help available to veterans with PTSD. According to a report from the VA, individual veterans' visits to PTSD specialists dropped by 20 percent from 1995 to 2005-"a decrease in capacity at a time when the VA needs to reach out," the report stated. Secretary of Veterans Affairs James Nicholson says the VA sees 85 percent of new mental health patients within 30 days. "But that still leaves 15 percent and that's a big number. Could we do better? Yes."

Bush has called for a record $80.6 billion in the 2007 VA budget. That includes $3.2 billion for mental health services, a $339 million increase over this year's budget. However, those increases are being met by increasing demands for care, as well as rising cost-of-living allowances and prescription drug prices. "The bigger budget doesn't really add up to much," says Rieckhoff.

However frustrating and exhausting the process, most vets can avoid getting help only so long before friends and family push them into counseling or they get in trouble with the law. "It's almost like your family has its own form of PTSD just from being around you every day," says a former Army sergeant who worked as an interrogator in Iraq and asked that his name be withheld. "When I came back I was emotionally shut down and severely paranoid. My wife thought I was crazy and my son didn't realize who I was. Because of them, I got help."

Like many soldiers, he found it at one of more than 200 local Veterans Centers, which offer counseling for PTSD and sexual assault, a growing concern for women in the military. Vet Centers are part of the VA but operate like the anti-VA, free of the delays and bureaucracy. There is almost no paperwork, and the wait to see a counselor is rarely more than a week. It's no coincidence that when Doonesbury character B.D. finally went for help with his PTSD, he went to a Vet Center (story, Page 60). The centers are small and staffed mostly by vets, which creates the feel of a nurturing social environment rather than an institutional one. The free coffee is strictly decaf, and the approach is laid back. "Someone may come in asking about an insurance problem, and as we answer their questions, we ask them how are they feeling," says Karen Schoenfeld-Smith, a psychologist and team leader at the San Diego Vet Center, which sees a lot of Iraq vets from nearby Camp Pendleton. "That's how we get them into it." Many come just to talk to other vets.

It is that same need to talk that keeps Schrumpf E-mailing and phoning fellow marines and returning to Camp Pendleton every couple of weeks to hang out. "It is the only place I can talk about the killing," he says. Next month, Schrumpf will leave California for his home state of Tennessee, where he says it will be easier to raise a family. He's not worried about taking the war with him. In fact, in many ways he is more worried about leaving it behind. "The anger, the rage, and all that is just there," says Schrumpf. "And honestly, I don't want it to leave. It's like a security blanket." Or a movie, that just keeps on playing.

Campaignomics (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

Could it really be as simple as falling gas prices? President Bush is enjoying a bump up in the polls: His approval ratings-as measured by the USA Today/Gallup Poll-have drifted up from the mid-30s in early June to 44 percent now, their highest levels in more than a year. And this rebound comes despite Americans' widespread unhappiness over the war in Iraq, anxiety about rising income inequality, and job insecurity bred of globalization.

Gas prices are down more than 66 cents a gallon in the past seven weeks, easing inflation worries and boosting the stock market, with the Dow Jones industrial average close to a record high. Last week, the Conference Board reported that consumers' outlook for the next six months had improved markedly since August.

The timing for a turnaround certainly is auspicious for Republicans going into the November 7 midterm congressional elections. All year long, Democrats have been trouncing Republicans in the polls, seemingly poised to retake one or both houses of Congress. But the latest Gallup survey found voter preferences split evenly between Democrats and Republicans. Is the economy suddenly giving the GOP a lift? Indirectly, says James Campbell, a University at Buffalo-SUNY political science professor and author of Before the Vote: Forecasting American National Elections. "With congressional elections, the economy only directly matters at the margins," he explains. "But the economy does affect presidential approval ratings, and they do affect congressional elections."

As he stumps for GOP candidates, the president is talking more and more about the economy, first because he believes it is trending his way and second, many suspect, because he wants to distract voters from an unpopular war. Just last week, Bush carried the "good news" economic message to Meyer Tool in Cincinnati, while also continuing to pound home the theme that the Grand Old Party is better equipped to fight the war against global terrorism. That argument has also boosted Bush, some pols believe.

The Chart. The Democrats, of course, aren't convinced about the economy. They've got their own message, focused on uncertainty, anxiety, and stagnation. And there isn't likely to be any letup in the shrill rhetoric as the midterm melee enters its final round. An improving economy-or voters' perception of an improving economy-might just keep the GOP in control of the House of Representatives, the branch that many analysts see as most likely to change hands. At least that's the conclusion of University of Texas-Dallas political science professors Patrick Brandt and Thomas Brunell. The duo just finished testing a forecasting model that attempts to predict the outcome of the battle for the House. Their three main factors are the presidential approval rating, inflation rate (think of it as a proxy for gas prices), and unemployment rate. Using a model-generated prediction of a 43 percent presidential approval rating on Election Day, the Brandt-Brunell formula predicts the GOP will retain 220 seats, a loss of 12 seats but still enough to keep control. And every 2 additional Bush approval points would mean a loss of one seat fewer.

Things Fall Apart (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Right after the 2004 election, it seemed as if Thomas Frank had been completely vindicated. In his book "What's the Matter With Kansas? How Conservatives Won the Heart of America," Mr. Frank argued that America's right wing had developed a permanent winning strategy based on the use of "values" issues to mobilize white working-class voters against a largely mythical cultural elite, while actually pursuing policies designed to benefit a small economic elite.

It was and is a brilliant analysis. But the political strategy Mr. Frank described may have less staying power than he feared. In fact, the right-wing coalition that has spent 40 years climbing to its current position of political dominance may be cracking up.

At its core, the political axis that currently controls Congress and the White House is an alliance between the preachers and the plutocrats — between the religious right, which hates gays, abortion and the theory of evolution, and the economic right, which hates Social Security, Medicare and taxes on rich people. Surrounding this core is a large periphery of politicians and lobbyists who joined the movement not out of conviction, but to share in the spoils.

Together, these groups formed a seemingly invincible political coalition, in which the religious right supplied the passion and the economic right supplied the money.

The coalition has, however, always been more vulnerable than it seemed, because it was an alliance based not on shared goals, but on each group's belief that it could use the other to get what it wants. Bring that belief into question, and the whole thing falls apart.

Future historians may date the beginning of the right-wing crackup to the days immediately following the 2004 election, when President Bush tried to convert a victory won by portraying John Kerry as weak on defense into a mandate for Social Security privatization. The attempted bait-and-switch failed in the face of overwhelming public opposition. If anything, the Bush plan was even less popular in deep-red states like Montana than in states that voted for Mr. Kerry.

And the religious and cultural right, which boasted of having supplied the Bush campaign with its "shock troops" and expected a right-wing cultural agenda in return — starting with a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage — was dismayed when the administration put its energy into attacking the welfare state instead. James Dobson, the founder and chairman of Focus on the Family, accused Republicans of "just ignoring those that put them in office."

It will be interesting, by the way, to see how Dr. Dobson, who declared of Bill Clinton that "no man has ever done more to debase the presidency," responds to the Foley scandal. Does the failure of Republican leaders to do anything about a sexual predator in their midst outrage him as much as a Democratic president's consensual affair?

In any case, just as the religious right was feeling betrayed by Mr. Bush's focus on the goals of the economic right, the economic right suddenly seemed to become aware of the nature of its political allies. "Where in the hell did this Terri Schiavo thing come from?" asked Dick Armey, the former House majority leader, in an interview with Ryan Sager, the author of "The Elephant in the Room: Evangelicals, Libertarians and the Battle to Control the Republican Party." The answer, he said, was "blatant pandering to James Dobson." He went on, "Dobson and his gang of thugs are real nasty bullies."

Some Republicans are switching parties. James Webb, who may pull off a macaca-fueled upset against Senator George Allen of Virginia, was secretary of the Navy under Ronald Reagan. Charles Barkley, a former N.B.A. star who used to be mentioned as a possible future Republican candidate, recently declared, "I was a Republican until they lost their minds."

So the right-wing coalition is showing signs of coming apart. It seems that we're not in Kansas anymore. In fact, Kansas itself doesn't seem to be in Kansas anymore. Kathleen Sebelius, the state's Democratic governor, has achieved a sky-high favorability rating by focusing on good governance rather than culture wars, and her party believes it will win big this year.

And nine former Kansas Republicans, including Mark Parkinson, the former state G.O.P. chairman, are now running for state office as Democrats. Why did Mr. Parkinson change parties? Because he "got tired of the theological debate over whether Charles Darwin was right."

A Party Without Principles (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

After years of single-party government, the prospect of a Democratic majority in the House ought to feel refreshing. But even with Republicans collapsing in a pile of sexual sleaze, I just can't get excited. Most Democrats in Congress seem bereft of ideas or the courage to stand up for them. They clearly want power, but they have no principles to guide their use of it.

On Friday, Harry Reid, the Democratic leader in the Senate, correctly denounced a border-fence bill as a concession "to the radical anti-immigrant right wing" of the Republican Party. It's absurd to fence off 700 miles of the border and leave the other

1,300 miles open; besides, the government lacks the manpower to prevent migrants from defeating the fence with tunnels or ladders. But if blowing billions on this symbolism is a sop to right-wing nuts, why did 26 Senate Democrats vote for the bill while only 17 opposed it?

The day before the immigration vote, the majority of Senate Democrats summoned up the courage to oppose the Bush assault on the nation's traditions of justice. Of course they were right; you don't win a war of ideas by abandoning your most appealing ones. But if the Democrats had made common cause with the bill's Republican opponents, they could have filibustered the president's bill. Why vote against something and simultaneously allow it through? On an issue as basic as access to justice, can't Democrats stand on principle?

These battles dominated last week's headlines, but the Democrats' under-the-radar behavior was even more depressing. A conservative group circulated a petition calling for bipartisan talks on Social Security, with all potential solutions to be part of the discussion. Rather than embracing this eminently sane idea, top Democrats in Congress loudly slammed the door on it.

There's a long tradition of demagoguery on entitlement reform, but refusing even to discuss the challenge plumbs new depths of cynicism. A decade ago, Democratic centrists such as Sen. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska argued that runaway entitlement spending would rob the rest of the budget, draining money from social programs that liberals are supposed to care about. Today, a pragmatic Republican such as Sen. Bob Bennett of Utah can propose a progressive fix to Social Security that does not involve personal accounts. But Democrats won't come forward to support him.

In rejecting Social Security discussions last week, the Democrats painted the conservatives' petition as a Trojan horse designed to get personal accounts back onto the table. Even if that were true, since when was all mention of personal accounts taboo for Democrats? A decade ago, a majority of the appointees to Bill Clinton's Social Security commission came out in favor of personal accounts. Even the dissenting minority was open to the idea of investing Social Security funds in the stock market.

If today's Democratic leaders were even a little bit awake, they would realize that the case for Social Security reform has grown stronger since the Clinton era. It's not just that the budget outlook has deteriorated or that the squandering of a decade renders a solvency fix more urgent. A new body of research shows how the lack of reform threatens core Democratic constituencies.

Social Security benefits were designed in the 1930s to protect traditional couples. But married couples make up a declining fraction of the adult population, particularly among minorities. Since 1970 the married share of the adult population has dropped by 10 percentage points for whites, 14 percentage points for Hispanics and an astonishing 22 percentage points for African Americans. Because Social Security benefits were not designed to protect singles, these changes in family structure are driving up poverty rates among the old. In the early 1990s, 2.4 percent of married retirees lived below the poverty line, according to the Urban Institute. But fully 21.2 percent of divorced retirees were poor, and the rate among never-marrieds was 16.2 percent.

If Democrats cared about poor women and minorities, they would be clamoring to reform Social Security. But instead they get a childish gratification out of stamping their feet and refusing to discuss the subject. They can't muster the courage to block the suspension of habeas corpus. But when it comes to blocking entitlement reform, the Democrats ride out to battle.

I'm not saying that Republicans are at all better, and of course elections breed some policy timidity. But the infuriating thing about the Democrats is that, just a decade ago, they knew how to empathize with voters' economic insecurities without collapsing into irresponsibility; they combined attractively progressive social policies with sensible pro-market fiscal responsibility. Now many in the party have lost interest in this necessary balance. If the Democrats win a measure of power next month, it's hard to see what they will do with it.

'Anything Goes' Administration (WP)

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

THE INTERIOR Department's inspector general says the department suffers from an "anything goes" ethical culture.

"Simply stated, short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," Inspector General Earl E. Devaney told a House Government Reform subcommittee last month. "Ethics failures on the part of senior department officials -- taking the form of appearances of impropriety, favoritism and bias -- have been routinely dismissed with a promise 'not to do it again.' "

At the Education Department, its inspector general found, officials violated conflict-of-interest rules and steered contracts for its $4.8 billion Reading First program to favored textbook publishers.

"They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive deleted by IG] out of them in front of all the other would-be party crashers who are standing on the front lawn waiting to see how we welcome these dirtbags," the Reading First program director, Chris Doherty, wrote about one company in an e-mail to staff members.

Mr. Doherty, you won't be surprised to learn, just left the department to "return to the private sector."

Meanwhile, three top officials at the Department of Housing and Urban Development told the inspector general there that Secretary Alphonso Jackson had said "it was important to consider presidential supporters when candidates for HUD discretionary contracts were being considered."

Mr. Jackson "personally intervened with contractors whom he did not like . . . these contractors had Democratic political affiliations," the inspector general found. The secretary had boasted in a public speech last April that he killed an advertising contract because the recipient had criticized the president -- then dismissed his comments as "anecdotal."

In fact, the investigation found, Mr. Jackson had expressed such political preferences -- there just wasn't evidence that anyone had acted on his wishes.

And then there was the U.S. Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, which sent -- in the account of The Post's Rajiv Chandrasekaran, "the loyal and the willing instead of the best and the brightest" to help rebuild Iraq -- with a screening process that featured questions on whether applicants voted for George W. Bush or even what they thought about Roe v. Wade .

A 24-year-old who lacked a background in finance -- but who had applied for a White House job -- was detailed to reopen Baghdad's stock exchange. The head of a faith-based relief organization that provided health care while promoting Christianity in developing countries was sent to replace a physician with extensive experience in postwar health administration because, the physician was told, the White House wanted a "loyalist" in the job.

These dots connect to form a disturbing picture -- not so much of greed-fueled corruption as of ideologically driven coziness. Those who differ from the party line are excluded from the benefits of power, while those who toe it are welcomed and, if they err, quickly forgiven. A more responsible president would put a quick stop to this. A more responsible Congress would insist.

The GOP Record (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

The 109th Congress has gone home to fight for re-election, and the best testament to its accomplishments is that very few Republicans are running on them. They're running instead against the peril to the country if the Nancy Pelosi Democrats take power.

We'll know in six weeks if this liberal fright mask is enough to save the GOP majority, but it's not too soon to say that Republicans in the 109th have been a major disappointment. The best thing about this Congress is that by doing little at least it did little harm. But despite their best chance in 50 years to reform the creaky institutions of the welfare state, Republicans couldn't maintain the unity or discipline to achieve nearly any of what they promised in 2004. * * *

The one great exception is the confirmation of two new Supreme Court Justices. GOP Senators in particular helped to steer President Bush away from his underwhelming initial choice of White House counsel Harriet Miers toward the distinguished Samuel Alito. With the High Court playing an ever more decisive role in our political life, this may be Mr. Bush's most significant legacy beyond the war on terror.

Republicans also deserve credit for financing the war, which is more than many Democrats say they'll do if they run Capitol Hill. The extension for two more years, through 2010, of the 15% rate on dividends and capital gains will also help sustain the economic growth that is throwing off record revenues to pay for the war even as the budget deficit declines. The recent compromise on terrorist interrogations may also turn out to be historic, putting Congress's imprimatur on the Presidential powers needed to fight an enemy that violates the normal rules of war. Toss in bankruptcy and class-action reform, and some free-trade agreements. That's about it for the good news.

On the liability side, the list of flops is extensive, starting with making the tax cuts permanent, repealing the estate tax and immigration reform. Senate Democrats did their part to kill the first two, but House Republicans get credit for fanning public worry about immigration and then pretending that a 700-mile fence will solve the problem.

Social Security reform was never going to be easy, and Mr. Bush's war-driven decline in job approval meant he couldn't move any Democrats. But that still doesn't excuse such prominent Republicans as Tom Davis (Virginia) and Roy Blunt (Missouri) for resisting their President's reform effort behind the scenes. So frightened were they that they never even brought the subject up for a vote.

Perhaps the most puzzling abdication was the GOP failure to do anything at all on health care. The window for saving private health care from government encroachment is closing, and both business and workers are feeling the pinch from rising costs. Yet Republicans failed to make health-care savings accounts more attractive, failed to let business associations offer their own health plans, and failed even to bring to a vote Arizona Congressman John Shadegg's bill to avoid costly state mandates by letting health insurance be marketed across state boundaries. The biggest winner here is Hillary Rodham Clinton's 2008 Presidential campaign.

Republicans have many explanations for their paltry record, some of them even accurate. The troubles in Iraq sapped Mr. Bush's support, dividing Republicans while uniting Democrats who saw a chance to regain power this fall. Hurricane Katrina blew away whatever hope there was of spending restraint and changed the national conversation from GOP priorities. And Tom DeLay's ethical troubles, and eventual ouster as Majority Leader, created a leadership vacuum.

Yet none of this excuses the more fundamental problem, which is that too many Republicans now believe their purpose in Washington is keeping power for its own sake. The reform impulse that won the House in 1994 has given way to incumbent protection. This is the root of the earmarking epidemic, which now mars every spending bill and has become a vast new opportunity for Member corruption. This is also part of what corrupted Duke Cunningham, Bob Ney, Jack Abramoff, Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon. Power for its own sake also explains the House GOP's decision to join Senate Democrats in killing serious reform of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, despite $16 billion in accounting mistakes or fraud. The Members are in bed with the housing subsidy lobby.

Even amid all of this scandal, many Republicans still refuse to acknowledge any problem. Appropriators continue to resist major budget reform, and the same Republicans who gave a Democratic President the line-item veto in the 1990s refused to give a weaker version to a GOP President this year. No wonder so many loyal Republican voters have been telling pollsters they're not sure if they'll vote this year.

With his party down in the polls, Mr. Bush has tried to recast the midterm election as a referendum on the war on terror. This strategy may yet save Republicans from losing Congress, both because the war is the most important issue of our time and because the Democrats are calling for retreat in Iraq and essentially for a return to the antiterror policies of the 1990s (see below). But it is no credit to the performance of Republicans in this Congress that their best argument for re-election is the wartime flaws of their opponents.

Democrats On The Verge (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

NOT LONG AGO, even the most optimistic Democrats thought the party would be lucky to regain control of the House of Representatives in the midterm elections. Now, buoyed by bad news for President Bush and once-favored GOP incumbents such as the gaffe-prone Sen. George Allen of Virginia, Democrats are daring to dream that they will gain control of both houses of Congress on election day.

Such a change on Capitol Hill would be momentous, of course, which may explain why Bush went into oratorical overdrive last week by caricaturing Democrats as "the party of cut-and-run" in Iraq. But aside from being bad news for some partisans and good news for others, how would a congressional shift affect national and international policy?

On balance, it would be constructive. A Democratic Congress would be more of a check on the presidency, less patient with the U.S. involvement in Iraq, more protective of civil liberties in the war on terror, more willing to allow regressive tax cuts to expire and, in the case of a Democratic Senate, unlikely to approve stridently conservative judicial nominees. It also would be more sympathetic to one of Bush's priorities, comprehensive immigration reform.

The paradox is that, to win control of Congress, Democrats will have to rely on Democrats who sound suspiciously like Republicans.

Which raises the question: What does a politician have to do to get kicked out of his party nowadays? One might ask Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, who is running for reelection as an independent after losing in the Democratic primary for his support of the Iraq war. On the other side of the aisle, one could ask Steve Laffey, a Rove Republican who lost in the primary in part because the Bush administration supported his opponent, Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee, a Rockefeller Republican who disagreed with the White House on a variety of issues but stands a better chance in the general election.

This leads to yet another paradox: As the stakes get higher, party affiliation matters more but means less.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairmen of the Democratic congressional campaign committees, have been willing, even eager, to support candidates who don't toe the party line. Schumer, for example, recruited Pennsylvania Treasurer Bob Casey, an opponent of abortion, to oppose incumbent Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. Yet a victory for Casey, who is ahead in the polls, is vital to hopes of Democratic control. Even on issues on which there is a clear partisan divide, such as the war in Iraq, some Democrats have been allowed to tack to the center.

That's what they call "big tent" politics. But a tent is valuable for what it keeps out as much as for what it lets in. Last week, when the Senate took up Bush's proposal for military commissions to try suspected terrorists, all but one of the 44 Democrats voted to give suspected terrorists the right to file habeas corpus petitions challenging their confinement. But after that amendment was defeated, 12 Democrats, including five whose names are on the ballot next month, voted for a bill that guts the Great Writ. That's not the kind of position Democrats — or Republicans, for that matter — should be standing for.

Curing The Debt Addiction (NYT)

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

The Treasury secretary, Henry Paulson Jr., capped off his recent trip to China with a visit last week to Capitol Hill. His aim was to dissuade Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, from moving forward on their bill to impose punitive tariffs on China. The two senators accuse China of manipulating its currency, the yuan, to gain an unfair trade advantage.

Mr. Paulson was right to try to parry the senators' protectionist efforts, and he has succeeded, for now. But the issue will persist so long as he fails to satisfactorily address a root cause of mounting protectionist pressures: the United States' growing indebtedness to the rest of the world.

Instead, Mr. Paulson recently told reporters that the nation's deficit in trade and other international transactions — on track this year to reach $800 billion, or nearly 7 percent of the economy — is actually a sign of strength. America has kept the world prosperous, he said, by buying global goods.

Come again? America's borrow-and-spend ways have indeed juiced the global economy. But the resulting indebtedness makes the country vulnerable to the protectionism Mr. Paulson wants to avoid, as well as to broader economic disarray.

Many American businesses — and politicians — see the mounting trade deficit and immediately cry foul. Demands for tariffs are the predictable, if misguided, reaction. Protectionism conveniently shifts the blame for trade-related hardships to foreigners, which is easier than adapting homegrown business practices to make America more competitive.

There are other dangers. If lenders like China began to doubt the strength of the American economy, they could put their money elsewhere, driving up American interest rates, perhaps sharply.

To reduce excessive foreign borrowing, it is imperative to reduce the federal deficit. To that end, Mr. Paulson has pledged to help the Bush administration find ways to curb Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. That would certainly cut the budget, but at the cost of weakening the already frayed safety net — at precisely the time when increasing globalization is creating economic hardship for many Americans. It would be far better to start a deficit reduction effort by calling for a moratorium on further tax cuts and allowing other Bush-era tax cuts to expire as scheduled.

That, along with continuing efforts to adjust exchange rates in China and other countries, would lower the risks the United States is now courting.

Democrats' Risky Strategy: Trumpeting The Wealth Gap (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

October 2, 2006; Page A1

WENTWORTH, N.C. -- Many Democratic politicians, shrugging off lessons of recent political history, see this as the year when the widening gap between the rich and the rest of America will help win them votes.

As a group of his constituents munched on pot roast and buttered green beans in a school cafeteria here, Rep. Brad Miller -- a two-term Democrat seeking re-election in a district spanning rural, suburban and urban communities -- launched into what he believes is a winning pitch.

"People who are doing well are doing very well," he said into a handheld microphone, his tie loosened as he walked among the tables. "The rich are doing just fine. But wages aren't budging for the majority of Americans."

The congressman's words resonate here. Although some voters are prosperous suburbanites, others in this district along the Virginia border have lost textile-mill jobs. They've been forced into lower-paying positions with fewer benefits and scant prospect for raises. Pamela Tucker, a mental-health worker from nearby Reidsville, says she can barely keep up. "Things are worse. The taxes, the price of health care, gas," she says. "People don't have the means."

Other Democrats -- including Michigan Sen. Debbie Stabenow in a tough re-election fight and Claire McCaskill in her challenge to Missouri incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent -- are sounding similar themes: The U.S. economy is growing, but the poor and especially the middle class aren't benefiting. The rich are. And President George W. Bush and a Republican Congress are to blame, they argue.

It's a risky bet. Government data do show an unambiguous trend toward a widening gap between the rich and everyone else, a trend that pre-dates Mr. Bush's election in 2000. And yet U.S. electoral history is littered with Democrats who tried to use the inequality issue only to find voters unswayed and Republicans accusing them of "class warfare" or business-bashing.

DOJ_NMG_0073058

"The language of income distribution and income inequality is rarely effective in American politics," says political scientist William Galston, a domestic-policy adviser in the Clinton White House now at the Democratic-leaning Brookings Institution. While Americans may be unhappy that the rich are getting ahead while they're not, most still aspire to be rich and are turned off by candidates who demonize wealth, he says.

"There is little doubt that there has been a 25-year trend of a growing gap, sometimes called income inequality, between the wages of the skilled and the unskilled," says Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers. "While that trend shows no obvious signs of abating in the near future, by some measures inequality has slowed a bit in recent years."

Former Vice President Al Gore touched upon a "people versus the powerful" theme in his unsuccessful 2000 presidential bid. Some strategists say it failed because he didn't push it hard enough. Others say it failed because voters found the message polarizing. During a Democratic Leadership Council forum in 2002, Mr. Gore's running mate, Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, said the strategy made it "more difficult for us to gain support of the middle class, independent voters who don't see America as 'us versus them.'"

Four years later, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's running mate, then-Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, spoke frequently about "two Americas" in which "one America does the work, while another America reaps the reward." They lost, too.

The one recent Democratic candidate to tap economic angst most successfully was Bill Clinton. He talked often in the 1992 campaign about how well the top 1% were doing while others were falling behind. After winning office, he persuaded Congress to raise taxes on the rich. But even his administration divided on how hard to push the issue after Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994. Two close advisers, Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and Labor Secretary Robert Reich, sparred over the populist message.

"I had sat in on enough discussions about swing voters to feel that this crucial section of the electorate reacted badly to anything that sounded like class warfare," Mr. Rubin wrote in his book, "In an Uncertain World." Terms like "corporate welfare," a favorite of then Labor Secretary Reich, could inflame voters, Mr. Rubin said.

Many Democrats say this year the message could draw voters. "This is an issue they [Democrats] are talking about and should be talking about," says Stan Greenberg, a Democratic pollster.

While the war in Iraq continues to be a big issue, Mr. Greenberg and other strategists are advising Democratic candidates to talk often about the economic squeeze on their middle-class base. "Most people are seeing continuing financial pressure -- gas prices, health-care costs -- symbols that, when contrasted with the perception that the macro-economy is doing great and CEOs and others are doing very well, help to underscore what's happening and what's not happening," says Mr. Greenberg.

Some Republicans try to debunk the statistics Democrats cite, arguing that they overstate the income gap by looking at wages, while ignoring health and retirement benefits and tax breaks that help the working poor. Kevin Hassett, director of economic-policy studies at the Republican-leaning American Enterprise Institute, points to an increase in consumer spending as evidence that Americans are doing better than Democratic campaign themes suggest.

Winning Argument

But other Republicans concede that Democrats may have a winning argument when it comes to economic issues this year -- inequality included. "We get clobbered among economy voters," says Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio. "The reason [Democrats] are doing this is they see the people who are uncomfortable about the economy as people who are more likely to vote for them in real numbers."

Since the last recession ended in 2001, the U.S. economy has grown nearly 15%, after inflation. Corporate profits have skyrocketed and the stock market has rebounded. Yet many Americans haven't seen paychecks grow fast enough to keep up with rising prices. While incomes at the top rose, adjusted for inflation, the median household income fell for five years in a row before turning up in 2005. It remains below its 1999 peak. The Census Bureau reports that the top 20% of households claimed 50.4% of all the income in 2005, up from 45.6% in 1985.

Even Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has acknowledged the gap. "Amid this country's strong economic expansion, many Americans simply aren't feeling the benefits. Many aren't seeing significant gains in their take-home pay," he said in an August speech. In another talk, in September, he added, "I believe it is the responsibility for all nations to search for ways to moderate income disparities."

Voters are beginning to take notice of the trend. In early September, a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found the "gap between rich and poor" ranked as the No. 2 economic issue -- after "gas prices and energy costs." Voters most often blamed the gap on "excessive salaries and bonuses" and competition from companies and workers overseas. More than half said they disapproved of the way President Bush was handling the economy.

Economists cite a variety of factors for widening inequality. Technology has favored the most skilled and most educated, and hurt the less qualified.

Globalization has brought competition from millions of new workers around the globe, crimping wages for some workers while boosting demand for others. American unions have grown steadily weaker. And social mores have changed, tolerating much wider pay disparities within the same workplace, be it a manufacturer or a law firm.

Figuring out how to reverse the trend poses a problem for policy makers. Most Democratic candidates favor an increase in the minimum wage, modest proposals for college and child-care tax credits, rolling back some of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, and finding ways to shield Americans against rising gas prices. But beyond that, Democrats candidates haven't fleshed out a program for reversing inequality.

The centrist Democratic Leadership Council is pushing what it has dubbed the American Dream Initiative to counter the "mistaken belief that when the wealthy do even better, the middle class will eventually get their share." The plan, championed by New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, among others, also calls for giving every child a $500 savings bond at birth so every American adult will have a nest egg.

While most candidates aren't citing income statistics on the stump, stagnant paychecks are a subtle, yet constant, thread in many campaigns. To skirt accusations of class warfare and business-bashing -- and to court swing voters -- Democrats focus not on the plight of the poor, but on the notion that middle class workers, despite being more productive than ever before, aren't being rewarded for their hard work.

"Unemployment has been low for some time now and it's pretty clear that the working man and woman is pretty unhappy with their lot and it's not because they're unemployed," says Alan Blinder, a Princeton University economist who worked in the Clinton White House and later was vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. "It's a combination of wages aren't going anywhere, people are losing health insurance and their pensions are under threat. And people are feeling it. At the same time, they're reading about this CEO or that CEO walking off with $100 million for managing their company badly."

Most Outspoken

Among the most outspoken on the issue of inequality is Rep. Miller, a 53-year-old lawyer and former North Carolina state legislator. He has seized on the issue in stump speeches. He has peppered Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke and former Chairman Alan Greenspan with questions about inequality at House hearings. He frequently mentions the names and salaries of highly-paid CEOs in speeches and on the House floor.

Mr. Miller told the Wentworth crowd, for instance, that CEOs make an average of $14 million a year. "Do we see the world through the eyes of Lee Raymond, who just left Exxon Mobil, making $145,000 per day or do we see it through the eyes of the guys working for $545 per week?" he asked. "That's the difference between Republicans and Democrats."

While Mr. Miller is talking about wages, the conservative Republican underdog, Vernon Robinson, a former Winston-Salem city councilman dubbed by the local press as "the black Jesse Helms," is focusing on social issues -- particularly illegal immigration and making English the official U.S. language. He says he hasn't heard much concern from voters about wages, and terms Mr. Miller's focus on CEO pay "pretty esoteric," adding, "He's saying 'vote for me. I'll make sure your boss gets paid less.' "

Other Democratic candidates are doing much the same as Mr. Miller, particularly in the Northeast and Midwest, where the economy is a big issue. In central Ohio, Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy, challenging Republican incumbent Rep. Deborah Pryce, talks frequently on the stump about gas prices, health-care costs and the minimum wage.

"I know how parents feel trying to put their kids through college. I hear all the time how it costs $60 a week to fill up my car and how health care is an enormous cost for all people," Ms. Kilroy, a Franklin County commissioner, said in an interview. Ohioans, she said, are "upset with the economy and Congress and their willingness to give these tax breaks for the super wealthy and burden future generations with the deficit."

At a rally at Ohio State University earlier this year, Ms. Kilroy accused Ms. Pryce of "supporting deep cuts to student loans that will put college out of reach for some lower- and middle-class students."

Ms. Pryce's office says she has never supported cuts to student-loan programs. "Kilroy's campaign has been consistently negative on everything," says her spokesman, George Rasley. "So the fact that they would be negative on the economic situation in Columbus -- by some measures the seventh-best economy in the country -- is no surprise even though it's a big lie." Polls show Ms. Kilroy and Ms. Pryce neck-and-neck.

On the stump in Missouri, Ms. McCaskill, in a stiff race to unseat Sen. Talent, railed against Washington policies that protect "millionaires" at the expense of the middle class. She has proposed a middle-class tax-relief package, arguing that

"Missouri's middle class has been overlooked while the Bush administration has given billions in tax cuts to big corporations and millionaires." She has called for an increase in the minimum wage, and criticized Republicans' eagerness to cut the estate tax.

Consumers Extract Less Cash From Their Homes But Defy Predictions Of Greater Thrift (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

A year into the housing market's slowdown, Americans have yet to snap shut their wallets, defying predictions that the cooling market would have a chilling effect on consumer spending.

This year, despite what appears to be the most significant housing-market slump in more than a decade, the nation's consumers have increased their purchases of goods and services at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of more than 3% -- just as they have for the past two years. "They're not backing off," says Janet Hoffman, managing partner of consulting firm Accenture Ltd.'s North American retail practice.

In recent years, the long run-up in real-estate prices, coupled with a proliferation of low-interest financing options, allowed many consumers to borrow against the rising value of their homes to pay for cars, vacations and home improvements, among other things. Many economists assumed that a slowdown in the overheated housing market would reverse that trend, leading to a big pullback in spending.

So far, however, only half of that equation is panning out: Americans aren't using their houses like ATMs as much as they once did. Even so, their willingness to spend hasn't suffered, though economists don't agree on why.

Data developed by former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and Fed economist James Kennedy suggest consumers "extracted" cash from their homes -- such as through cash-out refinancings or home-equity loans -- at an annual rate of $497 billion in the second quarter. That was down sharply from a peak of $871 billion in the third quarter of 2005.

Bob Moulton, a mortgage broker with Americana Mortgage Group Inc., Manhasset, N.Y., says new applications for home-equity lines of credit and cash-out mortgage refinancings are down 50% from a year ago. Aside from the fact that home prices aren't rising as they used to, higher interest rates are the primary culprit.

Donna Simoes, an office manager in Williston Park, N.Y., took out a $200,000 home-equity line of credit with an interest rate of just under 4% two years ago to finance a bathroom remodeling and other projects. Today, the rate is up to 7.75%, and she rarely uses the credit line. "As the rate started to rise, my stomach started to fall," Ms. Simoes recalls. "I'm not willing to pay that amount of interest."

Even though consumers appear to be tapping home equity less than they have in the past, they are still finding ways to sustain their spending. Even stores that are heavily dependent on the state of the housing market are benefiting from those outlays. Sales at building-material and garden-supply centers are up more than 8% from a year earlier, outpacing the 6.7% year-to-date jump in overall retail sales, according to the Commerce Department. Sales at furniture and home-furnishing outlets are up 6.5% from last year.

There are several possible explanations. First, while housing is slumping -- the median sales price of an existing home is down 1.7% from a year ago, according to the National Association of Realtors -- other parts of the economy aren't. Unemployment remains low at 4.7%, employers are adding workers and incomes are rising. Corporate profits are up, businesses are increasing their capital spending, and exports have picked up this year. Moreover, the sharp drop in gasoline prices that began in August has given consumers a quick boost in purchasing power.

"There are pretty significant offsetting factors, including the fading energy tax and the healthy stock market," says Michelle Meyer, an economist with Lehman Brothers.

A second possibility is that not enough time has elapsed and that the impact of the cooling housing market may still be coming. "It's likely to take another year or so to see the pronounced effects," says Tim McGee, chief economist at U.S. Trust. If the housing market continues to deteriorate over the coming year, Mr. McGee and some other economists say, the decline in home-equity borrowings will combine with a reverse "wealth effect," in which consumers spend less because they feel less wealthy, to depress spending and shave one percentage point or so from economic growth in 2007.

Other observers, however, say that during the housing boom economists exaggerated the role of home-equity borrowing as a driver of consumer spending, and that's why a slowdown or modest decline in real-estate appreciation won't have much impact on consumer buying habits now. "The run-up in housing values over the past several years did not spur much of a bigger-than-expected increase in consumer spending...so we wonder about how large a spending effect one should expect to accompany a fall in housing prices, if that were to occur," Boston Fed President Cathy Minehan said last month.

Ms. Minehan said much of the equity consumers extracted from their homes over the past few years was used to reduce other forms of consumer debt and make home improvements, and that "overall household balance sheets today continue to look fairly strong."

A recent survey done for Deutsche Bank Securities found that homeowners spent only about 14% of the money they cashed out of their homes -- and that didn't go back into their real-estate investments -- on consumer goods and services. The rest was either used to make other investments or to repay debt. Vinay Pande, chief investment adviser at Deutsche Bank Securities, says the survey found consumers "were unconcerned about a housing bubble," so declining house prices probably would have only a slight impact on their spending.

Even if Ms. Minehan and Mr. Pande are underestimating the potential impact of reduced home-equity borrowing, there are other reasons to suspect that consumers will keep spending even as the housing correction plays out. The overwhelming majority of mortgage debt and home-equity loans are held by Americans in the upper half of the income range. Households in the top 10% of income hold 42% of the value of home-equity lines of credit, according to data from the Fed's 2004 Survey of Consumer Finances. Those affluent consumers have already racked up sizable gains in the value of their homes in recent years and can most likely afford to weather a modest pullback without cutting back their spending.

"If you look at the appreciation over the last three to five years, it's still way up," said Pat Conroy of Deloitte & Touche. "Even though we've had a very small downturn the past six to 12 months, that really hasn't put a huge damper on the consumer's mind-set."

Coming Of Wage (WSJ)

By ALLAN HUBBARD And EDWARD P. LAZEAR

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

The U.S. economy has faced challenges from recession to corporate scandals to terrorist attack to natural disasters. And through it all, the economy has proven to be resilient and responsive. In the past three years our economy has grown 3.7% per year, faster than any other major industrialized economy, and added more than 5.7 million payroll jobs, more than all the jobs added in the European Union and Japan combined.

Yet questions understandably arise about whether this economic expansion is paying off for U.S. workers. American workers are among the hardest working and most productive in the world. They deserve to receive their share of the gains in this economic expansion, as they have in past expansions.

A pattern that prevails as the economy moves from recession to recovery, and then into a sustained expansion, is that productivity grows first. The higher productivity growth means higher profits for businesses, which induce them to expand output and then employment. Later, as fewer workers are available for hire, wages grow, profit rates fall, and workers' share of the gains rises. This is what we observed during the last expansion. After the recession in the early 1990s, wage growth was flat. It did not pick up until the last few years of the decade.

We are seeing the same pattern in this economic expansion. Productivity growth has been exceptionally strong in the past five years, well above the historical average. And now employee compensation per hour has also picked up. Over the first half of this year, compensation growth has averaged a remarkable 6.3%, at an annual rate adjusted for inflation. This growth is much faster than in previous years.

As has been the case for many years, higher health-care costs mean much of the growth in compensation goes to benefits. Although benefits are important, workers also naturally care about whether their paychecks are going up.

Recently, nominal wages of production workers have also grown considerably. At an annualized rate, nominal wage growth has been about 4% so far this year, faster than at this point in the last economic expansion. Nominal wages are now growing faster than the past couple of years and are growing at about the same rate as they were in the late 1990s.

The difference between this economic expansion and the last expansion is that higher-than-expected energy prices have consumed much of this strong nominal wage growth. Inflation-adjusted wage growth without the increase in energy prices is similar to past economic expansions. The issue here is energy prices, not wage growth. Workers' paychecks are going up, but they have had to use much of that increase for energy purchases like gasoline.

The recent news on energy prices is good for workers. Nationwide gasoline prices have fallen by about 65 cents per gallon since early August and market data suggest that inflation will fall below the levels of the past few months. This decline, coupled with the nominal growth rates that we see in both compensation and wages, means that workers should enjoy more real earnings in the months ahead.

The Bush administration is pursuing a variety of short and long-term measures to address high energy prices. Last year, the president and Congress enacted the first major energy bill in over a decade. It is a significant first step toward a long-term vision of achieving greater energy security through diversification of energy sources, improved efficiency and increased domestic production. In addition to implementing the new law, the administration is pursuing new ideas for alternative technologies and clean domestic production. For example, the administration and Congress are working to increase research in alternative fuels, and to safely increase domestic oil and natural gas production in the Outer Continental Shelf and Alaska. These and other pro-growth policies will benefit both the overall economy and workers.

Most importantly, American entrepreneurs and companies are investing billions of dollars in creative ideas for new fuels, power resources and better efficiency. Our flexible economy that rewards risk-taking and boosts productivity will also help us produce reliable and cost-effective energy.

With some politicians and commentators criticizing tax relief, free trade, immigration and labor policies, it is important to recognize the truth about wages and the distinctions between this economic expansion and past expansions. Increasing the tax and regulatory burden on our economy will not increase wages or make the current expansion more rewarding for workers. Without the tax relief, workers would be taking home a smaller portion of their paychecks. Higher taxes and a higher regulatory burden would just slow the strong productivity growth that we need to remain competitive in the global economy and increase standards of living.

How Military Credentials Play In November Elections (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

Andrew Duck knows he's a long-shot candidate for Congress. He's running against a seven-term incumbent, Roscoe Bartlett (R) of Maryland. He's a Democrat in a deeply red district. And he's raised only $150,000 so far, in an era when you need many times that to be taken seriously.

But he's got something on his résumé that Representative Bartlett doesn't have: 20 years of service in the Army, including time on the ground in Iraq. Will that make a difference? Probably not. Incumbents are tough to defeat. But, Mr. Duck says, when Republican voters hear his history, they're willing to give his flyer a second look.

For most of the 51 Democratic military veterans running for Congress this fall as nonincumbents - 50 for the House and one for the Senate - the climb is steep. In the House, only six are in competitive races, as defined by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. The one Democratic Senate challenger who's a vet, Jim Webb of Virginia, is locked in a tight race against Sen. George Allen (R) after a series of mishaps by the senator.

Of the 40 Republican military vets running for the House as challengers, only five are in competitive races. So the military credential has not been a big boon to either party's roster. But the Democratic Party, which has struggled for decades with an image of weakness on security, has tried to make more of their candidates' military service than has the GOP. And even if winning election to Congress is beyond the reach of many Democratic vets, they argue that they can still help their party.

"We offer them [the Democrats] something that they didn't have when we came to the party," says Duane Burghard (D), a Navy vet who is running against Rep. Kenny Hulshof (R) of Missouri. "We can stand up with authority and legitimacy that, in fact, the Democrats offer veterans and national security a better chance."

Last week, the group VETPAC, the Veterans' Alliance for Security and Democracy political action committee, held an event on Capitol Hill in support of Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who has taken major heat from Republicans for his turn against the Iraq war last year. VETPAC took over earlier this year as the lead nonparty group supporting Democratic military vets running for Congress as challengers, after the demise of the group Band of Brothers. Fundraising for VETPAC has been slow; before a fundraiser last week, it had raised only about $35,000.

Republicans say that the Democratic focus on veterans as candidates - highlighted in a party Web page called "Fighting Dems" - has been a failure. "This is the most overdone story of this cycle," says Danny Diaz, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee. "They are trying to use veterans as a PR tool and it's not working."

Still, in at least one competitive race, Rep. Rob Simmons (R) of Connecticut is using the lack of military service by his opponent, Joe Courtney, against him in a TV ad. So it may be that in some cases, military service insulates candidates from potential charges that they are weak on defense.

In the cases where Democratic vets are running competitive races, it's hard to say if it's military service that has made the difference. An impressive résumé doesn't get a challenger far without political and fundraising skill. It also helps if the incumbent is vulnerable and the political leanings of the district are favorable.

Joe Sestak, a retired vice admiral in the Navy, has raised more than $1 million and is giving 10-term Rep. Curt Weldon (R) of Pennsylvania a run for his money. Because of Admiral Sestak's high-level service, including time in the White House, "he has relationships with donors and political types that regular service-members don't have," says Amy Walter, House race analyst for the Cook report.

But "people know Weldon, he has a relationship with voters," Ms. Walter adds. "Will those relationships outweigh a desire for change?"

DOJ_NMG_0073063

According to the Cook list, the other competitive Democratic challengers who are vets running for Congress are: Ken Lucas of Kentucky, Tammy Duckworth of Illinois, Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania, Chris Carney of Pennsylvania, and Eric Massa of New York.

Among GOP veterans running as challengers, the five competitive candidates are: Van Taylor of Texas, Chris Wakim of West Virginia, Max Burns of Georgia, Martha Rainville of Vermont, and Mac Collins of Georgia.

Bush The 'ATM' Readies Campaign Blitz (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's calendar this month will be filled with political events on behalf of GOP candidates for the House of Representatives, Senate and governor's offices, including a three-day Western swing starting today.

"The fact is we've got more requests than time," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Much of the focus this campaign season has been on the vulnerability of Republicans, who have controlled Congress for 12 years. This year, they face a public that a number of polls show is at best ambivalent about the war in Iraq and questions Bush's leadership.

In his public stump speeches, Bush says history and the voters will vindicate the decision that has become pivotal to the campaign: Iraq.

"Americans face the choice between two parties with two different attitudes on this war on terror," Bush said recently at a campaign stop for Alabama Gov. Bob Riley and the Republican Governors Association. He attacked Democrats as "the party of cut and run" in Iraq.

Over the next three days, Bush will stump and raise money for House candidates in Nevada, Arizona and California.

In the Golden State, Republican incumbent Reps. John Doolittle and Richard Pombo have had to answer questions about ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Both deny any impropriety or wrongdoing. Bush will try this week to help Bob Beauprez in Colorado, where the congressman lags in the polls in his bid for governor.

White House political affairs director Sara Taylor said Bush will have an "aggressive schedule" leading up to Election Day but declined to detail the president's complete itinerary.

"We're cognizant of the fact we need to turn out the vote," Taylor said. "We need to turn out Republicans to win a lot of these districts."

Democrats need 15 seats to retake the House and six seats in the Senate. Republicans have 22 governorships on the line Nov. 7.

Bush's approval rating is 44% in the most recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, his highest in a year. Some GOP candidates, such as House hopeful Rick O'Donnell, who is running for Beauprez's House seat in Colorado, have called on Bush to develop a new plan in Iraq. Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele and others have played down their Republican connections.

Many Democrats wield the Iraq war as a weapon against Bush and the Republicans. Sarah Feinberg of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee listed at least 15 House candidates who have criticized Bush in their ads against Republican opponents. Bush is also featured in Senate ads for Democrats in Virginia, New Jersey, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Arizona and Rhode Island, according to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

None of that has diminished Bush's ability to raise money. A record-setting fundraiser for his own campaigns, Bush through Friday has raised $182 million for Republican candidates and organizations, the Republican National Committee says. That's closing in on the at least $188 million he took in during the 2001-02 campaign season, according to published reports.

"For Republicans, he's like an ATM machine," said Stuart Rothenberg, publisher of a non-partisan political report. "Otherwise, they want to stay away from him."

DeWine Senate Race Now Dead Heat (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

A new poll shows the Ohio U.S. Senate race between the Republican incumbent, Sen. Mike DeWine, and his Democratic opponent, Rep. Sherrod Brown, in a statistical dead heat, and yesterday Mr. DeWine attempted to distance himself from President Bush before next month's midterm elections.

In a televised debate between the two lawmakers on NBC's "Meet the Press," Mr. DeWine said he would not have voted for the war in Iraq if he had known Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein's regime did not possess weapons of mass destruction.

He also said he doesn't have confidence in Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "He's made major mistakes in this war. There's absolutely no doubt about it."

DOJ_NMG_0073064

The Mason-Dixon poll of 625 registered Ohio voters shows Mr. Brown leading Mr. DeWine 45 percent to 43 percent, with a four-point margin of error. In the same poll, Mr. DeWine is trailing Mr. Brown among independent voters, 52 percent to 33 percent.

Mr. DeWine also attempted to separate himself yesterday from the term "cut and run," a popular phrase among Republicans to describe Democrats' position regarding the war on terror.

"I don't know what it means," he said. "I don't know what it means to people."

In a speech to Republican donors Thursday, Mr. Bush described the Democrats as "the party of cut and run" when defending his administration's strategy on Iraq and the overall war on terrorism.

Nonetheless, Mr. Brown accused Mr. DeWine of being too close to Mr. Bush's policies.

"People who sit on the intelligence committees, like Mike DeWine, simply haven't done their jobs. They've not demanded accountability," Mr. Brown said. "They didn't demand a plan to reconstruct Iraq and rebuild Iraq. And then they didn't demand any kind of exit strategy."

Much of the NBC debate focused on Iraq, with Mr. DeWine and Mr. Brown offering their own ideas about how best to resolve the conflict and bring U.S. troops home. Mr. DeWine said he does not support a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops, while Mr. Brown, who voted against the war, said U.S. commanders should initiate a plan for troop withdrawal within two years.

When it was pointed out that he voted in favor of a 1998 resolution calling for regime change in Iraq, Mr. Brown said he supported the resolution under the reasoning that economic sanctions would be enough to force Saddam from power.

"Without military action?" Mr. Russert asked.

"Well, I don't know. We might have," Mr. Brown said.

It has been an especially difficult year for Republicans in Ohio. Gov. Bob Taft and Rep. Bob Ney both pleaded guilty to corruption-related charges, and the state has one of the higher casualty rates among U.S. troops serving in Iraq. Ohio Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell, the once-promising Republican gubernatorial candidate, now trails his Democratic opponent, Rep. Ted Strickland, by double digits.

"The climate, as they say, in politics is not good. But Ohioans know me," Mr. DeWine said when asked if his campaign was negatively being affected by outside forces. "I've served Ohioans, starting as a county prosecutor in 1976, for 30 years. I think they know my integrity. I think they know my honesty. I think they know who I am."

However, Mr. Brown said, "It's a bit more than a perception," and pointed out that Mr. DeWine previously had accepted campaign contributions from disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Mason-Dixon poll shows 10 percent of voters remain undecided about which candidate they will support, meaning either candidate is well within striking distance with just over a month before Election Day.

New Polls Detail Senate Campaigns In Three Pivotal States (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - Democrats are slightly ahead of Republicans in three election battleground states that will help determine control of the Senate, a series of polls released Sunday showed.

In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester had the support of 47 percent of registered voters while incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns had the support of 40 percent.

In Ohio, Democrat Rep. Sherrod Brown had 45 percent of registered voters, while incumbent Republican Sen. Mike DeWine had 43 percent.

In Tennessee, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr. had 43 percent and former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, the Republican Senate nominee, had 42 percent.

Democrats probably must win all three races if they're to take back control of the Senate on Nov. 7. They need to gain six seats overall, and these three are among the six seats currently held by Republicans that are considered most vulnerable.

Another Republican incumbent, Sen. George Allen of Virginia, was locked in a 43-43 percent dead heat with Democratic challenger James Webb, according to a poll released Friday by McClatchy Newspapers and MSNBC.

The surveys underscored how much these states are up for grabs and how much rides on the final five weeks of campaigning. The work of both major parties to get their supporters to turn out on Election Day could prove decisive. One in 10 voters remain undecided in Montana and Ohio, 12 percent in Virginia and 14 percent in Tennessee.

The polls were all conducted by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc. for newspapers in each of the states - the Lee Newspapers in Montana, the Cleveland Plain Dealer in Ohio and the Memphis Commercial Appeal and Chattanooga Times Free Press in Tennessee. Each state poll was of 625 registered voters and had an error margin of plus or minus four percentage points. The polls were taken between Sept. 25 and Sept. 28.

Mason-Dixon conducted a broader series of polls for McClatchy Newspapers and MSNBC in seven other closely fought Senate battleground states. Virginia results were released Friday, the other six will be released Monday.

In Tennessee, Mason-Dixon found the contest close in the fight for the Republican-held seat being vacated by Sen. Bill Frist, the majority leader who is retiring to run for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

Ford is running as a tough-minded moderate in a state that has trended Republican and did not even support Tennessee son Al Gore when he was the Democratic presidential nominee in 2000. Ford supports the death penalty, voted for the Patriot Act, and aired one ad featuring him in the church where he was baptized.

The congressman led among women 47-38 percent, and among Democrats 88-4 percent.

He also led among his fellow African-Americans by a margin of 91-3 percent. If he were to win the election, he'd be the first popularly elected African-American U.S. senator from the South.

Corker will not be outflanked to the right, however. He supports the Iraq war, vows tougher border security, and supports gun rights. He stresses that he cut violent crime while mayor, though the size of the reduction is disputed.

Corker led among men by 46-to-39 percent, among Republicans by 76-to-10 percent and among independents by 43-to-33 percent. He led among whites by 49-to-35 percent.

In Montana, Burns has two problems: his mouth and his friends.

Known for crusty speaking since his days as a farm radio host, Burns strikes some Montanans as down to Earth, others as embarrassing. In the most recent example, he told some Virginia firefighters who came to Montana to help fight a wildfire that they'd done "a piss poor job."

But it's his association with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff that could hurt him more. Burns took nearly $150,000 in Abramoff-related contributions before returning them. Also, two of his aides went to the 2001 Super Bowl on Abramoff's tab.

Tester, president of the state Senate, repeatedly hits Burns on ethics. "I won't sell Montana down the road by cutting deals with lobbyists like Jack Abramoff," Tester said in a recent debate.

In Ohio, Republican DeWine also has two problems. His are named President Bush and Ohio Gov. Bob Taft, both fellow Republicans.

Other polls have shown that Bush and the Iraq war are unpopular in Ohio, and that Taft's popularity dropped after he pleaded guilty to misdemeanor charges stemming from a statehouse ethics scandal.

DeWine is far from out of the race, however. To differentiate himself from Bush, he campaigns as a pragmatist who works both sides of the political aisle to get things done in the Senate. That's underscored by his role as one of the Senate's "Gang of 14" that forged a compromise last year to allow confirmation of several federal judges while preserving the minority's right to filibuster, or block, other nominations.

DeWine led among men by 47-43 percent, but trailed among women 47-39 percent. He and Brown each had support from about 80 percent of their party's base - but Brown led among independents by 52-33 percent.

The Mason-Dixon poll of 625 registered voters in each state was conducted by telephone Sept. 25-27 in Ohio and Tennessee and Sept. 26-28 in Montana.

Ohio Candidates For Senate Debate On Iraq (USAT)

USA Today, October 2, 2006

Rivals in Ohio's Senate race held their first televised debate Sunday, arguing on ABC's Meet the Press about Iraq and how to improve the situation. The Democratic National Committee has targeted GOP Sen. Mike DeWine's seat as key to efforts to gain a Senate majority.

Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, who voted against giving President Bush the authority to go to war in 2003, seized on the recent disclosure of a secret intelligence report and new books saying the war has increased terrorist threats. Brown accused DeWine of backing the status quo in Iraq and failing, as a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, to hold the Bush administration accountable.

DeWine distanced himself from Bush's comments last week that Democrats had become the “party of cut-and-run,” saying he did not know what that statement meant. DeWine said there would not have been a vote for war in 2003 if intelligence about the threat from Iraq's suspected weapons of mass destruction had been accurate.

Dean encourages voting by mail

Democratic Party chief Howard Dean said he's trying to improve the turnout of minority voters who support Democrats by encouraging mail-in ballots, a tactic he said Republicans have used effectively. He said Democrats are testing the tactic in a New Mexico congressional race this year. If the plan works, “we're going to do that in 2008 all over the place,” Dean said at the party's annual Hispanic leadership summit Saturday in Washington. In New Mexico's largely Democratic 1st District, home to what Dean called a Democratic National Committee pilot project, five-term Republican Rep. Heather Wilson is challenged by Democratic Attorney General Patricia Madrid, who grew up in a Hispanic household near the border.

Romney supports crackdown with a twist

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney told New Hampshire Republicans at their annual convention Saturday that he supports plans to reduce illegal immigration from Mexico but that the United States should do more to keep foreign students who come here and earn advanced degrees. “Let me tell you, you get a Ph.D. here in one of our great institutions, I want you to stay,” Romney said. “It makes no sense that we put up a big concrete wall against those who have education and skills but our doors have been wide open to people that have neither.”

Polls: Top Senate Races Very Competitive (AP-Y)

AP, October 2, 2006

Democratic Rep. Harold Ford is running even with Republican Bob Corker in Tennessee, while Democrat Jon Tester has edged ahead of Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana, according to polls released Sunday for some of the most contested Senate races.

The findings suggest an intensely competitive campaign for Congress heading into the Nov. 7 elections.

Republican Sen. Mike DeWine is in a virtual tie with Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown in Ohio.

The three races are three that Democrats need to win if they are to take control of the Senate.

The Mason-Dixon polls done for various media outlets found:

_Ford had the backing of 43 percent in Tennessee, while former Chattanooga, Tenn., Mayor Corker was backed by 42 percent. Corker had a lead in midsummer polling matching the two.

_Tester has pulled ahead of Burns in Montana, by 47 percent to 40 percent. They were tied in August polling.

_Brown had 45 percent and DeWine had 43 percent in Ohio, findings similar to those of a Quinnipiac poll released a week ago.

The polls were conducted for MSNBC, McClatchy Newspapers and newspapers in each of the states — The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer, the Lee Newspapers in Montana and The Commercial Appeal of Memphis, Tenn., and Chattanooga Times Free Press in Chattanooga, Tenn.

The polls of 625 registered voters in each state were conducted Sept. 25-28. They had margins of sampling error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

The G.O.P.'s Secret Weapon (TIME)

By Mike Allen, James Carney

Time, October 2, 2006

The polls keep suggesting thatÂ Republicans could be in for a historic drubbing. And their usual advantage--competence on national security--is constantly being challenged by new revelations about bungling in Iraq. But top Republican officials maintain an eerie, Zen-like calm. They insist that the prospects for their congressional candidates in November's midterms have never been as bad as advertised and are getting better by the day. Those are party operatives and political savants whose job it is to anticipate trouble. But much of the time they seem so placid, you wonder whether they know something.

They do. What they know is that just six days after George W. Bush won re-election in 2004, his political machine launched a sophisticated, expensive and largely unnoticed campaign aimed at maintaining G.O.P. majorities in the House and Senate. If that campaign succeeds, it would defy history and political gravity, both of which ordain that midterm elections are bad news for a lame-duck President's party, especially when the lame duck has low approval ratings. As always, a key part of the campaign involves money--the national Republican Party is dumping at least three times as much into key states as its Democratic counterpart is--but money is only the start. "Panic results when you're surprised," says Republican National Committee (R.N.C.) chairman Ken Mehlman. "We've been preparing for the toughest election in at least a decade."

Thanks to aggressive redistricting in the 1990s and early 2000s, fewer than three dozen House seats are seriously in contention this election cycle, compared with more than 100 in 1994, the year Republicans swept to power with a 54-seat pickup in the House. Then there's what political pros call the ground game. For most of the 20th century, turning out voters on Election Day was the Democrats' strength. They had labor unions to supply workers for campaigns, make sure their voters had time off from their jobs to go to the polls and provide rides to get them there.

Now, though, Democrats are the ones playing catch-up when it comes to the mechanics of Election Day. Every Monday, Ã¼berstrategist Karl Rove and Republican Party officials on Capitol Hill get spreadsheets tallying the numbers of voters registered, volunteers recruited, doors knocked on and phone numbers dialed for 40 House campaigns and a dozen Senate races. Over the next few weeks, the party will begin flying experienced paid and volunteer workers into states for the final push.

The Senate Republicans' campaign committee calls its agents special teams, led by marshals, all in the service of the partywide effort known as the 72-Hour Task Force because its working philosophy initially focused on the final three days before an election.

So Republicans hope to close the deal in tight races with a get-out-the-vote strategy that was developed in the wreckage of the 2000 presidential campaign. Bush's team was led then, as it is now, by Rove, Bush's political architect and now White House deputy chief of staff, and Mehlman, then White House political-affairs director. Their theory was that Bush lost 3% or 4% of his expected vote in 2000 because those people just stayed home.

What Rove and Mehlman wanted to figure out was the code for increasing the number of Republican voters who could be reliably summoned to the polls--a code that, once cracked, could be used to win election after election. "We want to turn 75%-Republican areas into 78%- or 79%-Republican areas while at the same time turning 15% areas into 18% or 19% areas," says Mike DuHaime, political director of the R.N.C.

In the off year of 2001, the creators of the 72-Hour program tested it in odd, lower-profile contests, including court races in Pennsylvania. The Bushies picked clusters of precincts where they quietly tried their new methods, then compared those with similar precincts where the campaigns did things the more traditional way. Those experiments helped Republicans develop a handful of precepts that constitute the party's playbook for this fall:

1. Learn from the past Fifteen G.O.P. data experts spent months after the '04 election comparing turnout records from the swing states with the Bush-Cheney campaign's databases to figure out the optimal amount of mail, phone calls and door knocks that would persuade a probable G.O.P. voter to go to the polls.

2. Draw in new voters The Bush-Cheney campaign used state records to locate potential Republicans with Florida State University license plates, then had fellow Seminoles call them to sound out their views. Whereas parties used to go after certain precincts or ZIP codes, Republicans now know even which individual households they want through microtargeting--the use of computerized consumer data, from magazine subscriptions to charitable contributions, to help locate voters who are likely to vote Republican if they turn out. Other telltale signs of potential latent Republicanism are snowmobile ownership and enrollment in private schools.

3. Low tech can be better Caller ID, TiVo, cable channels and satellite radio all make it harder to reach voters than it was just a few years ago, increasing the importance of person-to-person appeals, the hallmark of old-fashioned, grassroots campaigns that used to connote an amateur or a low budget. "You clearly have to have TV ads," says White House political-affairs director Sara Taylor, "but for a little less TV, you can buy a whole lot of pizzas and phone lines and salaries for young men and women right out of college" to make phone calls, knock on doors and recruit and manage volunteers.

4. Details, details The shopping list includes everything from chairs to cell phones for hundreds of workers for Republican Party victory committees, whose staffs are charged with creating state turnout machines. The G.O.P. says their volunteer forces in '04 proved to be more effective than the paid workers contracted by Democrats, unions and Democrat- oriented fund-raising groups. Even Election Day comes sooner for Republicans, who have begun putting a huge effort into locking down absentee voters and vote-by-mail ballots in states that use them.

5. Spend more Republican officials estimate that at the end of August, their committees and campaigns had $235 million to spend in the two-month home stretch, a $58 million advantage over Democrats. The R.N.C. plans to lay out more than $60 million on turnout efforts and advertising vs. the more than $14 million set aside by Democratic National Committee (D.N.C.) chairman Howard Dean. Senator Hillary Clinton of New York, who has been critical of Dean's approach, complained at a D.N.C. fund-raising luncheon in Washington last week that the G.O.P. "is pouring tens of millions of dollars into races, and we're not matching that." House Republican officials contend that many of their Democratic challengers are so little known that they could be buried in an ad blitz. "You hit them, and they fold like a house of cards," a strategist said.

Republicans had begun to feel better about the election recently after Bush got a bump in the polls, reflecting a steady decline in gas prices and a successful effort by the White House to push national-security issues to the top of the news. But by last week G.O.P. operatives were less elated. Newscasts were trumpeting the tales of infighting in Bush's war cabinet told in Bob Woodward's State of Denial, a book full of stories about an Administration pursuing a war with no clue how to go about it. And Representative Mark Foley, a Republican from Florida, resigned after his X-rated Internet chats with teenage boys from the House page program were made public. A safe seat for Republicans was suddenly in jeopardy.

Republicans acknowledge one ominous vulnerability: for more than a decade, the party has benefited from an intensity gap. Stoked by hatred of Bill Clinton or love for George W. Bush, G.O.P. voters have been more certain to vote than Democrats--meaning that the party tends to perform better than the final opinion polls suggest. Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, head of the House Democrats' campaign committee, recently told TIME that gap had counted for as much as 5 to 7 points for the Republicans. But he thinks this election year might be different. "Their voters are unhappy," he says. "They're despondent about a failed President."

White House officials also concede they aren't so sure that Republicans will be motivated to go to the polls this year. Of course, expressions of doubt on the part of senior Republicans could be part of another game the G.O.P. plays better than the Democrats do these days: the expectations game. The Republicans are, after all, in the enviable position of being able to lose a lot. As long as they end up keeping control of both houses, they still come out the winner on Election Day. Sparks In The Heartland (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

NORTH VERNON, IND.-Democratic congressional candidate Baron Hill can't say for certain that the recent drop in gas prices represents an attempt by oil companies to boost Republican fortunes in the midterm elections, but he won't rule it out, either. "The best thing that happened to the oil companies is the oil men in the White House," Hill says, munching on tuna salad at a table of supporters in the White Front Cafe on the main drag of this postage-stamp-size town. "You can't say for certain, but why else would they be coming down?"

Hill's concern over possible collusion between oil companies and the GOP-a charge rejected by mainstream economists-is a sign of just how closely his chances for victory in November, along with those of dozens of other Democrats in competitive House and Senate races, may be tied to voter attitudes about the economy. A former congressman fighting for the seat he lost in 2004 to current Rep. Mike Sodrel in Indiana's Ninth District, Hill insists there is still plenty of evidence of what the Democratic Party has branded the "middle-class squeeze": stagnant incomes paired with rising costs for healthcare, education, and other staples of the American dream. "We're seeing a rich man's economic recovery," says Hill. Supporters at his table, including Mike Marshall, a struggling bar owner, and Karen Snyder, a teacher whose school may begin charging parents to help fuel school buses, nod in agreement.

Robust. But Sodrel, considered one of the most vulnerable Republicans in the House of Representatives, says that signs of the robust national economy abound in his southeastern Indiana district. He points to recently unveiled plans by Honda to build a plant that will employ 2,000 workers just outside the district and an announcement by a barge manufacturer along the Ohio River that it will hire up to 1,000 new workers in coming years: "The economy in the Ninth is doing good, and the outlook is good." The main impediment to such growth, Sodrel says, would be Democratic-backed tax hikes.

While the debate over the Iraq war and national security has absorbed most of the national media spotlight going into the midterms, the question of whether voters share the Democrats' gloomy view of the national economy or the more upbeat Republican assessment is expected to be almost as important in determining which party will control Congress next year. "The war on terror and the economy are the two mega-issues of this election," says Republican pollster Whit Ayres. Democratic pollster Mark Mellman points out that, when voters are asked about the top problem facing the country, Iraq is the most frequent response, but when asked about their top personal concern, healthcare and the economy are more common answers. "No matter what the national media write [about Iraq]," says Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, who is challenging Sen. Mike DeWine in Ohio, "people in Ohio are mostly talking about the 200,000 lost jobs under Bush and college tuition at state universities doubling. It's much more about people's everyday lives."

A Graham But Not Some Cracker (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

Sen. Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, seems to be just about everywhere these days. By 4 p.m. one recent Tuesday, the boyish-looking conservative had already led a Republican meeting on a detainee agreement he helped broker, held two press conferences, gone to a hearing on judicial nominations, and conducted several media interviews.

He wasn't always this popular. In fact, Graham has had more than a few moments of loneliness-his parents died when he was in college. But in the four short years he has been in the Senate, this independent-minded military lawyer has quickly become a key player-known both for his willingness to challenge the Bush administration and his ability to work across the aisle. This mix of talents has won him a host of admirers, some of whom think he might someday be presidential timber, as well as a few grumbles from conservatives back home.

Graham insists he's not a maverick, though that term has often stuck to him. Instead, he says, he's just applying life lessons to politics. "I constantly try to prevent myself from getting in a comfort zone of political decision making that would take off the table a boldness that I think our country needs," says Graham.

Breaking ranks. Recently, Graham, 51, has been front and center in the debate over the treatment of suspected terrorists. Graham's 22 years as a reserve Air Force lawyer has put him at odds with the Bush administration over the issue. And he often breaks ranks with Republicans on other subjects too, from Medicare to Social Security. On immigration, he supported President Bush's plan for a guest-worker program, which has angered many House conservatives. But make no mistake, Graham is not a moderate. The American Conservative Union gave him a 96 percent rating for his 2005 voting record; as a House member, he helped lead the drive to impeach President Bill Clinton.

All this has kept his constituents pretty happy. Since filling the late Sen. Strom Thurmond's shoes four years ago, Graham, a Baptist who has never married, has scored approval ratings between 65 and 70 percent. "South Carolinians generally like that he's independent ... and he doesn't lose touch with the little person," says Cole Blease Graham Jr. (no relation), a University of South Carolina political science professor.

Some of that popularity stems from the fact Graham never seems to forget where he came from. He was raised in the back room of a restaurant/bar that his parents ran in the small textile mill town of Central. He was often in charge of the pool hall downstairs. "When you own a bar," he says, "you learn a lot about people."

After Graham's parents died while he was attending the University of South Carolina, his 13-year-old sister went to live with an aunt and uncle, and Graham visited her on weekends. Once Graham finished law school, he legally adopted the sister and joined the Air Force as a judge advocate. He gained notoriety for a case involving drug testing that made the Air Force stop using a flawed urinalysis program. He later transferred to Germany to work as a military prosecutor.

How Will The Clintons Harness The Political Force Of The Blog? (USAT)

By David D. Perlmutter

USA Today, October 2, 2006

Recently, Bill Clinton went to the blogs. Now the political world might never be the same.

While blogging has caught oneverywhere, presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton still does not blog — or at least not much. But her husband's lunch with leftbloggers such as Atrios, MyDD's Matt Stoller, Daily Kos' McJoan and Americablog's John (according to TalkLeft.com) might signal an innovative commitment to blogging for the office of commander in chief.

The attractions of blogging for politicians are many. Blogging directly reaches a national (and even global) audience without the filtering of the newspaper or the price of TV time. Blogging can render an aura of intimacy difficult to attain via traditional mass media. Blogging is also a boon for politicians out of the public eye. Former Democratic vice presidential candidate John Edwards blogs and guest blogs and meets with bloggers.

The disadvantages of blogging for politicians are that it takes up time and that its stream-of-consciousness nature is a minefield of possible gaffes. Bloggers and their readers are high-maintenance. During Howard Dean's effort in 2003-04, the campaign found it hard to keep up with the comments by bloggers on their websites, and thus many felt ignored.

These issues dog Hillary. She has been attacked regularly by leftbloggers for her centrist-to-conservative stances on issues such as the Iraq war and flag-burning. Her poll numbers are holding up, but political professionals understand that wildfires on the edges of public opinion can spread to the center.

What, then, should be Hillary's blog strategy?

Ignore the leftblogs.

Hillary could do nothing with, to or about Democratic blogs, assuming that they end up supporting her if she wins the first few presidential primaries. But bloggers are not a herd to be led. Also, there is the fear-and-loathing factor: George W. Bush and the Iraq war have spurred immense anger and mobilization of leftblogs. It is not clear that the 2008 Republican nominee (say, John McCain) will generate as much antipathy, especially if he promises an eventual pullout from Iraq. Nevertheless, as leftblogger Natasha “Pacific Views” Celine notes, any Republican who is conservative enough to win his party's nomination will be perceived as quite threatening enough to motivate the online Democratic left.

Attack the leftblogs.

An intriguing option for Hillary is to use (or rather abuse) leftblogs to push her appeal to middle voters via a “Sister Souljah” moment, referring to the time in 1992 when Bill Clinton criticized the black, female rap artist. The political implication was that Clinton came off as a moderate Democrat not beholden to an “extremist” of the left and thus was more acceptable to sociocultural moderates and conservatives.

It might be tempting to “dis” a leftblog, preferably one that has made some heated statement about the Iraq war that is beyond the pale of mainstream U.S. public opinion. The danger is that this is not 1992. Sister Souljah could only complain to the media and her friends (by phone), whereas blogs can swarm the world with a mouse click.

Co-opt the leftblogs.

Hillary can meet with leftbloggers, brief them, feign respect for them, make the case that she must attract a majority of the electorate, and ask for help. And she can buy cooperation by hiring a major leftblogger who will sign on as a “consultant.” Indeed, she is hiring, among others, Peter Daou, of Salon.com's Daou Report and director of blog operations for John Kerry in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0073070

Hence the significance of Bill's dine-in with the leftbloggers. Has the Clinton machine determined that Bill become the designated ambassador to the blogs? Proclaimed TalkLeft: "It was awesome." Although, to many leftbloggers, affection for Bill does not transfer to Hillary, her perceived opportunism or her policies.

How the Clintons play the blogs, or are played by them, is one of the most important political stories of the next few years. The 2006 and 2008 elections will be the coming-of-age era for political blogging and all the new, interactive, interlinking media technologies they have inspired. The blog political playbook is being written and will map out campaign strategies for generations to come.

10 Years Later, Fox News Turns Up The Cable Volume (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, October 2, 2006

NEW YORK — Roger Ailes, the man behind the curtain at Fox News Channel, says he was at a dinner party recently when one of the guests asked him, "Isn't Fox News too conservative?"

"I said, 'Are you comfortable with CNN?' He said, 'Yes.' How about CBS, ABC, NBC? 'Absolutely.' What about The New York Times, The Washington Post and The Los Angeles Times? 'Fine.' National Public Radio and PBS? 'Very good.' So I said, 'But this little cable channel is making you crazy? If all the media tipped to the right, I'd probably be the biggest liberal. But you've got to have debate.' "

In just 10 years, Fox News — the channel liberals love to hate — has transformed the cable news landscape with its in-your-face brand of news with 'tude. In the process, it has reduced granddaddy CNN to a distant second and NBC's cable news venture, MSNBC, to an also-ran. Fox News' combative Bill O'Reilly has become a household name, drawing more than 2 million viewers a night. Sean Hannity, Shepard Smith and Greta Van Susteren are cable news stars. On-air barbs by them and Fox News correspondents have ignited debates in journalism circles about whether objective news can stay relevant, particularly in an Internet era that gives ordinary Americans the power to vent about anything in blogs.

The ultimate sign of respect: Comedy Central's Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert riff on Fox News on any given night.

"Many Americans had built up a perception that mainstream American television journalism routinely displayed a liberal bias. Roger knew it and tapped into it," says former MSNBC president Erik Sorenson. "Fox News convinced millions of those viewers that Fox's reporting was indeed fair and balanced, when compared to CNN and broadcast news. That resonated, especially in the wake of 9/11, and was underscored daily with strong, opinionated program hosts in prime time, on their morning show, and even during the day."

Fox, which went on the air Oct. 6, 1996, "didn't want to be an international network," says Tom Rosenstiel of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, a non-partisan media research organization. "They were going to be an American network, which is what their audience was looking for."

Hosts such as O'Reilly and Hannity "bring passion and sincerity to a much-needed discussion of critical issues," CNN's Lou Dobbs says. "And even though those are usually conservative voices, they are important voices."

As Fox News begins its next decade, the explosive growth that marked its first has ebbed.

Fox News Channel now draws an average of 840,000 viewers daily (6 a.m. to 11 p.m.) — compared with CNN's 448,000 and MSNBC's 270,000. But Fox's average prime-time viewership dipped 35% in the third quarter of this year compared with last year, when Katrina dominated the news. CNN was down 28%, and MSNBC dropped 22%.

As penetration of cable TV reaches a saturation point and with increased competition from the Web, Fox's "job is going to get harder now, just as it got harder for CNN 10 years ago," Rosenstiel says. "The big-growth era in cable seems to have come to an end."

That's why Ailes has been on something of a tear lately. He has been shaking up his daytime lineup some, calling surprise staff meetings, putting more emphasis on Fox News' website by partnering with YouTube in launching "The Blast," a dedicated page in which Fox News provides online video junkies with the craziest moments in news.

"This is hard work every day," Ailes says. "We have to maintain an intensity."

Anchor Shepard Smith says that although the ratings competition "for us is in cable, the Internet is clearly pulling eyes, and anybody who says otherwise is being disingenuous. Ten years ago you couldn't log on to find out what was going on. We need to integrate and use the Internet better. We have a long way to go."

Beyond new-media challenges, Fox News also has been unable to shake — not that Ailes or anyone at Fox seems to care much — the perception that its coverage leans right and, since 9/11, has become increasingly pro-Bush White House.

DOJ_NMG_0073071

That perception was fueled last week when former president Bill Clinton accused Fox News Sunday host Chris Wallace of "doing Fox News' bidding" by asking Clinton whether he had done enough to catch Osama bin Laden.

Never mind that Wallace's program airs on Fox broadcasting, not cable's Fox News, or whether Clinton's outburst was planned or spontaneous.

"Politicians used to be able to come on TV and read a rehearsed answer, and Cronkite and Huntley and Brinkley and those guys had to swallow it," O'Reilly says. "They couldn't give them the O'Reilly arched eyebrow or tell them they were a pinhead.

"You now have a country that expects analysis on TV, where 10 years ago it only existed on the Sunday talk-show brainiac slot."

Of the Clinton flare-up, Ailes says, "The only thing Chris didn't do is lay down like some other networks did" when they focused on what Clinton wanted to talk about: humanitarian efforts through his global initiative.

All weekend, Fox News extensively covered the scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., who resigned Friday after news of inappropriate e-mails to a teenage boy became public. On his program Sunday, Wallace discussed it with guests Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., and former House speaker Newt Gingrich.

Fox supporters and detractors agree that credit for Fox's success rests with Ailes, 66, a former Republican Party operative who made his name starting in the '60s in entertainment by producing The Mike Douglas Show.

The success has pleased parent company News Corp. In a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the company said Ailes stands to make $15.8 million in salary, bonus and stock this year.

Sitting in his second-floor office here, Ailes says Fox News has changed the TV news game: "Does anybody think Katie Couric (in her new role as anchor of The CBS Evening News) would have a segment called 'Free Speech' if it wasn't for Fox News?"

And Ailes says Dobbs, CNN's formerly staid business anchor, turned to hot-button debates such as illegal immigration after he "took one look at Bill O'Reilly and said: 'This guy is shooting his mouth off about what people really care about. I can do that.' "

(Both CBS and Dobbs say Fox had no role in their decisions.)

Ailes also says Fox News is probably more conservative than other TV news outlets, but only because it has consistently given equal voice to people whom mainstream media traditionally ignored if not disdained: conservatives.

Liberals "hate us for coming on the scene and changing the game and making people look at both sides of issues," he says.

But Robert Greenwald, who produced a film that attacked Fox News, Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism, says objectivity is an unknown concept at Fox.

More times than not, he says, Fox pushes a conservative agenda, albeit with "a wink and a nod. They don't do down-the-middle stuff — in their news or on their opinion shows. By design, they mix the two."

In Greenwald's eyes, Fox News Channel's most significant contribution "has unfortunately been the way news is covered, with the spread of let's-have-a-shouting-match, wrestling news entertainment." But he credits Ailes with "a genius for picking people who can talk to you. He proved that news doesn't have to be homework or spinach."

The accusation that Fox News is on the right-wing bandwagon comes mostly from those who don't watch the channel, says Brit Hume, the former ABC White House correspondent who joined two months after Fox's launch and hosts a daily political news program, Special Report. Some people "look at Fox News and see O'Reilly and Hannity and think, 'That's all they do over there,' " Hume says. "They probably think Bill and Sean are co-anchors and are on 24/7. You'd rather do without the label, but here we're succeeding. We pinch ourselves every day."

Jane Skinner, a daytime anchor, says friends who work at local TV stations around the country are constantly asking her what it's "really like" to work at Fox News — the assumption being that there's a political agenda and that she and others are told what questions to ask or comments to make.

"I laugh," Skinner says. "You can make all the comments about 'fair and balanced,' but they (management) are very much hands-off."

Rosenstiel, who has studied programming of all the cable news channels, says his most recent study shows Fox News journalists "were more likely to offer their opinions about the news, but often those opinions were fairly innocuous, like 'If there's an American victory in Iraq, that's good news.' I don't know anyone who would argue with that, but it's unusual to hear someone say it on TV news."

Besides, Rosenstiel says, "one person's bias is another person's telling the truth on TV. And the way Fox anchors and correspondents talk is very informal, not the stiff, omniscient narrator of traditional broadcast news. They talk like regular people, use plainer language.

"If it's a military conflict, they refer to American troops as 'our' troops. It's hard to argue when an American network does that. It is different from traditional broadcasting, but it's stylistic — not conservative or liberal."

Smith notes that in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Fox was as tough on the Bush administration as any other media outlet: “We were getting fed a pack of untruths and we showed the truth.”

Anchoring two hours a day with his afternoon Studio B and then at night with The Fox Report, Smith says the toughest challenge for Fox News staffers is to stay ahead of the pack. “You're constantly trying to reinvent yourself, and when others see things that work, they copy them. You have to be the innovator all the time — and that's hard to do.”

Says Van Susteren, who jumped from CNN five years ago: “If you think about it, we all do the same stories. We all did polygamy. We all did the war. Hezbollah. We all do missing people.

“But there's a reason people want to watch Fox — and the reason is we enjoy our jobs more and it pushes out to the screen. It gives us more energy and makes us push a little bit further. I think viewers pick up on it.”

The Right Man For Fox News (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

NEW YORK -- Ten years after he created Fox News Channel, Roger Ailes says he still avoids mentioning his place of employment in certain circles.

"It's just not worth going through the hassle at an elite party," he says. And: "The only reason I know we're doing the right thing is that we're widely criticized." And: "I've never felt out of the mainstream in America. I've felt out of the mainstream at Le Cirque."

If the paunchy 66-year-old executive sounds as though he still harbors sharp resentments toward a liberal-leaning world, that bristling attitude is embedded in his network's genetic code as well. Ailes says he recently considered retiring but rejected the idea because, well, there are too many things that still tick him off.

Never mind that he got a big promotion last year, with owner Rupert Murdoch putting him in charge of Fox's local television stations as well as what has become the top-rated cable news channel. The onetime Republican operative remains acutely sensitive to any slights, pulling out of the National Academy of Television Arts and Sciences after Fox News was repeatedly shut out in Emmy nominations. Ailes wrote the academy head in 2002 that the award-winning stories were "those that reinforce the views and prejudices of your judges. . . . Earth to academy: your bias is showing."

Vanity Fair recently pegged Ailes as No. 44 on its New Establishment list, calling him "the most powerful news executive in America." But it also called him "the man who gives the Bush administration a major media outlet" and described Dick Cheney -- who demands that his hotel TVs be preset to Fox -- as his "big loyal friend."

"Vanity Fair is a left-wing rag," says Ailes, adding a moment later that its editor, Graydon Carter, is a friend. Ailes says the magazine's item is "just blatantly false" because he has met Cheney only a half-dozen times. Responds Carter: "Roger is the smartest guy in TV. Unfortunately, he's working for the wrong side."

The Cheney reference was based on the vice president's decision to grant his only interview after accidentally shooting a hunting companion to Fox's Brit Hume. Ailes says Hume asked all the necessary questions, and "the only thing he didn't do was be disrespectful to him, which is what the left wants."

The liberal view was crystallized last week when Bill Clinton unloaded on "Fox News Sunday" host Chris Wallace, who had pressed him about his record in fighting al-Qaeda. Clinton defended his tenure and accused Wallace of conducting "a nice little conservative hit job."

"I wouldn't want to be a waiter in a restaurant and bring him the wrong dish," Ailes says. "When you lean in and poke at journalists and try to intimidate them, it's a mistake."

While Fox remains No. 9 among all cable networks, some slippage in the ratings over the past year has Ailes concerned. For the last three months, Fox is down 28 percent from the same period last year, compared with declines of 21 percent for CNN and 12 percent for MSNBC.

Ailes responded with a recruitment ad that included such lines as "Can You Work Well With People Without Being a Territorial Jerk?" and "When You're Tired, Can You Keep Going Without Whining or Making Mistakes?" He also summoned executives to a 5 a.m. meeting to critique morning programming. "Sometimes we get ourselves thinking our job is to send memos to each other. I wanted to make them justify their paycheck."

Fox executives have been touting a proposed business channel, but Ailes has resisted the idea unless the new network can get distribution in at least 30 million homes. Fox has now cut a deal with YouTube to provide the Web site with video of "the craziest moments in news."

Despite its "fair and balanced" mantra, Fox is widely viewed as conservative, with nearly seven in 10 national journalists in a 2004 survey citing it as an especially conservative news outlet.

DOJ_NMG_0073073

And Fox sometimes puts its thumb on the scale. When Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez was attacking President Bush, the network ran such on-screen graphics as "Chavez Insults U.S.: Where's the Outrage?" "Taking Cheap Oil From Hugo Chavez: Act of Treason?" and "New York Audience Gives Chavez Standing Ovation . . . Why?"

Fox gets its ideological sheen not from its reporters but from its high-profile conservative hosts, such as Sean Hannity, John Gibson and Bill O'Reilly, who regularly complains about the "left-wing press." And while the network has some liberal commentators, none has the prominence of Newt Gingrich.

But Fox may have moderated its journalistic approach a bit in recent years, with Ailes hiring Wallace from ABC News, former CNN anchor Bill Hemmer and Harvard analyst Marvin Kalb.

From where Ailes sits -- he says he gets asked for autographs in the real America, if not at Le Cirque -- the issue is the rest of the media. After the 9/11 attacks, he says, some journalists "ridiculed" him for wearing a flag pin.

"The New York Times had to fire a person for making up news," he says. "We haven't taken down a major story. If we make a mistake, we correct it in an hour."

Ailes believes he has helped discredit the notion that conservatism is "a freak point of view" in the media, noting that Rush Limbaugh, whose television show Ailes once produced, recently did a "Free Speech" commentary on the "CBS Evening News."

"We have forced a dialogue into the news business that didn't exist before we got here," Ailes says.Foley's Showdown With ABC

On Friday afternoon, a strategist for Rep. Mark Foley tried to cut a deal with ABC's Brian Ross.

The correspondent, who had dozens of instant messages that Foley sent to teenage House pages, had asked to interview the Florida Republican. Foley's former chief of staff said the congressman was quitting and that Ross could have that information exclusively if he agreed not to publish the raw, sexually explicit messages.

"I said we're not making any deals," Ross recalls. He says the Internet made the story possible, because on Thursday he posted a story on his ABC Web page, the Blotter, after obtaining one milder e-mail that Foley had sent a 16-year-old page, asking for a picture. Within two hours, former pages had e-mailed Ross and provided the salacious messages. The only question then, says Ross, was "whether this could be authenticated."

The St. Petersburg Times last fall obtained the earlier e-mail, asking the 16-year-old for a picture, and interviewed the boy, who wrote a friend that he considered the message "sick." But the boy would not go on the record.

Executive Editor Neil Brown says the paper's policy against making accusations based on unnamed sources was a factor. "We just didn't feel like we had the story," he says. "We had a lot of stuff implied. . . . If I had it to do over again, I think we probably would have been more organized about pursuing it. But hindsight is 20/20."

The paper did interview Foley, who assured a reporter that the e-mail exchange was innocent, Brown says.Delivering a Verdict?

Linda Greenhouse, the New York Times' Supreme Court reporter for three decades, has no shortage of opinions.

She aired some of them in June when she was honored at Harvard, saying that "our government had turned its energy and attention away from upholding the rule of law and toward creating law-free zones at Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib, Haditha and other places around the world. And let's not forget the sustained assault on women's reproductive freedom and the hijacking of public policy by religious fundamentalism."

Don't those remarks, publicized last week by National Public Radio, go too far for a beat reporter covering such issues at the high court? Greenhouse says her comments were "statements of fact," not opinion, as underscored by the court striking down the administration's policy of holding terror suspects without charges.

"The notion that someone cannot go and speak from the heart to a group of college classmates and fellow alums, without being accountable to self-appointed media watchdogs, means American journalism is in danger of strangling in its own sanctimony," Greenhouse says.

Tom Kunkel, dean of the University of Maryland's journalism school, calls Greenhouse's remarks "ill-advised," saying that while she can "still report objectively on contentious issues before the Supreme Court, the average person can reasonably ask, how can that not color her stories?" But former Times ombudsman Daniel Okrent says it is impossible "to find any trace of her views in her work."

Fiasco In 1936 Survey Brought 'Science' To Election Polling (WSJ)

By Cynthia Crossen

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

President Alf Landon?

In the fall of 1936, the most influential poll in America, run by Literary Digest magazine, predicted that Mr. Landon, governor of Kansas, would trounce the Democratic incumbent, Franklin Roosevelt, with 57% of the popular vote. Literary Digest's poll was massive -- it sent out 10 million ballots that year -- and it had correctly forecast five previous presidential elections. There was widespread concern that the poll might create a bandwagon effect, giving Mr. Landon an even bigger victory.

The poll could hardly have been more wrong. Mr. Roosevelt won the election with more than 60% of the popular vote; Mr. Landon carried only two states, Maine and Vermont. The failure of the Literary Digest and other, smaller polls, "will undoubtedly revive agitation for their abolition or control," wrote the New York Times. Kenneth McKellar, a Democratic senator from Tennessee, called the Literary Digest poll "wicked," and promised to sponsor legislation to put polling under federal supervision.

Although by that time polling was not a young business, it was still operating in the statistical Dark Ages. First used around 1824, straw polls (named for the way farmers threw a fistful of straw in the air to see which way the wind was blowing) were often taken by traveling journalists or private citizens. They might ask everyone on a steamship or train how they intended to vote. One man who traveled around the Northeast in 1856 did 23 polls, interviewing 2,886 people, wrote Susan Herbst in her 1993 book, "Numbered Voices." All of his polls were published in the New York Times.

One reader in 1896 wrote to the Times about a recent poll he had witnessed on a train. "A straw poll of 23 riders showed 18 for McKinley, five for Bryan. ... When the train halted at Ballston, among those who got off were the five Bryan sympathizers, and then it was seen that they were handcuffed together, and were a gang of prisoners on their way to the county jail."

Literary Digest, a general-interest weekly founded in 1890, began doing straw polls in 1916. It mailed ballots to its subscribers, gradually building up a list with publicly available names of people who owned telephones and cars. At its peak, the magazine sent ballots to 20 million people, and employed 400 clerks to tally the returns.

But magazine subscribers and owners of cars and telephones during the Great Depression tended to be more affluent than the average voter -- and more Republican. Indeed, in its 1936 pre-election report, the magazine reported that a skeptic had called its office to ask, "Has the Republican National Committee purchased the Literary Digest?" Commented the magazine, "Absurd and amusing."

In its postelection report, however, the editors acknowledged that the poll undersampled some groups of voters. And whose fault was that? "We wonder why we get better cooperation in what we have always regarded as a public service from Republicans than we do from Democrats. Do Republicans live nearer mailboxes? Do Democrats generally disapprove of straw polls?"

Even among the subset of people who received ballots, there was an element of self-selection. People with ample leisure were more likely to take the trouble to help Literary Digest. But plenty of the "lower strata," as the magazine called them, voted that year.

There was at least one man who relished the Literary Digest fiasco: George Gallup. Mr. Gallup, a market researcher and syndicated columnist, had begun experimenting with so-called scientific methods of polling, and in July 1936, he predicted Literary Digest would call the election erroneously. He himself projected a Democratic victory, although his margin turned out to be way off.

Mr. Gallup, of course, was one of the leaders of the pack that predicted Thomas Dewey would beat Harry Truman in 1948. Pollsters' methods and tools -- and confidence -- had improved so much in the dozen years since 1936 that they decided they didn't need to collect more data after October. In a postelection poll by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan, 14% of Truman voters said they made up their minds in the two weeks before the election, and 3% said they decided on Election Day.

"Everyone believes in public-opinion polls," joked the radio comic Goodman Ace. "Everybody from the man on the street all the way up to President Thomas E. Dewey."

By 1948, Literary Digest was long gone. It had already been facing financial problems when its poll flopped; it suspended publication in 1938 and later merged with Time magazine.

Its editor in 1936, Wilfred J. Funk, derided Mr. Gallup's methodology, saying mockingly that the Digest's poll had never been able to discover "how many rich men, poor men, G-men, racketeers and candlestick makers" voted in any given election. Twelve years later, a reporter asked Mr. Funk to comment on the Truman-Dewey polls.

"I do not want to seem to be malicious," Mr. Funk said, "but I can't help but get a good chuckle out of this. ... I wonder if the word science will continue to be used with this type of public-opinion poll."

Rice Heads To Mideast To Buttress Palestinian Leader (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice departed Sunday for the Middle East, on a trip billed by aides as an effort to bolster the embattled Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, in his struggles with the militant Islamic group Hamas, and to consult with Arab allies on Iran's nuclear program and the turmoil in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0073075

The State Department sought to play down expectations for Ms. Rice's trip, her first to the region since an agreement brokered by the United Nations ended the one-month war between Israel and Hezbollah this summer.

During her last visit, in July, Ms. Rice was criticized by Arab leaders for failing to move quickly to try to end the violence then raging along the Israeli-Lebanese border.

The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said this week's trip, scheduled to begin in Saudi Arabia and to include stops in Egypt, Israel and the West Bank, was not likely to produce any major steps forward for American policies in the Middle East.

"These meetings are more about consultations, taking stock of where we are," he said.

On her visit to the West Bank, she is expected to meet with Mr. Abbas, his third meeting in less than three weeks with Bush administration officials.

During meetings in New York last month on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly, President Bush praised Mr. Abbas as a "a man of courage" for his efforts to make peace with Israel and bring order to the Palestinian territories.

But the United States has signaled it has no plans to resume financial aid to the beleaguered Palestinians unless Hamas, which won elections in January and controls the government, takes steps to recognize Israel and forswear violence — moves that the group's leaders have rejected, despite pressure from Mr. Abbas.

In remarks last week to the editorial board of The New York Times, Ms. Rice praised Mr. Abbas, saying he needed time "to sort through what he wants to do."

Despite her absence from Washington, Ms. Rice seemed most likely to be dogged from a distance this week about descriptions of her actions in a new book by the reporter Bob Woodward, especially about his report that Ms. Rice rebuffed warnings from the Central Intelligence Agency two months before the Sept. 11 attacks about an imminent strike by Al Qaeda.

Mr. Woodward said the starkest warnings were made in a July 10, 2001, meeting in the White House between Ms. Rice, then the national security adviser, and George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence. Through spokesmen, she has rejected Mr. Woodward's account of the meeting, saying Mr. Tenet did not issue such a blunt warning at the meeting and expressed none of the frustration attributed to him in the book.

Rice Seeks To Revive Stalled Peace Talks (AP)

AP, October 2, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is renewing efforts to revive stalled Mideast peace talks, visiting the region this week for the first time since a U.N.-brokered cease-fire halted Israel's war with Hezbollah militants.

Rice planned stops in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Israel and the West Bank to consult with leaders. On Tuesday, she meets with Egypt's president and eight Arab foreign ministers in Cairo with the Israel-Palestinian dispute at the top of the agenda.

During her last visit to the region in August, Rice took heavy criticism for U.S. unwillingness to move for a quicker end to fighting in Lebanon.

This time, Rice's goal will be to move the U.S. democracy agenda forward with a discussion of threats to stability and moderation in the region such as Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah, her spokesman said last week.

Rice's visit comes amid some progress in the U.N.-brokered cease-fire, which took effect Aug. 14. On Sunday, the Israeli army abandoned almost all of its positions in Lebanon, a key step in fulfilling a major condition of the truce.

Still, Israel said it was "now waiting for Lebanon to do its part" — to keep Hezbollah out of the south and disarm it. Israel also plans to continue surveillance flights, which both Lebanon and the U.S. consider a violation of the border.

Rice plans to hold the Bush administration's third meeting in two weeks with Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas. The embattled secular leader was called a "man of courage" last week by President Bush for trying to revive peace talks despite a continued political stalemate with Hamas militants.

The top U.S. diplomat hopes to revive and expand agreements allowing transfer of goods and freer movement for Palestinians in and out of their separate territories in Gaza and the West Bank. The territories on opposite flanks of Israel would form an independent Palestinian state under a U.S.-backed plan for long-term peace.

But prospects for a return to active peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have looked dim this year, partly because the political upheaval in both governments kept leaders' attention focused inward.

Rice Will Try To Get Arab Allies To Join Efforts Against Iran (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 2, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was headed to the Middle East on Sunday night to rally Arab allies against Iran and try to resurrect Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0073076

The trip is Rice's first to the region since a cease-fire Aug. 14 ended 34 days of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Shiite militia that controls much of southern Lebanon.

The centerpiece of Rice's six-day trip is a meeting Tuesday in Cairo with foreign ministers from Arab states that are U.S. allies: Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain and Oman.

Nabil Fahmy, Egypt's ambassador to Washington, said participants will discuss the regional security threat posed by Iran and ideas on how to restart the Arab-Israeli peace process.

"We've been pushing the United States for a while to get re-engaged," he said. "You won't get the whole package unless you start somewhere."

Announcing the trip last week, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Rice wants to work with Arab leaders "who have a vision for a moderate, peaceful, democratic, stable and prosperous Middle East."

Jamal Khashoggi, an adviser to the Saudi ambassador to Washington, Prince Turki al-Faisal, said the Bush administration plans a major push to address the Israeli-Palestinian dispute after U.S. elections in November. In part, the effort is intended to help the United States' Arab allies offset criticism that they have done less to help the Palestinians than radicals such as Hezbollah and Iran, Khashoggi said.

McCormack did not say whether the administration plans a new Middle East initiative. He described Rice's visit as "exploratory" and said she was following up on President Bush's recent pledge at the United Nations to revive peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

"Clearly after the Lebanon war, there has been a reassessment by the Arabs," said Ziad Asali, president of the American Task Force on Palestine, a Washington-based organization that advocates a Palestinian state alongside Israel. Arab leaders "see Iran as trying to steal the Palestinian issue from them."

On Sunday, Israeli troops virtually completed their pullout from Lebanon, withdrawing from all but a single village on the border. They entered Lebanon after Hezbollah guerrillas captured two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid July 12.

Also Sunday, rival Palestinian security forces battled in Gaza. The fighting was sparked by disputes over unpaid salaries and the formation of a unity government.

Expectations for quick progress by Rice are modest, given the weakness of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government — blamed for poor performance in Lebanon — and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. Her Palestinian agenda is "pretty minimalist," said Edward Abington, a former U.S. diplomat who advises Abbas.

Abbas has failed to form a unity government with the militant Muslim group Hamas, which won parliamentary elections in January and refuses to recognize Israel.

Abington said Abbas hopes Rice can pressure Israel to ease freedom of movement for the 1.4 million Palestinians bottled up in Gaza. Israel withdrew unilaterally from the territory last year, and Rice helped negotiate agreements on border crossings from Gaza into Israel and Egypt. Israel has resealed the territory in response to Gaza militants' rocket attacks on Israel and the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier in June.

Rice also plans to visit Saudi Arabia. In the past, she has prodded the Saudis and Egyptians to introduce democratic changes. The focus this time: rallying U.S. allies against Iran and its partners.

Bush's broad push for democracy in the Middle East — a pillar of his foreign policy — "is being underplayed," said Amr Hamzawy, a Middle East expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, a think tank in Washington. "The Bush administration defines 'moderates' as those who support peace with Israel, not confrontation."

Yossi Alpher, an independent Israeli strategic analyst, said Arab leaders have been pushed toward a tacit alliance with Israel as Iran has become more confrontational.

By backing Hezbollah, developing a nuclear program and meddling in Iraq, Iran has made the security outlook "very ugly for all of us," Alpher said. "The only bright spot is that (Israel and its moderate Arab neighbors) realize we are all in it together."

Iran Set On Expanding Nuclear Program (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

Iran's hardline president on Sunday said his country was determined to expand its uranium enrichment program, announcing a plan to produce more nuclear fuel and calling allegations that Tehran was seeking nuclear weapons a "big lie."

Speaking to professors at Tehran University, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reinforced his rejection of demands by the U.S. and its allies to stop enrichment, saying his country was committed to generating nuclear fuel for electricity.

"Allegations or charges by the United States than Iran is seeking nuclear weapons is a big lie," Ahmadinejad said during his speech, which was broadcast on state-run television.

DOJ_NMG_0073077

The process of uranium enrichment can be used to produce electricity or build nuclear weapons depending on the level of enrichment. The U.S. alleges Iran is seeking to build nuclear weapons, but Iran contends that its program is for peaceful purposes.

Ahmadinejad said in his speech that Iran will hopefully install up to 100,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material in order to produce nuclear fuel. He did not provide any more details or set a timeline, but installing so many centrifuges could take several years.

In February, Iran announced for the first time that it produced a batch of low-enriched uranium, using 164 centrifuges.

It also has said it plans to intall 3,000 centrifuges by the end of the year at its uranium enrichment plant in the central Iranian town of Natanz. Large-scale production of enriched uranium in Natanz would require 54,000 centrifuges.

The speech Sunday was one of several lately in which Ahmadinejad has said Iran will not give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium to produce nuclear fuel and won't consider suspending it, even for a day.

"Not a single person has a right to give up the rights of the Iranian nation," he said.

Iran has been locked in a battle with the United States and some of its allies over its nuclear program. Tehran defied a U.N. Security Council deadline calling on it to suspend enrichment by Aug. 31 or face possible international sanctions.

But talks between Iranian and European officials have continued over a package of incentives that six countries — the United States, China, Russia, France, Britain and Germany — are offering Tehran in return for suspending its enrichment program and returning to full-scale negotiations.

Last week, envoys ended two days of talks in Berlin with no agreement on the enrichment issue but insisted they had "come to some positive conclusions" on ways to open broader discussions.

An Offer Tehran Can't Refuse (NYT)

By Ted Koppel

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

A few days ago, I inadvertently violated United States economic sanctions against Iran. I was paying my hotel bill in Tehran, didn't have enough cash and asked if I could use a credit card.

"I'll need to keep your card for at least half an hour," said the clerk. Since he'd also "needed to keep" my passport for the first couple of days I was in Iran, I thought nothing more of it. Half an hour later, I had my hotel bill and my credit card and left for the airport.

A couple of days later my assistant asked me if I had purchased any clothing in Dubai. "No," I said. "Why?" Someone, it appeared, had used my corporate credit card to do just that. When I heard the amount involved — precisely the total of my hotel bill — I understood.

There had been no purchase of clothing in Dubai, of course; but some Dubai business debited my credit card there (where such a transaction is legal) for the amount of my hotel bill, simultaneously crediting the company that owns the hotel in Tehran with that sum for the purchase of goods or services in Dubai. Similar, much larger loopholes enable the European subsidiaries of American companies to sell sanction-banned American goods inside Iran in limited but still significant quantities.

Even as the United States withholds its goods and technological know-how from Iran, the Europeans, Russians, Japanese and especially the Chinese are offering theirs as quickly as the contracts can be drafted. The likelihood that more restrictive sanctions against Iran will either make it through the United Nations' bureaucratic quagmire or dissuade Iran from darting down the path toward nuclear technology is about as dim as that of a popular uprising among the people under 30 who make up 70 percent of Iran's population.

Many of Iran's young adults — especially the well-educated, English-speaking ones who cross the path of a visiting American journalist — are frustrated by the puritanical nature of Islamic law. They dismiss their president and ours as deserving each other, denounce the corruption of the mullahs and speak with surprising openness about confiscated satellite dishes, blocked Internet sites, the closing of newspapers and the jailing and mistreatment of dissidents. But the young malcontents appear nowhere close to staging a revolution.

On the highway from Tehran to the Mehrabad airport, I witnessed a mind-bending object lesson in the limits of youthful rebellion: two young women on in-line skates, clutching the door handles of a car being driven by a young man at speeds approaching 60 miles an hour. Both women brazenly violated every traffic law known to man, but with their head scarves in place, the loose ends firmly clenched between their teeth. There are certain lines you don't cross.

Trivial acts of rebellion, irrelevant to the Islamic revolution, are tolerated. Anything perceived as a significant challenge is not. One of the men who planned and executed the taking of the American Embassy in 1979, for example, spent nine months in solitary confinement for collaborating on a public opinion poll whose findings were deemed unacceptable.

Iran suffers from chronic underemployment and its social safety nets are flimsy at best. The Revolutionary Guards now resemble Mafia families more than ideological shock troops. They still wield enormous influence, but their clout has corrupted them. In Tehran, I'm told, the Revolutionary Guard dominates the construction industry and its leading members have become exceedingly wealthy as a consequence. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad remains popular among the peasants and the poor, who note that he has failed to deliver on most of his campaign promises but are willing to grant him more time. As long as the price of oil remains above $50 a barrel, Iran can buy what it needs.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's tweaking of the West and his refusal to bow to pressure on the nuclear issue are widely popular in Iran. There was a time, not long ago, when many Iranians genuinely believed that there was a danger of an American military attack, even an invasion. Hardly anyone seems to believe in that possibility any more.

What, then, can the United States do to prevent Iran from developing nuclear technology? Little or nothing. Washington should instead bow to the inevitable.

"You insist on having nuclear weapons," we should say. "Go ahead. It's a terrible idea, but we can't stop you. We would, however, like your leaders to view the enclosed DVD of 'The Godfather.' Please pay particular attention to the scene in which Don Corleone makes grudging peace with a man — the head of a rival crime family — who ordered the killing of his oldest son."

In that scene, Don Corleone says, "I forgo my vengeance for my dead son, for the common good. But I have selfish reasons." The welfare of his youngest son, Michael, is on his mind.

"I am a superstitious man," he continues. "And so if some unlucky accident should befall my youngest son, if some police officer should accidentally shoot him, or if he should hang himself in his cell, or if my son is struck by a bolt of lightening, then I will blame some of the people here. That I could never forgive."

If Iran is bound and determined to have nuclear weapons, let it. The elimination of American opposition on this issue would open the way to genuine normalization between our two nations. It might even convince the Iranians that their country can flourish without nuclear weapons.

But this should also be made clear to Tehran: If a dirty bomb explodes in Milwaukee, or some other nuclear device detonates in Baltimore or Wichita, if Israel or Egypt or Saudi Arabia should fall victim to a nuclear "accident," Iran should understand that the United States government will not search around for the perpetrator. The return address will be predetermined, and it will be somewhere in Iran.

Maybe we could induce Richard Armitage out of retirement to play the Don Corleone part. Apparently he knows the role, having already played it in Pakistan.

At Least 6 Die As Palestinian Movements Clash In Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 1 -- The Palestinian security service controlled by Hamas moved forcefully in the Gaza Strip on Sunday to disperse demonstrators loyal to the rival Fatah movement who were demanding months of back pay from a nearly bankrupt government.

At least six people were killed, including two teenage boys, and more than 100 were injured in day-long clashes that marked the most severe partisan violence between the two sides in months.

The fighting, which erupted in downtown Gaza City and later flared in the West Bank, came after Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas's effort to form a power-sharing cabinet with Hamas collapsed in recent days. The apparent failure has brought mutual recriminations between the two main Palestinian political movements at a time of stifling economic crisis in the territories stemming from international sanctions against the Hamas-controlled government.

Ghazi Hamad, an adviser to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, called the violence "regrettable." He accused the demonstrators, many of them from the Fatah-dominated security forces, of attacking members of the 3,000-member security branch that reports directly to the Hamas-run Interior Ministry. Many of those who serve in that force also belong to Hamas's military wing.

"The protest today was beyond acceptable legal norms and turned truly into lawlessness," Hamad told reporters in Gaza.

Fatah leaders in Gaza called on Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority, to launch a probe into the crackdown and take action against the Hamas government. One of those killed was a member of the Palestinian preventive security forces, a powerful branch whose ranks are filled with Fatah members.

Abbas has so far declined to exercise his authority to fire Haniyeh and dissolve the government. But pressure is building within his party for him to take bold steps to end the political crisis following his apparent failure to organize a so-called national unity government.

Abbas announced last month that his secular-nationalist Fatah party and Hamas, a radical Islamic movement, had agreed to a joint political program that would usher in a power-sharing government. Haniyeh endorsed the agreement, which his aides said would leave him in the position of prime minister. The new government would comprise members of the two major parties, smaller movements with seats in the parliament and technocrats without political affiliation.

The agreement also accepted the 2002 Arab peace initiative that calls for the recognition of the Jewish state once Israel leaves all territory it occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

But the deal has unraveled in the past few days. Haniyeh and other Hamas leaders have said that Hamas as a movement would never recognize Israel's right to exist. Abbas has accused Hamas of reneging on the agreement, saying the talks to form a unity government are "back to square one."

The United States, the European Union and other international donors have demanded that Hamas renounce violence, recognize the Jewish state and accept signed agreements with Israel in return for a renewal of aid, which accounts for nearly half the authority's $2 billion annual budget.

Those sanctions remain in place, and Israel has also kept frozen the roughly $55 million in monthly tax revenue it collects on behalf of the Palestinian government, a sum equal to roughly half the authority's monthly payroll.

The 165,000 Palestinian government employees, nearly half of them in the security forces, have received only a small fraction of their salaries in the past seven months. A civil-service strike across Gaza and the West Bank has kept public schools shuttered, courts closed and the parliament out of action for nearly a month.

The clashes Sunday began outside the parliament building in Gaza, and gunfights quickly spread across much of the city's main commercial area. Witnesses said the Hamas security branch used grenades, antitank weapons and rifles to break up the protesters. There were also reports of violent demonstrations in the central Gaza city of Khan Younis. Later in the evening in Gaza, hand grenades were thrown at a group of Fatah demonstrators, killing one and injuring 30 0thers.

In response to the Hamas crackdown in Gaza, armed Fatah loyalists vandalized and partly burned the empty cabinet building in the West Bank city of Ramallah. Hours earlier, dozens of protesters there marched in the city streets, chanting "Hamas Out!"

Fatal Clashes In Gaza Over Unpaid Salaries (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 1 — Hamas and Fatah gunmen fought running battles in Gaza on Sunday, as Hamas forces tried to disrupt Fatah-organized protests over unpaid government salaries. Six Palestinians were killed and more than 100 were wounded.

The clashes were among the most severe between the Palestinian factions since Hamas won power in legislative elections in January.

After President Mahmoud Abbas, who was traveling abroad, ordered a halt to the demonstrations by members of his Fatah faction, angry protesters turned their rage toward a government building in Ramallah, on the West Bank.

Some offices in the Ramallah cabinet building, which is empty because many of the Hamas cabinet members in the West Bank have been arrested by the Israelis, were set on fire after protesters marched through the city shouting, “Hamas out!”

The fighting came as Israel, which has troops in Gaza, pulled its last soldiers out of Lebanon early Sunday morning, handing off to the Lebanese Army and United Nations peacekeepers under the terms of an Aug. 14 cease-fire. Israel wanted its forces home before the somber Yom Kippur holiday, which began at sunset on Sunday.

A few Israeli soldiers remain in the village of Ghajar, which is divided by the international border between Lebanon and the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights.

The clashes in Gaza were bloody, with Hamas militiamen under an auxiliary command known as the Executive Force, formally now part of the police, trying to break up a large demonstration near Gaza City’s parliament building. The Hamas men, in black T-shirts and camouflage pants, fired guns and antitank grenades after the interior minister, Siad Siam, ordered them to stop what Hamas considers to be a rebellion among the Fatah-dominated security forces.

Then supporters of Fatah, including the preventive-security service and Mr. Abbas’s presidential guard, fired back.

The crowd scattered, screaming. A man and a teenager were killed and 32 were wounded, including three schoolchildren and a cameraman for the satellite station Al Arabiya. The fighting spread through other parts of Gaza, despite the midday call for Ramadan prayers, before subsiding in the late afternoon.

At Al Shifa Hospital in Gaza City, ambulances brought in the dead and wounded. Saqer Ayish, 17, who works in the presidential guard, was wounded, and his mother rushed in wailing. Hassan Abu Hatal, 15, a schoolboy, died from a bullet to the head; later, a boy, 16, was also killed, according to a doctor at Shifa.

At least one member of the presidential guard and one Hamas militiaman were killed. Two more Palestinians died in unrelated family disputes, doctors said.

Sunday evening, the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, said that he had spoken to Mr. Abbas by telephone and that the two had agreed to work together to stop the violence. He defended the actions of Hamas and urged Palestinians to come together "in the face of a serious escalation from the occupation forces," meaning Israel.

Israeli troops on Sunday moved again into northern Gaza to try to stop rocket fire into Israel. Mr. Haniya asked Gazans to "respect the law and discipline and not to go into the streets."

Tensions throughout the Palestinian territories have been particularly high during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, because both Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya had promised that a month's salary would be paid to the 170,000 or so employees of the Palestinian Authority. The employees have been paid less than two months' salary during the past seven months, bringing great hardship, and Ramadan is a time for family gifts and charity to the poor.

But in fact most employees were paid less than a third of a month's salary before Ramadan, and Hamas officials have angered Mr. Abbas by accusing him of trying to undermine them by keeping back the international aid that passed through his office to avoid the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

Mr. Abbas has dismissed those accusations, but his efforts to bring about a national-unity government with Hamas appear to be foundering after the Hamas governing council refused to endorse an earlier agreement he had made with Mr. Haniya.

Mr. Abbas is being pressed by some members of Fatah to dismiss the Hamas government, but it is unclear whether he also possesses the power to call new elections.

Since the election of Hamas in January, Israel has refused to hand over more than $50 million a month in taxes and duties it collects for the Palestinians. And since March 28, when Hamas took over, the United States and the European Union have cut off direct financing to the Palestinian Authority until the government recognizes Israel's right to exist, forswears violence and accepts previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Hamas has been unable to come to terms either with the West, which regards it as a terrorist organization, or with Mr. Abbas, who has been trying to find a way to renew the flow of money to the desperate Palestinians.

There were also clashes on Sunday in Khan Yunis, in the southern part of Gaza, where 23 were wounded, and on Saturday there were smaller clashes in Deir al Balah as Hamas held rallies in Gaza and the police also demonstrated, blocking roads and shooting into the air.

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator and spokesman, blamed Fatah for the clashes, accusing the security services of striking "to weaken Hamas and to topple the government." Hamas said it had arrested up to 25 members of the protesting security personnel.

Tawfiq Abu Khoussa, a Fatah spokesman in Gaza, accused Hamas of "shedding Palestinian blood" and said, "Nothing can justify this violence."

Members of the preventive-security service said they had been attacked by Hamas gunmen, some of them using clubs.

Ghazi Hamas, the spokesman for the Hamas government, called the violence regrettable and insisted that Hamas had acted with restraint. "The protest today was beyond acceptable norms and turned truly into lawlessness," he said.

Hamas-Fatah Gunbattles Cover Gaza (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Gunbattles broke out across the Gaza Strip when heavily armed Hamas militiamen tried to break up anti-government demonstrations yesterday, killing seven persons and injuring dozens in the worst internal Palestinian violence since Hamas took power.

Militants from the opposition Fatah group retaliated by torching the Palestinian Cabinet building in the West Bank. The violence comes amid growing frustration over the parties' failure to form a national-unity government that could end crippling economic sanctions.

The fighting continued throughout the day and sent schoolchildren and other civilians in downtown Gaza City fleeing for cover.

"This is forbidden in Islam. We are in the holy month of Ramadan," said Majed Badawi, 33, who managed to escape after his car was caught in the crossfire. "It's a shame on Hamas, who call themselves real Muslims, and a shame on Fatah, as well. Why are they fighting and over what? We are victims because of both of them."

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, spoke with President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, by telephone and called for joint action to end the fighting, Mr. Haniyeh's office said. But in a televised speech, Mr. Haniyeh also defended the Hamas militiamen, saying they acted lawfully in trying to break up the protests.

DOJ_NMG_0073081

Fatah officials blamed Hamas for the chaos. "Nothing can justify this violence," Fatah spokesman Tawfik Abu Khoussa said.

Hamas has been under pressure since its January election victory over the long-ruling Fatah.

Israel and the West, which view Hamas as a terror group, cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid and tax transfers to the Palestinian Authority, making it nearly impossible for the new government to pay its 165,000 workers.

In recent weeks, civil servants -- including members of the security forces, many of them Fatah loyalists -- have held expanding protests against the Hamas-led government to demand back wages.

On Saturday, the Hamas government sent its 3,500-member militia into Gaza's streets to quash the protests.

The fighting started in the southern Gaza town of Khan Younis, where dozens of police gathered to demand back wages, protesters said. The Hamas militiamen ordered them to disperse, then opened fire at the protesters, who responded by shooting in the air, protesters said.

Fighting then broke out between militia members and security officials in northern Gaza, and violence spread to the parliament building in Gaza City, where security officers and civil servants were protesting. The protesters threw stones at Hamas militiamen, who eventually fired on the protesters, according to a reporter at the scene.

Militiamen and security personnel -- including bodyguards for Mr. Abbas -- began trading fire nearby. People scattered, and children covered their heads with their schoolbags for protection.

The clashes later spilled over to an area near the president's residence.

The street battles killed four persons, including a presidential bodyguard and a 15-year-old boy, said Dr. Baker Abu Safia, director of Gaza's Shifa Hospital. Two others were killed in related violence, and at least 75 were injured, hospital officials said.

A seventh person, a member of the preventive security force, was killed Saturday night when unknown gunmen shot at the car he was in, security officials said.

In response to the violence, Fatah protesters in the West Bank city of Ramallah broke into the Cabinet building and set the second floor on fire. A second building in the compound also was set ablaze.

Forced out by the fire, the militants moved to the Education Ministry and torched a car on the way. They then trashed the offices of a Hamas newspaper.

In the West Bank city of Hebron, Fatah-allied militants ransacked the offices of local Hamas lawmakers and set the furniture on fire.

Rival Palestinian Gunmen Clash, Leaving 8 Dead (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

JERUSALEM — Armed men from the governing Hamas movement and its rival, Fatah, clashed Sunday in a series of gun battles in the Gaza Strip that left at least eight people dead and dozens more injured, Palestinian officials said.

It was the deadliest factional violence in months of tension, and came as the two sides appeared to have deadlocked in their attempts to form a coalition government aimed at breaking the international aid boycott against the Hamas-led government.

The outbreak of violence jumped to the West Bank, where gunmen set fire to the offices of the Hamas-run Cabinet in the city of Ramallah and burned a car outside the Education Ministry building.

The hopscotching violence reflected the geographical balance of power between the rival Palestinian groups. Whereas Gaza is the main stronghold of Hamas, a radical Islamic movement, once-dominant Fatah prevails in the West Bank.

The clashes began after 3,000 members of a special Hamas police unit took up positions around the Gaza Strip with orders to use force, if necessary, to break up demonstrations by members of the Palestinian security forces. The security officers have closed roads and burned piles of tires to protest the government's failure to pay them full salaries.

Many of those demonstrators are Fatah members, and Hamas has accused them of seeking to create chaos to undercut the government, of which Hamas gained control after winning parliamentary elections in January.

Late Sunday, officials expressed regret over the clashes, and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas urged calm. But a government spokesman said Hamas forces were justified in trying to keep protesters from going too far.

"We have deployed the executive forces in the streets to maintain law and order and to stop the state of lawlessness and troublemakers," said Ghazi Hamad, the spokesman. "The participation of security service members in riots is a violation of the law which threatens the national security in the Palestinian community."

Fatah leaders accused Hamas of brutality.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who belongs to Fatah and was in Jordan at the time, urged security force members to halt their demonstrations. He pledged a criminal investigation of the shootings.

DOJ_NMG_0073082

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak ordered a delegation of security specialists from his country who are assigned to Gaza to mediate between the two factions.

By evening, though, the streets in Gaza City were quiet.

The dead included three civilians, one of them a 15-year-old boy, and two members of the presidential guard. An officer in the Palestinian preventive security force was killed, along with a member of the Hamas unit. A Fatah member was killed late Sunday in a confrontation with Hamas forces that also injured at least 20 people in the Bureij refugee camp, south of Gaza City.

Most of more than 80 wounded in the confrontations were civilian bystanders, officials said.

The clashes began when the Hamas units sought to clear demonstrators from a main road near Khan Yunis in southern Gaza, leaving 17 people hurt amid the shooting. A separate confrontation broke out in the Sheik Adwan neighborhood on the northern edge of Gaza City.

A sustained gun battle near the parliament building in Gaza City killed the teenage boy and wounded numerous others. The two members of Force 17, the corps of presidential guards, died during separate skirmishes near Abbas' Gaza City residence.

The gun battles marked the latest dark turn in the Palestinian political situation, and it renewed fears of more widespread civil strife.

Abbas and Haniyeh said they had reached a tentative agreement on a unified government last month, but subsequent talks to solidify the deal were frozen after disputes arose over whether the proposed government would recognize Israel.

Hamas refuses to recognize the Jewish state and has said that it would agree only to a long-term truce. Abbas wants the government to comply with the three conditions set by the West for restoring aid to the Palestinian Authority: recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and honoring agreements between the Palestinians and Israel.

Fatah accused Hamas of backtracking on the initial agreement, which contained wording meant to signal a tacit acceptance of Israel's right to exist. But Abbas, during a speech to the United Nations General Assembly late last month, appeared to demand that the proposed government recognize Israel more explicitly.

The two sides have not met since, stirring rising concern among Palestinians of an impasse that could lead to more violence. Palestinian leaders are under pressure from the 165,000 government employees as well as ordinary residents to find an end to the aid boycott, imposed soon after Hamas came to power.

The Palestinian treasury has been further depleted because Israel has withheld about $50 million monthly in tax and customs revenues it collects on the Palestinians' behalf.

Israel Almost Gone From South Lebanon (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

The U.N. called Israel's pullout from nearly all of south Lebanon on Sunday "significant progress." But sources of friction remained: Israel still holds the Lebanese part of a divided border village and its planes patrol Lebanon's airspace.

Both the Lebanese government and Hezbollah dismissed the withdrawal, which came more than six weeks after a cease-fire ended the 34-day conflict, as "incomplete" and demanded Israel stop what they called its violations of Lebanon's airspace, sea and land.

"What is required is a complete and comprehensive Israeli withdrawal and a halt to Israeli attacks on Lebanon," Information Minister Ghazi Aridi told The Associated Press. "So far, there is no final solution. Israel's pullout today is incomplete."

Senior Hezbollah official Sheik Hassan Ezzeddine warned the Islamic militant group would resume attacks against Israel if it breached the U.N. cease-fire, which went into effect Aug. 14.

"The enemy must bear the consequences of its continued air, sea and land violations in Lebanon," said Ezzeddine, the group's top political official in south Lebanon.

The Israeli army withdrew from the entire south except for the village of Ghajar, said a statement by the commander the U.N. Interim Force in Lebanon, known as UNIFIL.

"Significant progress has been achieved today," Maj. Gen. Alain Pellegrini of France said. "I expect that they will leave this area in the course of the week, thus completing the withdrawal in line with the (U.N. Security Council) resolution 1701."

The pre-dawn pullout put a formal end to a nearly three-month troop incursion into Lebanon that began after Hezbollah guerrillas captured two Israeli soldiers and killed three others in a July 12 cross-border raid.

It clears the way for the full deployment of UNIFIL's 15,000 soldiers who will police the border with an equal number of Lebanese army troops.

Israel has been gradually withdrawing troops since the cease-fire went into effect, from a peak of 30,000 during the fighting. The Israeli naval blockade of Lebanon ended more than three weeks ago.

DOJ_NMG_0073083

U.N. Force spokesman Alexander Ivanko, speaking on Lebanon's privately owned Christian TV station LBC, said a deal on Ghajar was expected next week. He did not elaborate.

But there were no scenes of jubilation Sunday similar to those that greeted the withdrawal of Israeli forces from south Lebanon in 2000 after an 18-year occupation.

In the border village of Marwaheen, the most visible of the 10 vacated positions, the Israelis had held a hilltop position before pulling out early Sunday.

The villagers went about their business in what is perhaps a reflection of the weariness felt by many in south Lebanon after decades of almost continuous fighting with Israel.

It also could be attributed to the uncertainty over the future.

"You can never know whether they will be back again," cautioned Mohammed Musseileh, a 67-year-old farmer from Marwaheen, referring to the Israelis.

Witnesses said Israel began moving tanks and armored carriers out of pockets near the border after midnight. The roar of Israeli tanks could be heard on the Lebanese side as they moved across.

Israeli military officials said the last soldiers returned to Israel around 2:30 a.m. ahead of the onset of Yom Kippur, the holiest day on the Jewish calendar, at sundown Sunday. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity under military guidelines.

An armored column creaked across the border at the Israeli border community of Moshav Avivim, leaving tread marks in the soil and sending a large cloud of dust into the air.

Israeli spokeswoman Miri Eisin said Israel was "now waiting for Lebanon to do its part under the truce."

Israel wants Lebanon to keep Hezbollah out of the south and disarm it, but Beirut has indicated it would not actively seek Hezbollah's weapons. The militant group said it would disarm only when a strong central government was in place.

UNIFIL has said the question of disarming Hezbollah was best left for the Lebanese to tackle, but it would support the Lebanese army if it takes on the task.

Both the U.N. and the Lebanese government consider Israeli overflights as violations of the cease-fire, but the Israeli officials said Sunday there were no plans to stop them.

Ivanko, the UNIFIL spokesman, said the issue of the overflights was raised several times with the Israeli side, which has been asked to halt them.

Another source of tension in Lebanon is the disputed Israeli-held Chebaa Farms area near the borders of Israel, Lebanon and Syria. Resolution 1701 had directed the U.N. secretary-general to come up with a proposal to delineate the borders in the area within a now-elapsed 30 days.

After Israel abandoned its hilltop position in Marwaheen Sunday, some villagers saw a chance to make a little money. A group of men in a pickup truck grabbed some discarded tires. Another villager arrived, and later carried home a roll of electrical cables.

Ghanian peacekeepers in a white U.N. armored personnel carrier photographed the site. Two Lebanese military intelligence officers in plainclothes also surveyed the area before Hezbollah officials arrived in two vehicles, one of which was an ambulance marked as gift from the Iranian Embassy in Beirut.

They blocked the narrow road leading up to the former Israeli position, preventing reporters and villagers from reaching the spot.

Saleh Diyab Mohammed was among those who came to the hill after the Israelis were gone. He planted a Lebanese flag atop his half-finished, two-story house which was apparently used by Israelis soldiers.

"Now, I feel pure and proud," he said. "I feel free again."

India Links Spies, Islamic Militants To Bombay Attack (WT)

By Rahul Bedi

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

NEW DELHI -- India accused Pakistan's spy agency yesterday of colluding with Islamist militants in a series of bomb attacks that killed 186 persons on trains in Bombay in July.

Bombay's police commissioner, A.N. Roy, said the "terror plot" was sponsored by Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI), executed by Pakistani militants and aided by a banned Indian Islamist group.

Commissioner Roy said an intensive investigation, including the use of "narco-analysis tests," or truth serum, showed that at least 12 Indians and 11 Pakistanis were involved in the bombings.

Security officials said the evidence would be handed over to Islamabad in the next few days.

DOJ_NMG_0073084

Pakistan's junior information minister, Tariq Azim Khan, said the accusations of ISI involvement were "baseless" and a "knee-jerk reaction."

"India has always chosen this path of pointing fingers at Pakistan without evidence," he said. "If they have any evidence, they should provide us with it, and we will carry out our investigations."

Commissioner Roy said the ISI began planning the attacks in March and provided funding and training for the bombers in Bahawalpur, in Pakistan's eastern Punjab province.

High-grade plastic explosives were smuggled into Bombay, while funds for the attack came from Pakistan through an operative in Saudi Arabia representing the Pakistani extremist group Lashkar-e-Taiba, Commissioner Roy said.

He said the bombers slipped into India from Pakistan, Nepal and Bangladesh and were met by Indian "sleepers" from the banned Students Islamic Movement of India.

On July 11, the day of the bombings, seven two-person teams -- each made up of one Indian and one Pakistani -- took the bombs to the Churchgate terminus in south Bombay, he said. They were put on trains and, within 11 minutes, all seven bombs exploded.

Irbaz Khan, a spokesman for Lashkar-e-Taiba, said: "We reject the allegations. They have named us in an effort to cover up their own failure and security lapses."

Indian Foreign Secretary Shiv Shankar Menon said his government would not judge Pakistan by its "immediate reactions or verbal statements, [but] by what they actually do about terrorism." India has long called on Pakistan to rein in militants operating from its territory and the disputed Kashmir region.

Mr. Menon said New Delhi would test the efficacy of a new joint India-Pakistan agency to tackle terrorism. "It seems logical that the mechanism has to deal with this kind of evidence," he said.

Pakistan Said To Play Both Sides On Terror War (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

NEW DELHI

Indian officials pointed a warning finger at Pakistan this weekend, saying that Pakistan's top intelligence agency masterminded and funded July's train bombings in Mumbai (Bombay).

The accusations continue the neighboring countries' decades-long pattern of blame and denial. This time, however, other nations are joining the chorus.

Last week, a think tank in Britain's Defence Ministry released an incendiary report saying that Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency "has been supporting terrorism and extremism, whether in London ... or in Afghanistan or Iraq."

On top of that, Afghan President Hamid Karzai spent most of the past week condemning Pakistan for ignoring and even abetting extremism, while frustrated American military officials decried Paki- stan's inability to clamp down on the Taliban in its border territories.

Pakistan's contradictions in the war on terror have long been obvious: It is both a crucial American ally and a primary training-ground for terrorists. But events in recent weeks suggest that, for the moment at least, pressure on Pakistan is increasing as the United States and Britain seek solutions to problems in Afghanistan and Iraq.

"The [Pakistani] Army's dual role in combating terrorism and at the same time promoting the MNA [a coalition of Islamist parties], and so indirectly supporting the Taliban through the ISI, is coming under closer and closer international scrutiny," said the British Defence Academy report.

It added: "Indirectly Pakistan, through the ISI, has been supporting terrorism and extremism whether in London on 7/7 or in Afghanistan or Iraq." ISI plans attacks too, says India

But India's claims of ISI involvement break new ground. Indian officials have long accused Pakistan of sponsoring terrorism in India in order to foment communal riots and destabilize the nation. The Mumbai (formerly Bombay) blasts on July 11, which killed 187 people, were no different, say Mumbai police.

Yet Mumbai Police Commissioner A.N. Roy went further when he announced the findings of his investigation Saturday. In the past, Pakistan was accused only of helping terrorists by allowing them to train in the country. In this case, Mr. Roy said the leading July 11 terrorists were Pakistanis, and that ISI plotted the attack before handing over the execution to the terrorist group Lashkar-i-Tayyaba.

So far, police authorities have presented little evidence to support these claims, though officials say they hope their findings are strong enough to win convictions within two years.

Pakistan has denounced the accusations. "The reported statement by [the] Mumbai Police Commissioner is irresponsible and [it is the] repetition of baseless allegations," reads an e-mail statement by Pakistan's Foreign Office.

DOJ_NMG_0073085

Yet Pakistan has frequently found itself on the defensive in recent weeks. Pakistan's truce with militant tribes has led to a threefold rise in attacks across the border in Afghanistan, according to US military officials. And Afghan President Karzai's repeated complaints about Pakistan's unwillingness to rein in radicals forced last week's meeting in Washington, where President Bush sought to soothe tempers between America's divided allies Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

Perhaps the most surprising criticism, however, has come from Britain. The report from the Defence Ministry think-tank was so inflammatory that Prime Minister Tony Blair had to personally reassure President Musharraf that the leaked document was merely the work of some government analysts, not government policy.

And in a London court just a few days earlier, an accused terrorist testified that he had attended a terrorist training camp in Pakistan run by the ISI. Thereafter, he refused to give any further testimony, saying ISI agents had threatened his family.

If true, "this is quite sensational, because it is the first official confirmation of the involvement in terrorism of the ISI, an agency of a country which Washington and London has regarded as an ally, and Washington gives $3 billion in aid to," says M.J. Gohel, a terrorism expert at the Asia-Pacific Foundation in London. A history of suspicion surrounding ISI

The Mumbai police report only sharpens scrutiny of ISI, an organization with a well known history of incubating militant outfits. In a bid for greater influence in Afghan affairs, ISI is believed to have helped the Taliban during its rise a decade ago. Indeed, Pakistan was one of only three countries to recognize the Taliban government. The ISI is also widely believed to have become involved with terrorist groups directed toward the conflict in Kashmir.

Islamabad claims it disbanded those groups after 9/11. But many analysts and critics suggest that some continue to operate under different names and fronts, often unofficially supported by factions of the intelligence community.

"Gradually after 9/11 there's been a restructuring of militant outfits," says Ayesha Siddiqa, a defense analyst in Islamabad. "In the process, some have gone, some have been merged, some have been divided, but the phenomenon still remains."

She and others argue that ISI compartmentalizes its policy where it meets Pakistan's strategic goals - for example, by fighting international terrorist groups like Al Qaeda while at the same time unofficially supporting other elements of the militant community.

The dual policy exposes Pakistan's peculiar view of terrorism in the region, analysts say.

"People in Pakistan believe that the conflict in Kashmir is a freedom movement, and that those people should be able to fight," says Kamal Matinuddin, a retired general who is now a military analyst in Rawalpindi. "That is where the difference arises between the people of Pakistan and the rest of the world." Musharraf's next move

Whether the recent criticism of ISI will force Musharraf to take some action is open to question. Bob Ayers of Chatham House, a London think-tank, doubts it will. Blaming "Pakistan is the flavor du jour," he says.

At least Musharraf is playing along with the West, he says. Mr. Ayers and other Western analysts fear that if the US pushes too hard, Musharraf could fall, and someone far more problematic could come to power. "This is just a cycle," says Ayers. "It deflects attention away from our lack of results in the war on terror."

It could have much greater consequences for the eggshell-strong peace process with India, though. Last month, the leaders of India and Pakistan took an unprecedented step - agreeing to share intelligence as part of joint antiterror efforts.

Saturday's announcement will present a new obstacle.

Some see it merely as a blip. "All that will happen is that talks will be delayed by 15 or 20 days," says Pakistani retired General Matinuddin.

But the prejudices among the intelligence agencies on either side of the border are deep, and they indicate how difficult a joint intelligence project could be.

Hamid Gul, a former ISI director dismisses the idea that ISI is a rogue agency working to terrorize India.

"Pervez Musharraf is in complete control of the ISI. To assume or insinuate that there is a cavity in the ISI that is pursuing its own agenda is utterly wrong," says Mr. Gul.

Instead, he suggests that India is blind to its own problems. The realities on the ground in India, including poverty and discrimination against Muslims, provide ample reason for disgruntled Indians to wage war against their own government, he says.

By contrast, a former senior Indian intelligence official says the ISI is just up to its old tricks. "Pakistan uses terrorism as a tactical move to achieve what its Army cannot on the war front and what its bureaucrats cannot on a negotiating table," says Ajit Doval, former chief of India's Research and Analysis Wing (RAW).

India's foreign secretary said Sunday that he will share evidence from the Mumbai investigation with Pakistan. "This will be the test case of the [joint] mechanism," says Mr. Doval. "If they are sincere, they'll act on the evidence."

But he is skeptical. Echoing the sentiments of many Indians - and pointing to the level distrust to be overcome - he asks: "What is the point of sharing evidence with someone who is party to the crime?"

Avian-flu Samples On The Way To CDC (WT)

By John Zarocostas

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

GENEVA -- After 18 months of stalling and repeated calls for cooperation by international health officials, China is expected to deliver a batch of animal virus samples of the lethal avian influenza virus H5N1, senior global health officials say.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) laboratory in Atlanta expects the samples to arrive "in the coming days," said Mike Purdue, head of a team that is studying how influenza moves from animals to humans on behalf of the World Health Organization (WHO).

Dr. Purdue told The Washington Times that the necessary paperwork was completed by Chinese authorities last week, but one carrier did not want to haul the samples, so they will be shipped by another company for WHO.

WHO first asked China to share the samples in the spring of 2005, after thousands of migratory birds died in the province of Qinghai. The 10 samples expected by the CDC are from Qinghai and other regions, Dr. Purdue said.

International health officials and diplomats have long been frustrated by Beijing's failure to send the samples promptly, despite its public pledges of full cooperation after its reluctance to share information aggravated a crisis over severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) in 2003.

The sharing of specimens is essential if researchers are to find a vaccine and more effective anti-viral drugs against bird flu. Since 2003, there have been 251 human cases of the avian influenza virus in 10 countries, of which 148 resulted in deaths.

Some Asian and Western health diplomats attribute the delay to a bureaucratic turf war between China's Ministry of Agriculture, which has been reluctant to share the samples, and the Ministry of Health, which has been more willing to co-operate. The same sources said Chinese authorities were now fully sharing human samples from victims of bird flu and HIV/AIDS.

Despite its dynamic economy and huge foreign reserves, China offered only $10 million at a pledging conference in Beijing in January aimed at strengthening global preparedness against a human avian influenza pandemic.

Senior Western diplomatic sources said China initially offered no contribution at all and only came forward with the $10 million pledge when pressure was put on its political leaders. However, diplomats are cautiously optimistic that China is moving in the right direction on global health issues.

In a significant move, China has put forward Margaret Chan, a senior WHO official, for the top post of the global health agency, which is vacant after the sudden death in May of the incumbent, Lee Jong-wook. This is the first time that China has nominated a candidate for a major global agency.

Dr. Chan, formerly Hong Kong's top health official, played a pivotal role in stamping out an avian-flu outbreak in the city in 1997. In July 2005, she publicly scolded China for stalling on vital cooperation over the outbreak of bird flu.

Another leading candidate in a crowded field is Shigeru Omi, a Japanese national and WHO regional director for the Western Pacific. Asian diplomats described fierce behind-the-scenes lobbying by Tokyo and Beijing for their respective nominees. The outcome is to be decided on Nov. 9.

Brazil's Lula Forced To A Runoff In Reelection Bid (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

SAO PAULO, Brazil, Oct. 1 -- President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva won the first round of Brazil's presidential election Sunday, but fell short of earning enough votes to avoid a runoff later this month against the second-place challenger.

With more than 98 percent of polling places counted, Lula received about 49 percent of the votes -- shy of the 50 percent needed to win reelection outright and avert an Oct. 29 runoff. The runner-up, former Sao Paulo state governor Geraldo Alckmin, received about 41 percent.

Lula, 60, cast his vote Sunday morning in Sao Bernardo do Campo, an industrial suburb of Sao Paulo, where he worked as a lathe operator and developed into an outspoken labor union leader who opposed the country's military dictatorship in the 1970s and '80s. Corruption scandals have hounded him during the past year, including one that surfaced just before the election charging that his campaign staff paid for damaging information about Alckmin.

That controversy, which continued to dominate headlines on election day, served as a last-minute life preserver that kept the conservative Alckmin's political hopes afloat. If the corruption controversy continues to simmer, his supporters say, they believe he might have a chance to unseat Lula.

"Alckmin can win if something else shows up with this scandal. And the way things are going in Brazilian politics right now, I'm confident that something else is going to show up," said JosÃ© Carlos Brandt Silva, 62, a businessman who traveled more than 200 miles to vote for Alckmin in Sao Paulo, where his family is registered.

Six members of Lula's party face arrest warrants for allegedly paying about $800,000 for information that supposedly proved corruption on Alckmin's part. Lula's campaign contends that Alckmin's supporters desperately contrived the scandal just before the election. Lula fired his campaign manager last week after the allegations aired, though he has denied any involvement in the incident.

Overwhelming support from the poor has helped Lula weather the corruption scandals, which also included congressional vote-buying last year in which many members of Lula's Workers' Party were implicated. His support rests on the fact that poverty rates have dipped since he was elected four years ago, thanks in part to increased government social spending, lower inflation and a stable currency.

"The whole Brazilian political system is corrupt, not just Lula," said Fernando Silva, 29, a furniture maker who voted for Lula at a Sao Paulo public school Sunday. "If Lula is involved in corruption, I think another president would have been even more involved than him. So I'd rather vote for Lula, because my life has changed with him. I'm working. I have my own business."

Alckmin, a medical doctor by training, struggled during the campaign to attract excitement among voters, many of whom had not heard of him before he entered the race in March. After serving as vice governor of the state of Sao Paulo, he advanced to the governor's seat in 2001 following the death of his predecessor.

"He doesn't have a history of being involved in competitive elections, and he's not very well known outside of Sao Paulo," said Maria Celina D'Araujo, a political scientist in Rio de Janeiro. "The image he has tried to project during the campaign is that of the doctor who is going to treat the corruption that Brazil suffers from."

The runoff is expected to force the candidates to clarify their agendas. Lula declined to participate in presidential debates during the first-round campaign, and Alckmin has offered few specific policy proposals.

Some of the challenges for the next president are already apparent, and the candidates might have mentioned them only rarely because of their potential to be politically explosive, analysts said.

For example, the social security system is heavily indebted, and many believe that reducing the generous payouts that retirees now receive is necessary to maintain economic stability. Many economists are also calling for changes in Brazil's labor laws, which offer strong protections for workers but are also believed to fuel a vast sector of workers who are not legally registered; about 55 percent of Brazilian workers are not on the tax rolls.

"The next president is going to have to approve some sort of social security reform, and the issue of labor reform is also going to come up," said RogÃ©rio Schmitt, a political analyst in Sao Paulo. "These are unpopular reforms, so the candidates have been very generalistic so far."

If Lula is elected -- and polls put him as the favorite in the runoff -- he will probably have to tackle those issues without much party support from either members of congress members and state governors -- positions that were also on the ballot Sunday.

During his first term, Lula was able to count on support from his party to direct legislation. But the party has been significantly weakened from the scandals, which could make things tougher for him in a second term. He will be forced to build a broader coalition, said Schmitt.

Many affiliated with Brazil's opposition parties are already looking forward to 2010. "Lula will have even more problems in his second term than he did in the first," said Fabio Mazzo, 26, an Alckmin supporter from Sao Paulo.

Brazil's Lula Forced Into Surprise Run-off (FT)

By Jonathan Wheatley

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

Brazilian voters have delivered an unexpected setback to president Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, who had been widely expected to win an outright majority in elections on Sunday and avoid the need for a second-round run-off on October 29.

With a little more than 98 per cent of the vote counted, electoral authorities ordered a run-off between Mr Lula da Silva and Geraldo Alckmin of the centrist PSDB.

Mr Lula da Silva had 48.8 per cent of the valid votes against 51.2 per cent for all opposition candidates combined. Mr Alckmin had 41.4 per cent, well ahead of his showing in recent opinion polls.

Mr Lula da Silva's commanding lead in opinion polls fell away in the days leading up to Sunday's vote after leaders of his campaign team and his left-leaning party, the PT, were caught attempting to smear an opposition candidate.

The president's popularity remained strong for much of the campaign in spite of a series of corruption scandals over the past 18 months that at one point threatened to bring down his government.

DOJ_NMG_0073088

But many voters chose to concentrate instead on the low inflation and relative economic stability that have boosted the spending power of the poor – the mass of Brazilian voters. The poor have also benefited from a quadrupling of spending on income-transfer programmes under Mr Lula da Silva.

However, the government has been criticised for failing to produce the "spectacle of growth" promised by Mr Lula da Silva before taking office in January 2003. Growth is heading for 3 per cent this year and is likely to average less than that over the four years of his administration.

The Lula government has maintained relatively orthodox monetary and fiscal policies and in its first year embarked on modest reforms of the bankrupt pensions system for public-sector workers. But it has failed to tackle more politically difficult reforms of the wider pensions system or to cut other spending to release money for much-needed investment in infrastructure and other drivers of growth.

Geraldo Alckmin, of the centrist opposition PSDB – which introduced many of the policies maintained by Mr Lula da Silva during its eight years in power to 2002 – has promised to tackle such issues without achieving much resonance among voters.

While Mr Alckmin's campaign may have failed to attract support away from the president, Mr Lula da Silva's own advisers may have put his long-expected victory in jeopardy.

Lula Forced Into Runoff Election (WT/AP)

By Harold Olmos

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

BRASILIA, Brazil -- Brazil's leftist president faces a runoff for a second term after voters denied him an outright victory yesterday after last-minute accusations that his party engaged in a scheme of electoral corruption and dirty tricks.

Election authorities announced the Oct. 29 runoff after 98 percent of the vote had been counted, with President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva getting 48.8 percent compared with 41.4 percent for center-right candidate Geraldo Alckmin, Sao Paulo state's former governor.

It was a stunning defeat for Mr. Lula de Silva, who polls had predicted less than a week ago would trounce Mr. Alckmin with 59 percent of the vote, far more than the 50 percent plus one vote needed to win the contest in the first round.

Mr. Lula de Silva had been favored to win because of the economic stability and anti-poverty programs he brought to Brazil. Votes in Sao Paulo, Mr. Alckmin's stronghold and Brazil's most populous state, apparently helped force the runoff.

Mr. Lula de Silva's campaign manager, Marco Aurelio Garcia, earlier said a first-round win for the president was still possible because many of the uncounted votes were from Brazil's impoverished northeast, which has benefited handsomely from government social programs.

"We believe that Lula will show solid growth as the vote from the northeast starts showing its weight," Mr. Garcia told reporters. "But I want to reaffirm that we always prepared ourselves for a two-round election."

However, of the 7 million uncounted votes by late yesterday, 6 million were from Sao Paulo state, where Mr. Alckmin was beating the incumbent.

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Lula de Silva said he was confident of a first-round victory after voting in the industrial town of Sao Bernardo do Campo, where he rose to prominence as a labor leader.

For months, polls have shown the incumbent easily winning the race. But Mr. Lula de Silva saw his once-commanding lead plummet on the eve of the vote as his Workers' Party was battered by accusations that party officials tried to buy a mysterious dossier that apparently contained incriminating information about a political rival.

Major newspapers ran front-page photos over the weekend showing piles of money purportedly meant to buy information showing corrupt dealings by an opponent. Local press reported that the photos were leaked by federal police.

Mr. Lula de Silva's party said Mr. Alckmin's supporters were involved and filed a complaint yesterday with a judge demanding that Mr. Alckmin's candidacy be declared invalid because of the leak. The judge has said he would consider the case. Mr. Alckmin's campaign has denied involvement.

Six members of Mr. Lula da Silva's party, including an old friend who ran the president's personal security detail, face arrest warrants on suspicion of involvement in efforts to buy the damaging information. Mr. Lula da Silva fired his campaign manager days before the election but repeatedly has denied knowledge of any wrongdoing.

Mr. Alckmin said yesterday that he was sure "ethics will defeat corruption."

In Brazil, Da Silva Forced Into Runoff (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett and Geraldo Samor

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073089

RIO DE JANEIRO -- Turned off by government corruption, Brazilian voters denied President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva the majority of the vote he needed to win re-election in yesterday's first round of balloting, setting the stage for a runoff with centrist Geraldo Alckmin.

With 99.1% of the vote counted, Mr. da Silva had 48.7% of the vote compared with 41.6% for his chief rival, Mr. Alckmin. With Mr. da Silva falling short of the required 50% threshold, the president's aides were acknowledging late last night that there would be a second round of voting Oct. 29.

Mr. da Silva has witnessed an erosion in his once formidable lead in the past couple of weeks following revelations that officials of his Workers Party tried to buy a dossier linking candidates in Mr. Alckmin's Social Democratic Party to an ambulance-procurement scam. Mr. da Silva's failure to convincingly address the scandal -- he skipped a debate with other candidates Thursday -- clearly upset voters, who had seen a host of previous corruption cases in his government.

A runoff would present a win-win situation for investors. Though a leftist, Mr. da Silva has proved in his first term that he is a responsible steward of fiscal policy, and financial markets have enjoyed an extended rally since he took office in 2003. But most investors think Mr. Alckmin, a former governor of the wealthy São Paulo state, has a clearer notion of the overhauls to the pension system and labor law Brazil needs to rev up its slow-growing economy.

Heading into the second round, Mr. da Silva would have the advantages of incumbency. But Mr. Alckmin would have momentum. In pre-election polls tracking a matchup between Mr. da Silva and Mr. Alckmin, Mr. Alckmin had reduced the deficit to just five points from 17 points since Sept. 19, according to the Datafolha agency.

Mr. da Silva would be expected to hammer on the benefits he has brought to poor Brazilians, who are enjoying low food prices and government welfare stipends that go to 11 million families. Mr. Alckmin would continue to challenge Mr. da Silva on corruption.

"Brazilians historically have been indifferent about (corruption), " says political consultant Andre Torretta. "You cannot come to a guy who's making less than the minimum wage and preach to him about ethics."

But the scandals during Mr. da Silva's presidency have been so devastating that Brazilians, especially those in the middle class, seem to be drawing a line. On Saturday, newspapers published photographs of the stacks of cash that police seized from Workers Party operatives alleged to have been involved in the smear campaign against the opposition. That follows a massive scandal last year in which some of Mr. da Silva's closest Workers Party allies are facing indictment for running a slush fund to buy votes in Congress. In a separate incident last year, a Workers Party official was arrested trying to go through airport security with $100,000 stashed in his underwear.

The rhetoric of the runoff is sure to be nasty. To make the point that he was blameless of the scandals involving his party, Mr. da Silva recently compared himself to Jesus Christ betrayed by Judas. In a response, Former President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, a top Social Democratic leader, said that Mr. da Silva "is not Christ, he is the devil, and we have to kick him out."

The campaign styles are also a contrast. The rough-hewn but charismatic Mr. da Silva is viewed with reverence by poor Brazilians; one mayor in the Amazon approached the president on his knees recently.

Mr. Alckmin, a doctor by training, is a much more subdued figure on the stump. Claudio Lembo, the current São Paulo governor, recently likened Mr. Alckmin to "the son-in-law every mother-in-law wanted to have."

Some key trends will work in Brazil's favor when the presidential term starts Jan. 1. Brazil's interest rates, which have been among the highest in the world, are falling and recently hit a 20-year-low. Policy makers hope that prompts consumers to open their wallets. The benchmark interest rate, which has fallen to 14.25% from 19.75% over the past year, is expected to slip further in coming months now that Brazil has succeeded in bringing inflation down to around 4% annually. The government also hopes investors will give the go-ahead to stalled bricks-and-mortar projects once uncertainty over the election ends.

Brazil's leaders also will cross their fingers for continued strength in the global economy. Brazil has been blessed in recent years with low global interest rates and high international prices for the country's agrarian and mining commodities, due largely to demand from China.

But Brazil's economy is beset by structural problems. The country's sprawling public sector is sustained by a highly taxed citizenry, and government bureaucracy stifles entrepreneurial energy. Also, due to higher spending in an election year, the government will struggle to meet its year-end goal of a primary budget surplus of 4.25% of gross domestic product.

In June, Fitch Ratings upgraded Brazil's sovereign debt rating by a single notch to Double B, which is two steps below investment grade. "We think the new government will stick to the macroeconomic policy, but there will be very little action on reform," says Roger Scher, a Fitch managing director. "It's going to be hard for whoever wins to put together a coalition and hold it together."

A Congress that has been historically fragmented would be harder for Mr. da Silva to handle in a second term due to scandals that have weakened his Workers Party and angered the opposition. "At least initially, the atmosphere will remain charged," says Fernando Lattman-Weltman, a political scientist with Rio's Getulio Vargas Foundation. "The opposition will be suffering from a hangover and there will be a runoff in many states."

Most analysts view Mr. Alckmin as more capable of engineering the profound economic changes Brazil needs. There is widespread opposition and sensitivity to changing the public pension system, which costs 12% of GDP, a higher average than wealthy countries with much older populations, says a JP Morgan report. Unions are also protective of Brazil's labor code, which is based on that of Mussolini's fascist government in Italy and results in millions of lawsuits against employers and significant severance charges.

But Antonio Delfim Netto, a congressman who was finance minister during the 1960s and 1970s, has had conversations with Mr. da Silva's aides and says they know what needs to be done to address Brazil's slowing growth. "They have no alternative," Mr. Netto says. "They know Brazilians won't tolerate another tax hike." Brazil's average tax load has climbed to 38% of GDP, comparable with wealthier countries', from 26% over the past 12 years.

Embattled Brazil Incumbent Fails To Win First-Round Ballot (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Monday, Oct. 2 — Brazil's embattled president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, finished first in the presidential vote held here Sunday, but fell just short of the majority he needed to avoid a runoff on Oct. 29.

With more than 99.2 percent of the ballots tabulated early Monday, Mr. da Silva, his momentum checked by a last-minute corruption and ethics scandal, had 48.65 percent of the vote. The most competitive of his seven opponents, Geraldo Alckmin of the Brazilian Social Democratic Party, was running closer than had been expected, with 41.6 percent of the vote.

Mr. Alckmin ended up finishing first in the more industrialized, modern and prosperous states of Brazil's south, including his home state of São Paulo, with 40 million people the largest in this nation of 185 million. Mr. da Silva, a 60-year-old former factory worker and labor union leader, performed strongest in the poorer, more backward states of the country's northeast, his native region, where he ended up polling more than two-thirds of the vote.

Campaigning on a platform of social justice and clean government, Mr. da Silva and his leftist Workers' Party won a landslide victory in a runoff four years ago this month. But his administration has been marked by one scandal after another, ranging from multimillion dollar schemes to buy the support of members of congress to rigging contracts for the purchase of blood products.

Nevertheless, Mr. da Silva had seemed assured of coasting to a first round re-election victory until the eruption of the so-called Dossiergate scandal two weeks ago. That was when Workers' Party operatives were caught trying to pay $792,000 in cash for information they apparently thought would incriminate Mr. Alckmin's party in a scandal at the Health Ministry involving kickbacks on the purchase of ambulances.

Workers' Party leaders tried to put the best face on a result they had hoped to avoid. "I want to reaffirm that we always prepared ourselves for a two-round election," said Marco Aurelio Garcia, who became Mr. da Silva's campaign manager less than two weeks ago, after his predecessor was forced to step down because of the dossier scandal.

Mr. Alckmin, a doctor and former governor whose level of support rose 10 points in the polls after the dossier scandal broke, was jubilant at the sudden turn and predicted that "ethics will defeat corruption" in the second round. "Lula had his chance," he told supporters in São Paulo, using the president's nickname. "A new team can do more for Brazil."

The division of Latin America's largest country into two evenly matched groups, one pro-Lula, the other opposed to him, was reflected at a polling place in Tijuca, a middle-class neighborhood here in Brazil's second-biggest city.

After casting their ballots Sunday afternoon, Etevaldo Mello and his wife, Fernanda Bandeira, found themselves in opposing camps.

"I voted for Lula in 2002, but I won't ever make that mistake again," said Mr. Mello, a 40-year-old systems analyst. "He hasn't done what he promised, and all we've had is corruption. I've lost hope and my faith in him."

But Ms. Bandeira, a 39-year-old social worker, said she was sticking with Mr. da Silva. "There's always been corruption, but at least Lula has brought it out into the light of day and is trying to fight it," she said. "And he's done more for the poor than all of those before him."

Other voters who described themselves as having been undecided during the campaign cited two last-minute developments as persuading them to vote against the president. Several said they were offended because he failed to take part in a candidates' debate Thursday night, while others said they were disgusted by photographs published Saturday of the stacks of dollars and local currency seized from the Workers' Party dirty tricks squad in the dossier case.

"I didn't vote for Alckmin; I voted against Lula and the corruption around him," said Jose Reis, a 39-year-old salesman interviewed in Madureira, a working class neighborhood here. "There are just too many scandals, and it's damaging the country."

DOJ_NMG_0073091

As in all previous scandals during the past 18 months, Mr. da Silva said he did not know about the skullduggery of his party's operatives in the dossier case. Those under investigation in the incident include Mr. da Silva's longtime bodyguard and the husband of his personal secretary.

The balloting took place with the country in a somber mood after the crash of a passenger plane with 155 people aboard deep in the Amazon jungle on Friday.

Brazilian Vote Forces Lula Into Runoff (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

SAO PAULO, Brazil — Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva fell short of the votes needed Sunday to avoid a runoff election this month, official results showed.

With 98% of the ballots counted, Lula had 48.8% of the vote compared with 41.4% for his principal challenger, Geraldo Alckmin, the conservative former governor of Sao Paulo state, electoral officials said.

New allegations of electoral dirty tricks appeared to cost Lula crucial support in recent days, experts said, turning a comfortable majority into a showing of less than 50%, and triggering a runoff election Oct. 29 with Alckmin, who had a surprisingly strong showing.

The unexpected setback could set up a contentious month of campaigning as Lula counterattacks and a united opposition seeks further evidence of campaign irregularities by the ruling Workers' Party.

Lula, whose rise from impoverished factory hand to chief executive of Latin America's largest nation won him global acclaim four years ago, had seemed assured of a smooth reelection until a scandal emerged last month to blemish anew the reputation of his Workers' Party.

Lula's 59% showing in polls sank after the "bloodsucker scandal," in which members of Alckmin's party have been linked to alleged kickbacks for the sale of overpriced ambulances to city governments, metamorphosed into a purported plot by Lula's political camp designed to tarnish Alckmin and his Brazilian Social Democracy Party.

Lula has not been directly implicated in the latest scandal, but it has forced him to dismiss several top aides, including his campaign manager.

"I'm confident we are going to win this election today," Lula told reporters Sunday after voting in the industrial suburb of Sao Bernardo do Campo.

Allegations have emerged that operatives of his party were involved in an effort to pay about $700,000 for a dossier of recordings, photos and documents from a family at the center of the "bloodsucker" scandal. The dossier is said to be damaging to Alckmin's party.

Newspapers here ran photos of some of the stacks of money seized by federal police and purported to be the payment for the incriminating material.

"Ethics will defeat corruption," Alckmin said as he cast his ballot in Sao Paulo. "Lula has had his opportunity. A new team can do more for Brazil."

The dossier episode is the latest scandal to batter the image of Lula, 60, who repeatedly denounced Brazil's ingrained corruption in the lead-up to his historic victory in 2002, his fourth run at the presidency.

The string of corruption allegations has clearly drained some of Lula's support, especially among middle-class and elite voters here in Brazil's financial and industrial capital. Many also were upset that Lula skipped a presidential debate last week.

"Lula managed to become just like the other candidates," complained Augusto Silveira, 28, a psychologist here. "He seems like the others, hungry for power and failing to keep his promises to the people."

But the burly, bearded president remains popular among the struggling urban and rural population. His signature "Zero Hunger" program guarantees about $23 a month to poor families, providing a survival cushion in a nation with wide disparities of income and wealth.

"I know everything he is accused of, but I will vote for Lula," said Jose Carlos de Oliveira, 63, a retired professor. "At least he is doing something for the poorest, which those who ruled Brazil for 500 years never did."

Lula, the son of impoverished farmers from Brazil's northeast, became an auto worker in the industrial belt here after his family migrated, following the path of many rural Brazilians. He rose to the position of outspoken union leader and national political figure before being elected Brazil's first leftist president.

When asked "Are you a communist?" Lula famously replied: "No, I am a machine worker."

The former assembly line worker helped defeat a U.S.-sponsored free-trade zone proposal last year in a protest against U.S. farm subsidies, and he has been a critic of the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0073092

Unlike Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, Lula has sought close ties with Washington and has generally avoided strident criticism of the United States. He has governed as a moderate and won praise on Wall Street and in Washington at a time when leftist politicians often antagonistic toward the U.S. are on the rise in South America.

In doing so, Lula has faced criticism on the left from those who say he has betrayed his socialist ideals and caved in to mainstream capitalism.

During the campaign, Lula pledged to bolster social programs, raise the minimum wage, improve educational opportunities for the youth and continue Brazil's steady growth.

Alckmin, a doctor and a longtime politician, has promised to cut taxes, lower interest rates, clean up corruption and streamline the federal bureaucracy. But he lacks Lula's national recognition and charisma.

Presidential candidate Heloisa Helena, a senator who was purged from Lula's party after criticizing his economic policies as too conservative, was getting less than 10% of the vote.

Also at stake were 27 governorships, 27 Senate seats and all 513 seats in the lower house of Congress.

Social Democrats Defeat Governing Party In Austria (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

VIENNA, Oct. 1 — In an election shadowed by fears about immigration, voters in Austria rebuked the governing People's Party on Sunday, handing a narrow victory to the Social Democratic Party and leaving two extreme right parties as players on an uncertain political landscape.

The conservative People's Party, led by Chancellor Wolfgang Schüssel, won 34.2 percent of the vote, a loss of more than eight percentage points from the election in 2002. The Social Democrats won 35.7 percent, raising the prospect that their leader, Alfred Gusenbauer, could replace Mr. Schüssel as chancellor, perhaps in a so-called grand coalition with the People's Party.

While analysts had expected the People's Party to lose ground, the size of the loss was a surprise, and a stinging reversal for Mr. Schüssel, who once reaped credit for Austria's robust economy. "We all underestimated how the common people feel," said Hans Rauscher, a political columnist for Der Standard. "The lesson is that arrogance doesn't pay."

For Jörg Haider, the once-powerful far-right leader whose party has been a fading partner in Mr. Schüssel's coalition, the election was a reprieve from political extinction.

His party, the Alliance for Austria's Future, appeared to have clung to seats in Parliament, winning 4.2 percent of the vote, just above the required 4 percent threshold. If it had fallen below that — as pollsters had predicted — Mr. Haider would have lost his toehold in national politics.

"He is almost finished on a national level, but his ideas are not finished," said Anton Pelinka, a political scientist in Vienna. The Freedom Party, which Mr. Haider led for two decades before quitting last year after a power struggle to start his new party, won 11.2 percent — a result that positions it to play a strong opposition role. It had called for Austria to expel all illegal immigrants and halt new arrivals.

Placards for the party's new leader, Heinz-Christian Strache, depict an Austrian flag above the slogan, "Daham statt Islam," a colloquialism that translates as "Home instead of Islam." A 37-year-old former dental technician, Mr. Strache looks like a younger version of Mr. Haider.

A party official, Harald Vilimsky, said the campaign tapped into the frustration of many Viennese, who find that their German-speaking children are a minority in the public schools. Mr. Schüssel, 61, who is more respected than loved, dismissed fears of an influx of immigrants from Eastern Europe. He was then embarrassed by reports that his mother-in-law was under the care of an Eastern European nurse, who was in Austria illegally.

While the extreme right did not match its best result — 27 percent in 1999 — it remains a force. A sign of that, analysts said, is that the anti-immigrant talk honed by Mr. Haider in the 1990's has become part of the political mainstream.

Although the major parties deplore the xenophobia of the far-right parties, they have strengthened their stance on immigration issues. The People's Party has toughened requirements for Austrian citizenship, while the Social Democrats have promised to crack down on crimes committed by foreigners. "They don't say, 'We're going to be tough on foreigners'; they say, 'We're going to be tough on illegal immigrants,' " said Herbert Lackner, the editor of Profil, a political magazine.

Only the Green Party called for more tolerance, and it finished fourth behind the Freedom Party.

Many Austrians are convinced that the European Union's expansion will flood the country with people bent on taking their jobs. The new twist, since the heyday of Mr. Haider, is that this suspicion now has an anti-Muslim tinge. "In the 90's, anti-immigration rhetoric was focused on rising crime and asylum seekers from the Balkans," said Peter Paul Hajek, a political analyst at the Austrian Marketing Institute, a polling company. "Now it's more about the clash between Islam and Christianity."

DOJ_NMG_0073093

With these inconclusive voting results, Austria finds itself in a position similar to Germany after its election last year. The two major parties may be forced into a grand coalition, since the extreme right parties have discouraged talk of a coalition with the People's Party. In a television interview on Sunday, Mr. Schüssel focused on the problems dogging Chancellor Angela Merkel. "Looking at Germany," he said, "one can see it is not so easy."

Schüssel Party Loses Austrian Election (FT)

By Eric Frey And Haig Simonian

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

The conservative People's party of the Austrian chancellor Wolfgang Schüssel suffered a stunning defeat in general elections on Sunday as the rival Social Democrats narrowly beat it into first place.

The result makes it almost certain Mr Schüssel's centre-right government will be replaced by a grand coalition led by Alfred Gusenbauer, the Social Democrat leader.

Mr Gusenbauer has vowed to cancel Austria's controversial purchase of Eurofighter military jets from the aerospace group EADS and reverse the introduction of university tuition fees. The two measures are part of wider social policy measures intended to mark a break from the "unfeeling" People's party liberal economic policies.

However, the broader economic measures that have made Austria one of the European Union's most successful members and prompted growth of more than 3 per cent this year are not expected to change significantly.

The People's party general secretary Reinhold Lopatka blamed the defeat on a low turnout, the emergence of fringe parties and a degree of complacency because of widespread expectations of a win. The chancellor is expected to resign as party leader but may put himself in the running for a European post.

Mr Schüssel, one of Europe's most experienced and longest-serving politicians, appeared to have fallen victim to popular unease with reforms such as overhaul of the pension system. "We tried to do what we could, but it looks as if it wasn't quite enough," he said last night.

Before the election, virtually all pollsters had predicted a Schüssel win, boosted by a scandal involving a trade union-owned bank with close ties to the Social Democrats.

Instead, the People's party lost 8 per cent of its former record vote, ending up with 34.2 per cent, based on preliminary official results.

That was just behind the Social Democrats who, in spite of slipping 0.8 percentage points compared with 2002, won 35.7 per cent.

Mr Schüssel also lost support to two far-right parties and a new protest group led by maverick EU parliamentarian, Hans-Peter Martin.

Exploiting Austria's strong euroscepticism, and especially concerns about immigrants from eastern Europe and Islamic countries, as well as EU accession talks with Turkey, the ultra-right Freedom party boosted its share from 10.2 to 11.2 per cent.

The improvement came in spite of the fact that the party's "moderate" wing split off last year on the initiative of Jörg Haider, once Europe's most successful rightwing leader.

Mr Haider's new group, the Alliance for Austria's Future (BZÖ), scraped past the 4 per cent threshold needed to gain seats in parliament, but is too weak to play a role in the next government.

Center-left Opposition Wins In Austria (AP)

By Veronika Oleksyn, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

Austria's opposition Social Democrats won nationwide elections on Sunday, swinging the country to the center-left after more than six years of influence by the extreme right, final unofficial returns showed.

With all but absentee ballots counted, the center-left bloc had 35.7 percent of the vote and the People's Party trailed with 34.2 percent, Interior Minister Liese Prokop said.

Although Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel did not formally concede the election, he congratulated the leader of the Social Democrats, Alfred Gusenbauer, who would likely become the country's next chancellor. "We are a democratic country," Schuessel said.

Schuessel said he didn't blame anyone for the disappointing results, saying: "I carry the main responsibility for my party and I do that with conviction."

Gusenbauer, meanwhile, declined to proclaim outright victory, saying he would wait for all the votes to be counted. Officials said there were about 250,000 valid absentee votes to be tallied between now and Oct. 9, when the final results must be certified.

DOJ_NMG_0073094

"I never gave up hope. I always said there would be a surprise on Sunday," he said. "The people in Austria are of the opinion that yes, we're a rich and well-off country but it's not all distributed fairly enough and therefore people have the need for a correction."

Among other things, the Social Democrats have promised to lower the number of unemployed by 100,000 and reduce salary differences between men and women. The party had been in opposition since 2000 following more than three decades as the top vote-getter in Austrian elections.

The current governing coalition is made up of the People's Party and the rightist Alliance for the Future of Austria, which had vowed during the campaign to reduce the number of foreigners in Austria by 30 percent over the next three years.

Immigration had been a central theme of the campaign, with bitter debates over how to integrate foreigners into Austrian society.

The far right Freedom Party, which finished third with 11.2 percent of the vote, had pushed for the immediate deportation of all asylum seekers and other foreigners who commit crimes and argued that the number of foreign children whose mother tongue is not German should be capped at 30 percent in certain public schools.

The Greens finished fourth with 10.5 percent of the vote, and the Alliance for the Future of Austria captured 4.2 percent, just over the threshold needed to remain in parliament.

"Austrians have voted for a fairer society. They're looking for a much stronger commitment to the well-being of all citizens," said Paul Nyrup Rasmussen, president of the Brussels, Belgium-based Party of European Socialists.

"It's the start of a new era, and Austria can leave behind the international embarrassment of a coalition with the far right," he said.

In 1999, the Freedom Party's stunning 27 percent win in national elections — and its subsequent inclusion in the government — sparked months of EU diplomatic sanctions because of concerns over statements by then-leader Joerg Haider perceived as anti-Semitic and sympathetic to Nazi Germany's labor policies.

The main parties have ruled out including the Freedom Party in a new coalition.

President Heinz Fischer said he would meet on Tuesday with party heads, though it was unclear when he would ask the winner to form a new government.

Sunday's turnout was about 74 percent of Austria's 6 million eligible voters.

Hungary PM Suffers Big Poll Losses (FT)

By Christopher Condon

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

Ferenc Gyurcsany, Hungary's prime minister, suffered a double blow on Sunday night, when Laszlo Solyom, the president, called for his removal. Later, voters in nationwide local elections gave his Socialist party a beating.

Neither Mr Gyurcsany's position nor his newly introduced austerity measures was immediately threatened as his party continued to rally behind him.

However, the prime minister's ability to press forward with long-term plans for difficult public sector reforms may have suffered.

The opposition Fidesz party, along with thousands who have called for his resignation during recent anti-government demonstrations, received a clear boost from the day's events.

Sunday's vote comes two weeks after the revelation that Mr Gyurcsany had admitted lying about state finances to win April parliamentary elections.

With more than 80 per cent of precincts reporting, Fidesz looked headed for victory in 18 of 19 counties and in 19 of 23 cities.

The Socialists' were headed for only one significant victory, in Budapest, where they and their liberal coalition looked likely to retain control of the city council and the mayor's office.

Liberal Gabor Demszky, mayor of Budapest since 1990, narrowly led in his bid to win a fifth consecutive term.

The biggest surprise of the evening, however, was as a stunning blow to Mr Gyurcsany from Laszlo Solyom, Hungary's president.

In a televised address shortly after polls closed, Mr Solyom called on the country's parliament to remove Mr Gyurcsany from office.

Mr Solyom said Hungary was still immersed in a "moral crisis" related to Mr Gyurcsany's admissions to lying.

The president condemned recent street violence in Budapest but praised those who have demonstrated peacefully and called for Mr Gyurcsany's removal.

DOJ_NMG_0073095

"The peaceful protests across the country showed the healthy moral sense of the people to me. However, the catharsis and purge have not taken place," he said.

Mr Solyom said public finances represented Hungary's most pressing problem and he would support plans for reform. But, he added, reforms would not succeed without public support.

Mr Solyom said only parliament had the constitutional power to solve the crisis. He said: "The parliament decides on the person of the prime minister. The parliament can restore the required social confidence."

Socialist party members reacted to the speech by angrily attacking Mr Solyom for interfering in party politics and declaring their continued support for Mr Gyurcsany.

The news electrified an anti-government demonstration in front of the downtown parliament building that was estimated at 10,000 people.

On June 17, an audio taped leaked to the press revealed that Mr Gyurcsany, while imploring Socialist MPs to support his plans for reforms, said his party had lied repeatedly about state finances and the need to introduce austerity measures.

The resulting unrest did not significantly unsettle financial markets but caused analysts and investors to worry that Mr Gyurcsany's ability to pursue reforms would be damaged.

Moody's Investors Service and Fitch, the credit rating agencies, signalled they may soon downgrade Hungary's sovereign debt ratings.

Hungary is expected to post a 10.1 per cent budget deficit this year and is under heavy pressure to from investors and the European Union to make significant deficit cuts over the next three years.

Hungary's President Urges Premier's Ouster (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

BERLIN, Oct. 1 — Hungary's president, Laszlo Solyom, speaking on national public television Sunday just as the polls closed in local government elections, asked Parliament to oust Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany for lying to the country about the state of the economy.

The surprise announcement by Mr. Solyom, an independent who was elected president last year, came as the voting ended in what was seen as the first test of Mr. Gyurcsany's political future since antigovernment protests erupted in Budapest and other cities over two weeks ago.

Voters cast ballots on Sunday in mayoral races and elections for local representatives in 3,174 cities, towns and villages. According to preliminary results released late Sunday by the National Election Office, with some 76 percent of the votes counted, the main opposition party, Fidesz-Hungarian Civic Union, seemed poised to win mayoral races in 15 of Hungary's 23 largest cities, as well as majorities in the county councils in 18 of the 19 counties, The Associated Press reported.

Mr. Gyurcsany's Socialist Party was seen retaining power in most of Budapest's 23 districts, and Mayor Gabor Demszky of Budapest — supported by the government coalition of Socialists and Free Democrats — was likely to win his fifth consecutive term since the 1990 return to democracy, The A.P. said.

As television viewers were waiting for the first results to trickle in just after the polls closed at 7 p.m. local time, Mr. Solyom, a quiet-spoken former president of the Constitutional Court of Hungary — the equivalent of the Supreme Court in the United States — appeared on screens.

"The prime minister refused to admit that he used inadmissible means to keep power," Mr. Solyom said, adding that the moral fiber of the government was called into question after Mr. Gyurcsany lied to the public during the parliamentary elections last April.

"The Parliament decides who is the prime minister," Mr. Solyom said. "The Parliament can restore society's confidence. The parliamentary majority holds the key to the solution."

Mr. Gyurcsany had told a closed meeting of the Socialist Party's top officials in May that the party had "lied in the morning and lied in the evening" to the electorate. When a tape of that meeting was leaked to Hungarian radio two weeks ago, spontaneous demonstrations erupted in Budapest and other cities, with protesters demanding that Mr. Gyurcsany, a wealthy businessman, resign.

As the demonstrations wore on, the protesters also voiced strong opposition to Mr. Gyurcsany's proposed economic program, which aimed at reducing the budget deficit from 10 percent of the gross domestic product by introducing sharp reductions in the public sector as well as introducing health charges and tuition fees for university students.

Mr. Gyurcsany repeatedly shrugged off the demonstrations, saying that he would not resign and that he was the only one in his party who could introduce bold reforms.

Mr. Solyom said Sunday that Mr. Gyurcsany had brought the office of prime minister — and politics — into disrepute.

DOJ_NMG_0073096

Emese Danks, a spokesman for Mr. Gyurcsany's coalition government of Socialists and Free Democrats, declined to comment on Mr. Solyom's announcement. "This is a party issue. This has nothing to do with the government. I have nothing to say," Danks said.

Eszter Pataki, a spokeswoman for the conservative Fidesz party, said her party agreed with "what the president said — this is the right line."

Earlier in the day, Mr. Gyurcsany said the results from the nationwide local government elections would not derail his economic program.

"I do not see any cause to consider this election as a referendum on the central government," he said as he cast his vote in an affluent part of Budapest. "We are continuing our program and I am quite sure that at the end, a significant majority of the people will think it was a successful one."

Serbia Asserts Its Sovereignty Over Kosovo In Legislation (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

SARAJEVO, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Oct. 1 — As the United Nations Security Council looks increasingly likely to grant independence to Kosovo, Serbia's government has adopted a new Constitution that asserts what it considers is its irrefutable right to the province.

The Serbian Parliament voted overwhelmingly on Saturday to pass the Constitution, which includes a provision that defines Kosovo — currently administered by the United Nations — as an "integral part" of Serbia.

Kosovo's fate is the subject of United Nations-led negotiations between the Serbian government and ethnic Albanians in the province. The ethnic Albanians want independence, while the Serbian government and the province's small Serbian community demand that Kosovo remain part of Serbia.

Few Western diplomats say the groups will be able to reach agreement, leaving the decision to the United Nations Security Council, which is expected to grant Kosovo its independence, possibly by the end of the year.

The countries leading the United Nations effort to broker an agreement — a group that includes the United States and Russia — have been trying to get commitments from Kosovo's ethnic Albanians that they would not discriminate against or harm the Serbian minority. The countries hoped that would help Serbia accept Kosovo's independence.

But Western diplomats say Serbia has been intransigent about the possible breakup, and the passage of the Constitution is yet another indication that the country will not accept Kosovo's independence easily.

Diplomats fear that if Serbia does not agree to Kosovo's independence, it will foment trouble, including backing efforts by ethnic Serbs to resist Kosovo's ethnic Albanian-dominated government.

Although officially part of Serbia, Kosovo has been administered by the United Nations since June 1999, when Yugoslav troops were forced to withdraw after months of NATO-led bombing.

In 1998 and 1999, an estimated 10,000 people, mostly ethnic Albanian civilians, were killed as the Serbian-dominated Yugoslav Army and the Serbian police cracked down on an ethnic Albanian insurgency.

The new Serbian Constitution, which was drafted after the breakup of the state of Serbia and Montenegro in May, still must be approved by a popular referendum, set for Oct. 28 and 29, before it can become law. New parliamentary elections would follow in December.

The declaration on Kosovo drew criticism from ethnic Albanian leaders. "This is a unilateral decision, which will create problems in the future in normalizing the relations between an independent Kosovo and Serbia," Lutfi Haziri, deputy prime minister of Kosovo, said Sunday, according to Agence France-Presse. But he added: "I don't think the decision will be an obstacle for the status talks."

Serbs make up less than 10 percent of the population of Kosovo. Most of them live in enclaves spread across the province, where their movements are restricted because they fear attack by ethnic Albanians.

In an address to the Parliament of Serbia on Saturday, Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica said, "By defending Kosovo and Metohija as our crucial national interest, you have unanimously decided to adopt a new Constitution that would confirm that Kosovo and Metohija is simply ours." (Kosovo and Metohija is what the Serbs call the province.)

In a separate development, an important party in Mr. Kostunica's coalition administration announced over the weekend that it was withdrawing from the government.

The pro-European G17 Plus Party said its ministers would resign because of what they said were the government's weak efforts to find and arrest Ratko Mladic, a Balkan war crimes suspect and former commander of the Bosnian Serb Army.

In neighboring Bosnia, voters went to the polls on Sunday, marking the end of a campaign in which major political parties were accused by international observers of promoting tensions among ethnic groups.

DOJ_NMG_0073097

The elections will lead to the appointment of representatives to Bosnia's governmental institutions, which were set up by the 1995 Dayton peace agreement. The pact ended the country's three-year civil war.

The institutions include a Parliament and a three-member presidency representing each of Bosnia's main ethnic groups: Orthodox Christian Serbs, Bosnian Muslims and Catholic Croats.

Tension Between Russia, Georgia Heats Up (AP)

By Maria Danilova

AP, October 2, 2006

The Cold War is long over, but the tension between Georgia and Russia revisits many of its issues — allegations of spying by Moscow, suspicions of interference by the United States and concerns that a hot war will start without some sort of compromise.

Last week's arrest of four Russian soldiers on charges of spying pushed a decade of animosity between Russia and Georgia to new heights. Russia recalled its ambassador, called Georgia a "bandit state" and stopped issuing visas to Georgians.

The reactions were far stronger than the tit-for-tat expulsions that usually accompany espionage scandals.

Amid an exchange of angry words, Russian President Vladimir Putin's response on Sunday stood out — likening Georgia's actions to those of Lavrenti Beria, the Georgian who headed the Soviet secret police under Joseph Stalin, and calling them "state terrorism."

But also Sunday, Putin took a step that could keep the tensions from spiraling further by ordering the defense ministry to continue its plans for withdrawing troops from Georgia. A Russian general a day earlier had announced that the plans were suspended.

Georgia's West-leaning government resents Russia for its close contacts with two separatist Georgian regions, for its reluctance to pulling out thousands of troops based in the country as a Soviet-era holdover and for economic pressure including sharply increasing the price of natural gas to banning Georgian wine, one of the country's major exports.

Russia in turn resists Georgia's drive to join NATO, its demands for the withdrawal of Russian forces and President Mikhail Saakashvili's determination to re-exert control over the breakaway regions of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, both of which seek possible annexation into Russia and have Russian forces present as peacekeepers.

It was also annoyed that a major oil pipeline from the Caspian Sea to Turkey runs through Georgia, bypassing Russia, and bristled when Georgia arrested a dozen opposition figures that Tbilisi claimed were plotting a coup with Russian backing.

The Kremlin saw Saakashvili's coming to power as an illegitimate regime change driven by Western governments, and the Western-educated Georgian leader has persistently aggravated Russia.

He went after the Russia-connected leader of the renegade province of Adzharia; then a seizure of Russian trucks in South Ossetia set off skirmishes there. Georgia took control of a small section of Abkhazia this year — and last week renamed it Upper Abkhazia — prompting Russian statements of support for the regions' drive for self-determination.

And last month he told the United Nations General Assembly that Russia was conducting a "gangster occupation" in the separatist regions. But relations were tense even with Saakashvili's predecessor Eduard Shevardnadze, who favored eventually joining NATO and had accepted U.S. troops and aid to buff up Georgia's impoverished army.

"There was already a kind of slowly developing cold war under Shevardnadze ... but when Saakashvili came to power, he sped up the process," said Ghia Nodia, an analyst with the Caucasus Institute for Peace Democracy and Development.

In the view of Sergei Markov, a Kremlin-connected analyst, the spying scandal is the next step in pushing tensions to all-out conflict.

"I think all these actions have, as their final goal, preparation for military operations first in South Ossetia and then in Abkhazia," Markov was quoted as saying by the RIA-Novosti news agency.

"One cannot rule out that there will be military conflicts or military incidents," agreed Georgian analyst Ramaz Sakvarelidze.

To avoid war, Sakvarelidze suggested, Georgia could stop its demand that Russian peacekeepers leave the separatist regions if, in turn, the troops changed their mandate from being "a wall between conflicting sides to a positive role in helping to build up relations." Georgia alleges the Russian troops support the separatists, essentially making Abkhazia and South Ossetia into proxy states.

Russia meanwhile wields significant influence over Georgia with its natural gas supplies. However, if it tried to cut off supplies, that could encourage Georgia to buy gas from Iran, as it did last winter when an explosion disrupted Russian deliveries to Georgia. That could also lead to new complaints from the West that Russia uses gas as a political weapon.

Russia last week tried to exert international pressure on Georgia by proposing a U.N. Security Council statement expressing grave concern at Tbilisi's actions. But the United States balked — potentially increasing Russian suspicions that the United States is behind the latest tensions.

DOJ_NMG_0073098

"It's obvious that the Georgian authorities have decided on this step under the dictates of the American special services," Communist Party leader Gennady Zyuganov said last week.

The United States has pursued close relations with Georgia and says its aid is aimed at boosting the country's security and democratic institutions.

Last week, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Matthew Bryza urged Russia and Georgia to negotiate, but Putin echoed Russia's suspicions on Sunday.

"These people think that under the roof of their foreign sponsors they can feel comfortable and secure. Is it really so?" Putin said.

Putin And Georgia Officials Intensify Rhetoric In Dispute (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 1 -- Russian President Vladimir Putin accused the Georgian government of "state terrorism with hostage-taking" in a blistering attack Sunday that followed the arrests on espionage charges last week of four Russian military officers in Georgia.

Georgian officials, meanwhile, said Putin had met last week with the leaders of two breakaway regions that are inside Georgia's internationally recognized borders. The Kremlin would neither "confirm nor deny" that Putin had met with the separatist leaders of Abkhazia and South Ossetia in the Black Sea resort of Sochi, where he was working last week.

Putin's harsh tone and, if confirmed, a meeting with the separatist leaders would presage a major rupture in relations between Russia and Georgia, which have been at odds since Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili came to power in January 2004 and set the former Soviet republic on a course away from Russian influence and toward membership in the NATO alliance.

Russia has provided quiet support to the two breakaway regions, including extending citizenship to many of their residents. But a meeting between Putin and their leaders would signify an open relationship that would infuriate the Georgians.

"This is an open support of separatism by Russia's leadership," Georgia's foreign minister, Gela Bezhuashvili, told reporters in Tbilisi, the country's capital.

Russia has signaled that any attempt to extend independence to Kosovo, a province of Serbia that has been administered by the United Nations since 1999, would provide a precedent for Abkhazia and South Ossetia to break away from Georgia. Both regions have been effectively independent since they routed Georgian forces in short wars in the early 1990s.

Saakashvili has said he is determined to reassert Georgian sovereignty over the two areas, and scrimmages along the borders in recent years have repeatedly threatened to spark renewed warfare. Russian forces are present in both regions -- as peacekeepers, according to Russia. Georgian officials say the Russian troops are propping up illegitimate governments.

Russia also maintains bases in other parts of Georgia, and Gen. Andrei Popov, head of the Russian military in the Caucasus, said on Sunday that any attempt to enter the facilities would be met with "deadly force." Georgian officials are seeking the arrest of a fifth Russian military officer who they say is in hiding in Russian military headquarters in Tbilisi.

Putin's comment came during a meeting at his country home outside Moscow to discuss the situation with senior ministers, leading legislators, armed forces chiefs and intelligence officials.

"The president described the actions of Georgia's leadership as an act of state terrorism with hostage-taking," the Kremlin said in a statement.

Before the meeting, Putin compared the arrests to the work of Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin's secret police chief, Lavrenti Beria, who, like Stalin, was a Georgian known for bloodthirsty ruthlessness.

"Our servicemen, as is known, have been detained and put behind bars," Putin said, making his first public comments on the crisis. "It is a sign of the legacy of Lavrenti Pavlovich Beria's policy."

On Thursday, Russia recalled its ambassador and evacuated other diplomats and their families from Georgia.

Georgian officials denounced the comments of Putin and other Russian officials as bellicose. "Our opinion is that this warlike rhetoric . . . can be described as an explicit threat to use military force," the Georgian Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

The intensity of the rhetoric has alarmed Western officials, who are calling for a negotiated settlement and privately urging the Georgians to find a quick solution, probably by expelling the Russians rather than putting them on trial, diplomats said.

Some Russian legislators are calling for a military solution, which would put Russia in conflict with a close U.S. ally with a force trained by Americans. Senior Russian officials so far have ruled out that option.

Putin hinted that the Georgians had been emboldened by their ties to the United States.

"By all appearances, those who are doing it believe that this anti-Russian bias in foreign policy meets the interests of the Georgian people," he said. "But I do not think so. These people believe that, being under the cover of their foreign sponsors, they can feel comfortable and safe. But is it really so?"

Putin Accuses Georgia Of Employing Stalinist Tactics (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

MOSCOW — Russian President Vladimir V. Putin used exceptionally harsh language Sunday to criticize Georgia for its arrest last week of four alleged Russian spies, accusing the former Soviet state of resorting to hostage-taking and Stalinist tactics.

In televised remarks made at the opening of a meeting with top security, defense and foreign policy officials, Putin said the Georgian government's actions followed in the path of Soviet dictator Josef Stalin's infamous secret service chief, Lavrenti P. Beria.

"It is absolutely clear that attempts are being made to sting Russia as painfully as possible and to provoke it," Putin said. "And, by all appearances, those who are doing it believe that this anti-Russian bias of foreign policy meets the interests of the Georgian people. But I do not think so."

Relations between Russia and Georgia have grown increasingly tense since the election in 2004 of pro-Western Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili, who came to power after a nonviolent people's revolt dubbed the Rose Revolution. Among the top aims of his administration has been to recover control of pro-Russian breakaway regions and to bring Georgia into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The heated rhetoric raised concerns about the risk of a military clash between Georgia and Russia, which has troops on peacekeeping duty in the breakaway regions. Russia also has two Soviet-era bases in the part of Georgia controlled by the central government.

In an apparent reference to the close ties that Georgia has with the United States and the European Union, Putin said that the Georgian policymakers "believe that, being under the cover of their foreign sponsors, they can feel comfortable and safe."

"But is it really so?" Putin continued. "Today, I would like to hear representatives of both the civilian departments and the military."

Putin then met behind closed doors with members of the country's security council.

After the meeting, the presidential website posted a statement that "the president termed the actions of Georgia's leadership as an act of state terrorism with hostage-taking."

Despite the angry words from Putin, his spokesman, Alexei Gromov, issued a brief statement Sunday evening that the president had ordered the Defense Ministry to continue the pullout of Russian troops from the two Soviet-era bases, in keeping with earlier agreements. The Russian military had announced Saturday that it had suspended closure of the bases in response to the spy dispute.

The four espionage suspects held by Georgia are among five Russian military officers arrested Wednesday. One of the five was released Thursday for lack of evidence. Ten Georgian citizens also were detained. Georgia has demanded that Moscow hand over a sixth officer believed to have taken refuge in Russia's military headquarters in Tbilisi, the Georgian capital.

Gen. Andrei Popov, the commander of Russian forces in Georgia, said Sunday that if provoked, his troops would respond with "any means necessary, including shooting to kill," the Russian news agency RIA Novosti reported.

Various top Russian officials besides Putin also have bitterly denounced Georgia's arrest of the spying suspects. But most of those statements, like Putin's, avoided direct comment on whether the detained officers were in fact intelligence agents.

Russia recalled its ambassador, Vyacheslav Kovalenko, in protest of the arrests, and he told reporters upon his arrival here Friday that the spying charges had "no solid basis at all." The Georgian government has released videotape that shows an exchange of money during a meeting of the alleged Russian spies and their Georgian contacts.

Putin is a former KGB agent, and before becoming president he headed its main domestic successor agency, the Federal Security Service. That personal background opened him to a bitterly sarcastic counterattack from a leader of Georgia's parliament, Giga Bokeria.

"Coming from Putin, it seems that the comparison with Beria is a compliment, because he is a direct successor," Bokeria said in comments broadcast on Georgia's Rustavi-2 television.

"However, of course this is an insult for us," Bokeria continued. "We are not proud of any legacy left by any Soviet executioner."

Incumbent Leads In Zambia Presidential Voting (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0073100

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Oct. 1 — Zambia's incumbent president, Levy Mwanawasa, surged into the lead on Sunday as vote-counting in that nation's presidential election neared a conclusion, leading angry supporters of the main opposition candidate to riot in some urban centers.

Mr. Mwanawasa's rival, Michael Sata, who led in vote tallies until now, accused the government of withholding results from provinces where he had done well and said the government was "creating tension in the nation" by refusing to acknowledge his victory.

But the nation's largest independent newspaper, The Zambia Post, said the results so far seemed to reflect its own polling of voters around the country. And a leading political historian, Bennett Siamwiza of the University of Zambia, said in a telephone interview that he believed that the vote, on Thursday, had been the most orderly and corruption-free in the nation's history.

With 94 of 150 voting constituencies reporting, Mr. Mwanawasa had almost 734,000 votes, or about 40 percent of the 1.8 million ballots counted. A businessman making his first foray into politics, Hakainde Hichilema, was second with 579,000 votes, and Mr. Sata, a former cabinet minister, trailed with 538,000 votes.

Mr. Sata, a charismatic speaker whose prop-filled campaign stops sometimes drew tens of thousands of supporters, had been pegged by some opinion polls as the runaway leader in the race. He won broad backing among Zambia's millions of poor people with his promises to turn around their lives within three months of taking office.

But some cautioned that it was unclear whether his throngs of supporters were actually registered to vote. Mr. Sata also confined much of his campaigning to Zambia's few big cities, and Mr. Mwanawasa appeared to be doing well in rural areas.

On Saturday, Mr. Sata angrily warned of "ghastly consequences" if election irregularities denied him victory. On Sunday, he declared himself the winner, saying the government was withholding results from his strongholds. "Let them announce the elections from our Lusaka, Copperbelt, Northern and Luapala Provinces, where we have won overwhelmingly," he said. "What criteria are they using in releasing the results?"

In Lusaka, the police arrested dozens of Sata backers after disturbances broke out when the latest vote tallies were announced. Shops closed, because of fear of more election-related violence.

But the government had already relented to Mr. Sata's demands that Chinese-manufactured computers not be used to count the vote — he said the Chinese supported Mr. Mwanawasa — and independent European observers have called the Zambia vote a model for the region.

"These are by far the best-organized elections in Zambia's history," Mr. Siamwiza, the historian said. "They're very transparent."

Webster Malido, the news editor of The Zambia Post in Lusaka, said in a telephone interview that Mr. Sata appeared to have believed that the crowds supporting him in Lusaka and other cities mirrored support elsewhere in the country.

"For Sata, the problem is that Mwanawasa was able to get some votes in every province, even where he did bad," he said. "But Sata only campaigned in urban areas," he added, and so was almost shut out in some rural regions.

Private Firms Eye Darfur (WT)

By Willis Witter

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

Private military companies protecting American diplomats, aid workers and local officials in Iraq and Afghanistan are making a pitch to take over U.N. peacekeeping missions in Darfur and other global hot spots where the United Nations is unable to stop the killing.

Companies such as Blackwater, Triple Canopy, DynCorp and Halliburton have mushroomed in size and number since the 2003 Iraq invasion, serving an increasing need to protect people and projects from terrorist attacks.

With a limited number of U.S. and coalition troops in Iraq, private companies fill a void with up to 100,000 employees, far more than all non-U.S. coalition troops combined. They do everything from serving meals on U.S. bases to protecting diplomats and visiting generals who venture outside the protected Green Zone in downtown Baghdad.

Some companies are looking beyond Iraq and seeking a greater role in peacekeeping, and the largely ineffective deployment of a 7,000-member African Union (AU) force in the Darfur region of western Sudan provides an opportunity.

Blackwater says it could get its people and equipment in Darfur in three weeks, provided U.N. members could agree on a plan. In comparison, it takes an average of six months for a U.N. peacekeeping team to deploy.

Within limits

There's nothing inherently wrong with the concept, said Robert Young Pelton, author of the just-released book "License to Kill," which provides an inside look at a secretive world of private military contracting.

DOJ_NMG_0073101

Few people even know about the industry, which is said to bid on $30 billion to $100 billion in annual contracts. One reason is that well-paid private contractors in Iraq and elsewhere typically sign agreements that include fines of up to $250,000 for speaking with reporters.

Shortly after Secretary of State Colin L. Powell visited Darfur in 2004, Blackwater put together a proposal to go in there and stop the two sides from killing each other, Mr. Pelton said.

"The problem is, if you look at the presentation, it includes not only men with guns. They're offering helicopter gunships, a fighter bomber that has the capacity to drop cluster bombs and [satellite-guided weapons], armored vehicles. You say: 'Wait a minute? That's a lot of offensive force. What does that have to do with peacekeeping?'"

Almost everyone agrees that the U.N. peacekeeping system is broken, a view underscored by the humanitarian disaster in Darfur, in which hundreds of thousands of people have been killed and millions driven into squalid refugee camps.

The private sector would not perform offensive operations, said Chris Taylor, Blackwater's vice president for strategic initiatives. But it could provide badly needed backup for the AU force in an area of Sudan roughly the size of France.

"If the AU comes in and performs an intervention in one area, we can follow behind them and relieve them so they can continue elsewhere. We can provide the defensive security and provide a defensive perimeter for the humanitarian organizations to follow. The NGOs can start doing what they do best within a secure environment, and that's what's missing in Darfur," Mr. Taylor said.

"We're having discussions with all the principals, the policy-makers, but as you can imagine, the obstacles to doing this are far more political than operational," he said.

Outside the law

On an ill-defined battlefield, such as in a guerrilla-led insurgency, contractors can quickly become soldiers.

Mr. Pelton's book describes one such battle between a handful of Blackwater contractors and the Mahdi Army militia of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr in Najaf.

In spring 2004, the militia attacked Camp Golf, then the local headquarters of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority.

Fighting lasted all day and night, with Blackwater contractors doing most of the fighting and Blackwater helicopters doing all the resupply and medical evacuations, Mr. Pelton writes.

"The military seemed to fear what was happening -- Blackwater Security versus the Mahdi Army while the U.S. military stood by watching -- essentially an American mercenary militia battling an Iraqi mercenary militia."

U.N. peacekeeping operations make limited use of private companies to move troops and supplies; provide logistical support, medical personnel, portable outhouses; and perform other tasks.

Air transport for the 18 U.N. peacekeeping missions is done by private companies. Guards at many U.N. facilities are supplied by companies that bid for contracts. In Liberia, an entire police force was trained by one of the biggest military contractors, DynCorp, which was hired by the United States as part of a U.N. peacekeeping operation.

But it is situations like the battle in Najaf that worry the United Nations.

"The idea of putting in [peacekeeping] forces that would have the ability to use all necessary means, up to and including the use of lethal force to address a problem, is one that we are not comfortable with," said an official with the U.N. Department of Peacekeeping Operations.

Peter W. Singer, a scholar at the Brookings Institution and author of the 2003 book "Corporate Warriors," views the notion of privatized U.N. peacekeeping with skepticism.

"It would be a great idea if Martians came and acted in Darfur, too," Mr. Singer said. "It's not on the table except in the minds of the companies, or to be kind of honest, journalists looking for an interesting story."

Like Mr. Pelton, Mr. Singer raises the issue of accountability.

"Current international law has been found inapplicable to the actions of the industry, as the firms fall outside of the outdated legal conventions that deal only with individual mercenaries," he wrote in Brookings' Policy Review.

Blackwater's Mr. Taylor disagrees.

"Our professionals are just as accountable to the Geneva and Hague conventions as anybody else," he said, before listing at least a dozen overlapping U.S. laws that would apply to Blackwater employees.

In his book, Mr. Pelton weighs in on the side of Mr. Singer: "As of the spring of 2006, there has not been a single contractor charged for any crime that occurred in Iraq, though hundreds of soldiers have been court-martialed for offenses ranging from minor violations of military code to murder."

Under discussion

Doug Brooks, president of the International Peace Operations Association, a trade group representing 27 private companies, offers another take on a role for a private peacekeeping army in Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0073102

The Sudanese government refuses to accept U.N. peacekeepers because it fears a repeat of what happened in Kosovo, which gained de facto independence from Serbia through a U.N. intervention, Mr. Brooks said.

"What about a private company working under Sudanese law?" he asked.

"You'd have to have some safeguards, but in essence, you would get effective security. It would be neutral, so it would protect against both the rebels and the [government-backed] Janjaweed militia. It would pay taxes to the Sudanese government.

"You'd have to have safeguards to make sure the guys aren't thrown into some kangaroo court for every alleged offense. But it's something that they might be willing to look at."

Mr. Brooks said his organization is attempting to broach the subject with the Sudanese government.

"We've had some informal contacts through go-betweens to see what they think about it and haven't heard back," he said. "But who knows?"

We Saved Europeans. Why Not Africans? (WP)

By Susan E. Rice, Anthony Lake And Donald M. Payne

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

With Darfur set to be hit by a second wave of genocide, world leaders are shifting into diplomatic high gear. The government of Sudan flatly rejects deployment of a 22,000-strong U.N. force, knowing it would be much more effective than the African Union's, even if augmented by additional personnel as is now planned.

Some 450,000 innocent human beings are already dead, and more than 2.5 million have fled their homes. Now Sudan is launching a major offensive in Darfur. After three years of fruitless negotiation and feckless rhetoric, it's time to go beyond unenforced U.N. resolutions to a new kind of resolution: the firm resolve to act.

Will world leaders continue to give the perpetrators of genocide a veto over international action to stop it? Unless something changes dramatically, the answer seems to be yes.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair proposed bribing the Sudanese with debt relief, aid and trade concessions to get them to admit U.N. peacekeepers. By contrast, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice threatened confrontation, and President Bush declared: "If the Sudanese government does not approve this peacekeeping force quickly, the United Nations must act." But neither said how. Instead, the president appointed Andrew Natsios, a former administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as his special envoy for Darfur. An envoy's role is to negotiate, but the Sudanese have left nothing to negotiate.

Lost in the diplomatic bustle is reality: First, the U.S.-brokered peace deal for Darfur, fatally flawed from its signature, is dead. Second, Sudan has broken every pledge to every envoy to halt the killing in Darfur. Third, China is unlikely to compel Sudan to admit the United Nations -- 7 percent of its oil is at stake, and China may figure we value its help on Iran and North Korea more than on Sudan. Fourth, it's too late for sanctions; even if China miraculously relented, it would take months before their bite was felt. By then, Sudan will have completed its second wave of genocide in Darfur.

History demonstrates that there is one language Khartoum understands: the credible threat or use of force. After Sept. 11, 2001, when President Bush issued a warning to states that harbor terrorists, Sudan -- recalling the 1998 U.S. airstrike on Khartoum -- suddenly began cooperating on counterterrorism. It's time to get tough with Sudan again.

After swift diplomatic consultations, the United States should press for a U.N. resolution that issues Sudan an ultimatum: accept unconditional deployment of the U.N. force within one week or face military consequences. The resolution would authorize enforcement by U.N. member states, collectively or individually. International military pressure would continue until Sudan relented.

The United States, preferably with NATO involvement and African political support, would strike Sudanese airfields, aircraft and other military assets. It could blockade Port Sudan, through which Sudan's oil exports flow. Then U.N. troops would deploy -- by force, if necessary, with U.S. and NATO backing.

If the United States fails to gain U.N. support, we should act without it. Impossible? No, the United States acted without U.N. blessing in 1999 in Kosovo to confront a lesser humanitarian crisis (perhaps 10,000 killed) and a more formidable adversary. Under NATO auspices, it bombed Serbian targets until Slobodan Milosevic acquiesced. Not a single American died in combat. Many nations protested that the United States violated international law, but the United Nations subsequently deployed a mission to administer Kosovo and effectively blessed NATO military action retroactively.

Unthinkable in the current context? True, the international climate is less forgiving than in 1999. Iraq and torture scandals have left many abroad doubting our motives and legitimacy. Some will reject any future U.S. military action, especially against an Islamic regime, even if it is purely to halt genocide against Muslim civilians. Sudan has also threatened that al-Qaeda will attack non-African forces in Darfur -- a real possibility since Sudan long hosted Osama bin Laden and his businesses. Yet, to allow another nation to deter the United States by threatening terrorism would set a terrible precedent. It would also be cowardly and, in the face of genocide, immoral.

Some will argue that the U.S. military cannot take on another mission. Our ground forces are stretched thin. But a bombing campaign or a naval blockade would tax the Air Force and Navy, which have relatively more capacity, and could utilize the 1,500 U.S. military personnel in nearby Djibouti.

Others will insist that, without the consent of the United Nations or a relevant regional body, we would be breaking international law. Perhaps, but the Security Council recently codified a new international norm prescribing "the responsibility to protect." It commits U.N. members to decisive action, including enforcement, when peaceful measures fail to halt genocide or crimes against humanity.

This genocide has lasted three long years. Peaceful measures have failed. The Sudanese government is poised to launch a second round. The real question is this: Will we use force to save Africans in Darfur as we did to save Europeans in Kosovo?

Susan E. Rice, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, was assistant secretary of state for African affairs from 1997 to 2001. Anthony Lake, a professor at Georgetown University, was national security adviser from 1993 to 1997. Donald M. Payne is a Democratic representative from New Jersey.

Report Cites Bid By Sunnis In Bahrain To Rig Elections (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

MANAMA, Bahrain, Sept. 29 — Just months before Bahrain is to hold parliamentary and municipal elections, a former government adviser has set off a political firestorm with a report describing what he says is a vast conspiracy to rig the elections, manipulate the country's sectarian balance and ensure Sunni domination over the country's majority Shiites.

The scandal, which is being called "Bandargate" after the author of the report, Salah al-Bandar, reaches to the core of this tiny island kingdom's simmering tensions.

The report includes hundreds of pages of supporting material, apparently authentic, including canceled checks, hotel bills, accounting sheets and notes. The material suggests that at the very least, unusual business dealings were occurring between government officials, Mr. Bandar says, and that it may have amounted to an effort to set off ethnic conflict.

"For the first time the evidence is complete, it's not just allegations," said Mr. Bandar, speaking by telephone from Britain, where he has lived since his deportation in early September. "The evidence is documents, it is signatures, and there is a blueprint for their plans and their strategy. One can see the way in which the discrimination is institutional now, and it is beyond any imagination."

In all, Mr. Bandar contends, the documents indicate that $6 million was spent to plant articles in Bahraini newspapers, organize counterdemonstrations when Shiites held protests, set off cellphone text-message campaigns against opposition figures and even support a program to convert Shiites into Sunnis. Government officials have dismissed Mr. Bandar as a disgruntled employee with ulterior motives, insisting that the report is a fabrication.

Bahrain, with a population of about 700,000, including 200,000 expatriates, is a weekend playground for Saudis. The tiny island just off the coast of Saudi Arabia is a regional business hub and in recent years has become a center for Islamic banking.

But long-simmering sectarian divisions erupted almost to the point of civil unrest during the 1990's. King Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa, who succeeded his father in 1999, headed off the conflict by promising political changes aimed at turning the country into a constitutional monarchy. But when the effort faltered several years ago, many advocates for the Shiite population stepped up their demands for greater rights and more of a say in a government that they say is skewed to the Sunni minority. Shiite groups boycotted the last elections, in 2002, but were expected to take part in the November elections.

At the same time, more militant Sunni groups, alarmed by a Shiite revival in the Middle East, have begun painting Bahrain as the edge of a "Shiite Crescent," increasingly susceptible to Iran's influence. The resulting tensions here have at times boiled over into violent clashes between gangs of young people and security forces.

Mr. Bandar, 52, a Sunni who was born in Sudan and married a Bahraini, was employed as an adviser to the Cabinet Affairs Ministry. He said he began receiving calls in January from other Sunnis inside the government increasingly concerned by what they said was an organized campaign to raise tensions within the government.

Mr. Bandar, who is also the secretary general of a group called the Gulf Center for Democratic Development, said he began investigating the accusations, enlisting the help of accountants and the government whistle-blowers to piece together a picture of a web led by high-ranking government officials.

In early September, he said, he presented a 240-page report to advisers to King Hamad and the prime minister, Sheik Khalifa bin Salman al-Khalifa, as well as to Western embassies and the news media. The report indicates that at the least, payments were made to the news media and other groups to write articles and spread messages. But it contends that the campaign went beyond corruption as a network of officials, religious leaders, government-backed civic groups and even some Jordanian intelligence agents worked to drown out Shiite voices and strengthen Sunnis.

The elections, Mr. Bandar said in the report, were part of a five-year plan to put political control of the country firmly in the hands of a small group of militantly anti-Shiite Sunnis. But he noted in the phone conversation that there was no evidence linking either the king or the prime minister to the scandal. "The strategy of the group is to heighten the tension," Mr. Bandar said.

Much of the scandal centers around Sheik Ahmed bin Ateyatalla al-Khalifa, chief of the Central Informatics Organization, Bahrain's version of the Central Intelligence Agency, who also heads the committee that is overseeing the November elections. Most of the checks appear to be drawn on Sheik Ahmed's personal accounts, and the report includes documents with a detailed accounting of the expenditures.

Shortly after Mr. Bandar issued the report, he said, his contract was terminated. He was taken to the airport, he said, and placed on a flight bound for Britain, where he holds citizenship, his visa canceled when he left. He now stands accused of espionage and of trying to foment a coup and could face charges if he tried to return. He said he was filing his own lawsuit against the government charging wrongful dismissal.

For the most part, the government has remained silent as the scandal has grown. The news media have responded to the accusations that they accepted payments by writing articles critical of Mr. Bandar.

Officials implicated in the report do not dispute the authenticity of the documents in Mr. Bandar's report, but insist that their actions were not illegal and that his conclusions were wrong. Sheik Ahmed, speaking to reporters in Bahrain, said the report was a fabrication intended to undermine the coming elections and "weaken national unity."

The canceled checks, he said, were part of normal business dealings outside his official duties. But opposition leaders say even that would be a violation of the Constitution, which bans ministers from having outside business dealings.

"The checks are true, they are there and signed but they depend on people filling the gaps and getting the wrong impression," said Raed Shams, assistant secretary for cabinet affairs at the Ministry of State, who is described in the report as a major player in the group. "You start creating the whole story in your mind. In the end they are mixing the deck and confusing the issues."

Bahrain's predominantly Shiite opposition groups say the report is a smoking gun and have demanded a full investigation. "All of this fits within our own political reading," said Ibrahim al-Sharif, chairman of the Democratic Action Society. "What he did for us was connect the dots and show the extent of the effort. It's fair to say everyone is shocked by the result."

Global Sludge Ends In Tragedy For Ivory Coast (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen And Marlise Simons

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

ABIDJAN, Ivory Coast, Sept. 28 — It was his infant son's cries, gasping and insistent, that first woke Salif Oudrawogol one night last month. The smell hit him moments later, wafting into the family's hut, a noxious mélange reminiscent of rotten eggs, garlic and petroleum.

Mr. Oudrawogol went outside to investigate. Beside the family's compound, near his manioc and corn fields, he saw a stinking slick of black sludge.

"The smell was so bad we were afraid," Mr. Oudrawogol said. "It burned our noses and eyes."

Over the next few days, the skin of his 6-month-old son, Salam, bloomed with blisters, which burst into weeping sores all over his body. The whole family suffered headaches, nosebleeds and stomach aches.

How that slick, a highly toxic cocktail of petrochemical waste and caustic soda, ended up in Mr. Oudrawogol's backyard in a suburb north of Abidjan is a dark tale of globalization. It came from a Greek-owned tanker flying a Panamanian flag and leased by the London branch of a Swiss trading corporation whose fiscal headquarters are in the Netherlands. Safe disposal in Europe would have cost about $300,000, or even twice that, counting the cost of delays. But because of decisions and actions made not only here but also in Europe, it was dumped on the doorstep of some of the world's poorest people.

So far eight people have died, dozens have been hospitalized and 85,000 have sought medical attention, paralyzing the fragile health care system in a country divided and impoverished by civil war, and the crisis has forced a government shakeup.

"In 30 years of doing this kind of work I have never seen anything like this," said Jean-Loup Quéru, an engineer with a French cleanup company brought in by the Ivorian government to remove the waste. "This kind of industrial waste, dumped in this urban setting, in the middle of the city, never."

The tale of the sludge can be traced to July 2, when a rust-streaked tanker, the Probo Koala, arrived in Amsterdam after a lengthy stay in the Mediterranean. Leased by Trafigura, a global oil and metals trading company, it was pausing on its way to Estonia to unload what the company said was 250 tons of "marslops" or "regular slops." That is the wash water from cleaning a ship's holds, which would normally be laced with oil, gasoline, caustic soda or other chemicals.

Amsterdam Port Services, a waste processing company, took the job, for about $15,000. But as workers unloaded the waste, they found problems, the company said. For one, the volume was much higher, more like 400 tons. For another, the seeping fumes of the waste sickened some of the Dutch workers.

"It was pitch black and had a heavy stench," said Luut Planting, a spokesman for Amsterdam Port Services. "No one had ever seen similar waste."

The company stopped unloading the sludge, ordered analyses and then informed the Amsterdam city authorities of the presence of hazardous waste, Mr. Planting said. The material and test results are currently under seal in the office of the Dutch public prosecutor, which has opened a criminal investigation.

A statement posted on Trafigura's Web site says that tests performed on material discharged by the Probo Koala in Abidjan by a laboratory in Rotterdam showed that the material was not toxic. "Contrary to speculation in the media and the activist communities about residue washings in a recent shipment to Côte d'Ivoire, tests conducted by the company and others show the washings themselves to have little or no toxicity," the statement says.

As to the deaths and illness, the statement says, "It is still unclear exactly what caused the tragedy."

But the Rotterdam laboratory, Saybolt, has told Dutch news media the samples were not sealed, not properly marked and not wholly reliable.

Lucas Reijnders, a chemist and professor of environmental science at the University of Amsterdam, said he had seen the results of an analysis done in Ivory Coast by a lab there, Ciapol, on samples taken from the Probo Koala before the dumping.

The analysis showed extremely high levels of caustic soda; mercaptans, a kind of sulfur compound; and hydrogen sulfide, he said. The last, he said, is a volatile compound that "smells of rotten eggs, but at high concentrations you can no longer smell it because it paralyzes your nervous system."

"It's very lethal and acts very rapidly," he added. The mix, he said, was suggestive of oil refining.

Exactly where the waste originated remains unclear. A spokesman for Trafigura, Jan Maat, said the Probo Koala had served in the Mediterranean "as a floating storage tank" and had taken on loads from several different ships, but he declined to give details.

Reports in the Dutch press said the Probo Koala had been secretly used as a floating refinery during the summer, when selling gasoline had become unusually profitable.

Mr. Maat denied that. "This is absolutely untrue," he said.

After analyzing the waste, Amsterdam Port Services told Trafigura's London office that the price to treat and dispose of it would now be much more expensive, close to $300,000. Trafigura, which in 2005 had revenue of $28 billion dollars, balked at the cost.

"It was so much higher than the first price," said Mr. Maat. It would also have meant staying an extra day, costing $45,000 in port fees and a penalty of some $300,000 for arriving late in Estonia, he said.

A brief standoff ensued, but the Probo Koala was able to leave Amsterdam two days later after taking back all of its waste with the permission of the Dutch authorities.

"We have never handed back or refused waste before," said Mr. Planting. "But the crux was that Trafigura refused to pay. If they had, the material would have been treated and there would have been no problem."

From Amsterdam, the Probo Koala sailed to Estonia and took on Russian oil products. After delivering them to Nigeria, it continued to Abidjan, where it arrived on Aug. 19.

Mr. Maat said Trafigura's London office had advised the Ivory Coast port authorities and the Transportation Ministry that it was delivering chemical waste requiring special treatment and close supervision, and hired a local company, Tommy. "We were informed that four companies there could handle it," said Mr. Maat. "One of them was Tommy. Clearly this has not been a fortunate choice."

He also said, "We do not acknowledge responsibility for the dumping of the waste without treating it."

French, Dutch and British toxic-waste experts and oil traders said it can be easily ascertained that Ivory Coast has no facilities capable of handling high-level toxic waste.

Tommy hired more than a dozen tanker trucks, into which it pumped the sludge. The trucks fanned out, at night, to at least 18 sites across the city, according to witnesses in several neighborhoods where the material was dumped, as well as the French cleanup crew.

Several tankerloads went to the Abidjan landfill, in a community called Akouedo. Residents there are accustomed to foul odors, but knew something was particularly bad about the new material. They chased and surrounded one of the tanker trucks, forcing the driver to flee on foot, witnesses said. In other places, some trucks were simply abandoned by drivers fearful of being attacked as word of the illegal dumping crept out and public anger rose.

Efforts to reach Tommy by telephone were unsuccessful, and at least one of its executives has been jailed in Ivory Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0073106

Last week Jean-Baptiste Giassey, a 13-year-old schoolboy, rooted through garbage piled at Akouedo, near a team of workers from Tredi, the French environmental cleanup company that is gathering up the polluted trash, which is expected to be sent to France for proper disposal.

Stinking mud oozed from the trash under his flimsy sandals, coating his feet and legs. He was looking for scraps of aluminum, which he would sell to traders for less than 25 cents a pound. He said he had been spending five or six hours a day at the dump, trying to earn enough money for new clothes.

"I don't know that it is dangerous," he said. "I come here every day."

At first the Ivorian government did not acknowledge that something was amiss, even though the rank smell was spreading through the streets of Abidjan. Officials say they suspect they will find more dump sites than the 18 identified so far.

The spreading illnesses sparked violent demonstrations from a population convinced that government corruption was to blame for the dumping, and ultimately the furor forced the prime minister and his government to resign in September, though much of the government was reinstated later. Six Ivorians, one Nigerian and two European officials from Trafigura have been jailed so far in Ivory Coast.

The risk of sickness from the waste has abated with evaporation, experts said. But there may be long-term effects of exposure. In Dgibi, a village on the northern outskirts of Abidjan where some of the waste landed, an impromptu clinic set up to examine people exposed to the waste has been seeing 200 patients a day.

Most complain of nausea, headaches, skin sores and nosebleeds, said Stanislaus Dessi, a doctor at the clinic who works for the Ministry of Health.

"People are scared and confused," Dr. Dessi said. "We try to calm them and give them medicine to treat whatever symptoms they have."

The Probo Koala, back in Estonia, has been detained by the government there at the request of Ivory Coast.

Greenpeace has filed criminal complaints in Amsterdam against Trafigura, Amsterdam Port Services and the Dutch environmental authorities. The Dutch government said it could not comment while criminal investigations were under way. There are no fewer than five investigations going on in Ivory Coast.

The city of Amsterdam and the Dutch Parliament have begun their own inquiries.

"The whole procedure was illegal, first allowing the waste in, then pumping it back on board and letting the ship leave without any licenses," said Eco Matser, a chemist and expert in toxic waste at Greenpeace.

Africa has long been a dumping ground for all sorts of things the developed world has no use for. "This is the underbelly of globalization," said Jim Puckett, an activist at the Basel Action Network, an environmental group that fights toxic waste dumping. "Environmental regulations in the north have made disposing of waste expensive, so corporations look south."

U.S. To Cut Guatemala's Debt For Not Cutting Trees (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 1 — The United States government has joined with two environmental groups in a debt-for-nature swap, which will forgive about 20 percent of Guatemala's $108 million in foreign debt to Washington in an effort to help threatened tropical forests there, American and conservation officials said late last week.

In a deal to be announced Monday in Guatemala City, the government of Guatemala has agreed, in exchange for the debt forgiveness, to invest $24.4 million over the next 15 years in conservation work in four nature regions.

This is the largest amount of debt that has been forgiven by the United States under the Tropical Forest Conservation Act, which was enacted in 1998. So far, 10 countries, from the Philippines to Peru, have had part of their debt forgiven in exchange for forest protection efforts.

"You can't just come in as the U.S. and say it's important to protect those forests," Claudia A. McMurray, assistant secretary of state for oceans, environment and science, said in an interview. "You have to give these countries alternatives."

In the latest deal, the United States government contributed about $15 million toward the cancellation of Guatemala's debt, said Clay Lowery, assistant secretary of the Treasury for international affairs. The groups Conservation International and the Nature Conservancy each contributed an additional $1 million. Those funds, and the interest they will generate, will be enough to erase more than $20 million in debt and interest, officials said.

"This is a huge deal for Guatemala," John Beavers, who helped to negotiate the deal for the Nature Conservancy, said in a telephone interview from Guatemala City. "We hope it helps to drive the conservation area in Guatemala."

The country has struggled in recent years to control illegal logging and drug trafficking in its natural areas. Soldiers are deployed in some areas to stem the destruction.

There is also a legal threat to Guatemala's parks. A business confederation has filed a suit contending that the law establishing the protected areas is unconstitutional, because it did not receive a two-thirds majority when the legislature approved it almost 20 years ago.

The bulk of the money generated by the debt forgiveness will go to private organizations working to preserve the country's nature areas. A $4.9 million conservation trust fund will also be set up to generate interest income for future grants.

The money will be spent in four of Guatemala's premier reserves, which include tropical and subtropical forests and coastal mangrove areas. The areas are home to many rare and endangered species.

"The areas protected in this agreement lie in the heart of Mayan civilization, and they are home to jaguars, scarlet macaws, harpy eagles and countless other species," Steven J. McCormick, president of the Nature Conservancy, said in a statement.

The protected areas are the Cuchumatanes region, the Maya Biosphere Reserve, the Motagua/Polochic System and the Western Highlands volcanic chain.

To qualify for the program, Guatemala had to meet a series of political and economic criteria. Eligible countries must have democratically elected governments and a suitable economic reform program in place, and they must cooperate with the United States on drug enforcement and counterterrorism efforts.

An agreement under the program with Belize set aside 23,000 acres of new forest preserves and has helped to manage an additional 270,000 acres. One of two deals in Panama helped preserve the Chagres River Basin, which is a major source of water for the Panama Canal.

European Agenda (WSJ)

By Nicolas Sarkozy

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

Next year's 50th anniversary of the EU's founding Rome treaty should be celebrated with pride, for it marks an historic achievement: Half a century of reuniting a divided Continent. But there is also cause for concern. The forces driving the Union's political momentum have run out of steam and Europe's citizens are either doubtful or indifferent to its aims and lack any real collective hope for the future.

Whether we like it or not, the referendum results on the EU constitution in France and the Netherlands were unequivocal and binding. Yet the need for EU constitutional reform remains strong. A new reference text will have to define Europe's geopolitical boundaries, establish the Union's long-term political aims, correlate EU policies with EU projects and set out the means to move forward. An ambitious agenda of this sort calls for a large-scale democratic debate. But all this takes time, and time is something we do not have. I would suggest that the most urgent priorities for institutional reform could be covered in a mini-treaty that would modify the treaties of Nice and Amsterdam. We should aim to draft this mini-treaty under the German EU presidency next year and to ratify during the French presidency in 2008 in time for the European Parliament elections in 2009. * * *

First, the mini-treaty should extend the scope of qualified majority voting in the Council and co-decision with the European Parliament and empower the European Parliament to elect the European Commission president. It should respect the principle of subsidiarity and to this end strengthen the role of national parliaments by adopting the EU constitution's proposed "early warning" system, enabling national legislators to challenge Commission proposals. There can also no longer be any dispute about the value of a stable European Council presidency. The mini-treaty should also create an EU foreign minister and increase participatory democracy, especially to empower groups of a million citizens or more to request that the Commission make proposals in a specified area. Finally, if the mini-treaty were to confer a legal personality on the Union this would allow it to participate in some international organizations as a single political entity.

But root-and-branch reforms nevertheless remain essential in the longer-term.

Choosing EU commissioners solely on the basis of their nationality prevents effective team-building. At the same time, though, the Commission is often a scapegoat for public opinion. So what would happen when it takes a major decision affecting, say, a large company from a country without its own commissioner to represent its national interest? To break this stalemate, we need to consider whether the Commission president should not select fellow members.

I am also convinced that Europe must change its rules on unanimous decision-making. How can we believe, or make others believe, that we can fight terror by bringing together a learned assembly of 50 justice ministers, giving each one the floor for two minutes and then demanding unanimity from them? I have already suggested the idea of a "super-qualified" majority voting system of 70% or 80% support for particularly sensitive policy areas. We also need a new motor to drive important decisions forward, with those countries most concerned by a specific topic getting together to set out an action plan. Such ad hoc groups could explore new possibilities for collective action, while leaving the door open for other states to join later.

Now is the time, too, to face up honestly to the issue of Europe's borders, and accept that the French and Dutch referendum results were partly provoked by a Europe "sans frontiers." Establishing a new geographic and political framework for EU enlargement is a prerequisite of renewed popular support for the European project. And this framework must recognize that the Union's capacity to absorb new members is finite. I want this capacity to be quantified. The decision to accept each new applicant should be taken in light of the EU's internal objectives, its institutional limitations and the level of popular support. Such decisions should not be based upon foreign policy goals or a desire to encourage neighbors to reform.

So who is European and who is not? Clearly, some non-member countries are part of the European continent and have the right to full EU membership. This group includes Switzerland, Norway and -- eventually -- the Balkans. Then there are other countries whose right to join the Union is debatable or who, although neighbors, are clearly non-European.

For this latter group in the Euro-Asian and Mediterranean areas we should avoid presenting them with overly stark choices: Full membership or nothing at all. Our first step should be to establish preferential partnerships so we can work together while still observing our different interests and values.

Countries that want to participate in prosperous European markets should adopt all the internal market regulations needed to protect our product quality and controls. But preferential partnerships can also go beyond trade, allowing non-member countries to participate in certain European policies so that the Union can encourage their economic and social development. We could also perhaps even secure new defense arrangements that would help to build our collective security. * * *

Of all the countries with which the EU should have preferential relations there is Turkey, our neighbor and friend, sharing many of our security concerns and many of our values. These are good reasons for strengthening our ties with Turkey, without going so far as offering full membership.

However, no candidate for EU membership has the right to ignore that the Union has 25 members, including Cyprus. Despite the customs union between Turkey and the EU, Turkey continues to deny access to its ports and airports to boats and airplanes that have stopped in Cyprus. This is not acceptable. I say again and again that the EU must suspend any new accession negotiations with Turkey until Ankara has ratified and implemented, in good faith, its agreed trade protocols.

Turning to questions of EU finance, we must undertake an ambitious reform of the European budget. Under the current system, national budgets support European expenses. This is illogical, unfair and intolerable for the net contributor countries and incomprehensible for citizens. European expenses must be financed by European resources, just as local taxes finance local expenses. Financial reform will be an important issue for the coming French EU presidency.

Finally, I want to consider how to modernize political life in Europe. In each member state, the issues at stake in European election are still primarily national. My answer would be to allow European political groups to combine national lists of candidates and present a united program during European parliamentary elections. This would create genuine Europe-wide campaigns on European political agendas. If affiliated groups also declared their preferred choice for Commission president, this would give European citizens a direct say over the direction of Europe.

The world has changed tremendously since the Treaty of Rome and perhaps we have now reached the end of the road for that model of European integration. The new Europe must recognize new realities and adapt to them, not try to impose artificial systems upon its decision-making. Here is a revolution for the Union, a rupture with the past. What we need now is for all of the EU's member states to rediscover a desire to take Europe forward instead of being preoccupied with their national interests. Failing that, those nations which want to seize the initiative should be able to do so without being constrained by the reluctance of the others.

Mr. Sarkozy is France's interior minister. This essay is an edited version of one to appear in the fall issue of Europe's World.

SUNDAY SHOW TRANSCRIPTS
10/1/06

NBC – MEET THE PRESS

MR. TIM RUSSERT: Our issues this Sunday: Only 37 days until the midterm elections. The Democrats must gain six seats to take control of the U.S. Senate. This morning, our Senate Debate series continues with another one of the most closely watched races of the year, Ohio, where incumbent Republican Senator Mike DeWine faces off against Democratic challenger Congressman Sherrod Brown. A new poll out this morning shows the race nearly a dead heat. Republican Mike DeWine vs. Democrat Sherrod Brown, only on MEET THE PRESS.

What a week in Washington. Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," about the Bush administration in Iraq; Republican Congressman Mark Foley of Florida resigns after sending salacious e-mails to a Capitol Hill page; Democrats and Republicans demanding an investigation as to who knew what when. All that and our U.S. Senate Debate from Ohio.

But first, on Wednesday evening, President Bush hosted a dinner with the two leaders crucial in helping to capture Osama bin Laden: the presidents of Afghanistan and Pakistan. The two men have been increasingly critical of each other. Earlier that day I sat down with Pakistan's president, Pervez Musharraf, and asked him about his differences with the president of Afghanistan.

President Musharraf, welcome back to MEET THE PRESS.

PRES. PERVEZ MUSHARRAF: Thank you very much.

MR. RUSSERT: Last Sunday on this very program: President Karzai of Afghanistan. And I asked him the following question:

(Videotape, September 24, 2006):

MR. RUSSERT: Where is Osama bin Laden?

PRES. HAMID KARZAI: He is not in Afghanistan. I can tell you that for sure.

MR. RUSSERT: Is he in Pakistan?

PRES. KARZAI: Probably he is there.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Is he?

PRES. MUSHARRAF: I wouldn't be saying—I wouldn't follow his example of not knowing anything and yet talking. I don't know where he is. And who is informing him I would like to know. I would like to ask him how to substantiate whatever he says. I don't know it. How can I say that he's on this side or that side? He could possibly—I can only guess—he could possibly in the—be in the border area.

MR. RUSSERT: In your book on page 221 you say, "I have said, half-jokingly, that I hope he is not caught in Pakistan." In all seriousness, are you fearful that if you captured Osama bin Laden, your government could topple?

PRES. MUSHARRAF: No, no. Never. That will never happen, and I am not fearful. But yes, indeed, it could cause some certain—it probably will cause waves within the extremists. Extremists will get more active. But these are my apprehensions. I'm not fearful. And not at all the government—my government doesn't get toppled. People support me. People know what I'm doing, and it's not that fragile.

MR. RUSSERT: There was a big rumor last week of a coup. Why did so many people in Pakistan listen to that rumor for so long?

PRES. MUSHARRAF: Well, they don't listen. It's a—a rumor always has publicity value when it starts spreading. But the very fact that I'm sitting here for since the last 18 days and not bothered at all should tell you how confident I am about the situation in Pakistan.

03:36

MR. RUSSERT: There's been a lot of discussion about an agreement, a treaty that you signed with some of the tribal leaders in north Waziristan. Some have said you've now given sanctuary to dissidents, to militants, the Taliban in that area. Why did you, in fact, withdraw the military from there after suffering substantial losses of some of your young men? Are you now going to give sanctuary to the terrorists?

PRES. MUSHARRAF: No. There are two misperceptions. When you say we—"Why have we withdrawn the military?" Well, the unfortunate part is, this is being spread by people with vested interests. Not one soldier has been moved out. They're—not one battalion, one soldier has been relocated. And what is anyone talking of? The military is there. And we think what we are doing will lead to success.

We are only involved in military operations. A military operation is—are not a—not an—a solution in themselves. They will only buy you time and create an environment, which our army did on our side. And having that environment, now these tribals themselves have pushed the governor, that "We want to reach a peace agreement." And we put a bottom line for them laid down by me to the governor, which is not negotiable: No al-Qaeda activity, no Taliban activity, on our side or across the border. And they signed this, and they agreed to this.

Now what is the problem? This is a strategy which has a ray of hope, a ray of success. And we should emulate this on the front side instead of criticizing it and not coming up with a counterstrategy.

MR. RUSSERT: The concern is in many circles that the Pakistani intelligence agency, the ISI and the Taliban are in cahoots. "Seth Jones, a political scientist at the RAND Corporation, said ... 'The evidence suggests the [Pakistani intelligence] is involved [in assisting Taliban insurgents] in several ways.' ... Pakistani intelligence agents have provided intelligence to the Taliban about coalition plans and tactical operations, he said, tipping off Taliban forces and allowing them to flee. Western military forces have intercepted the tips and know they are from people connected to Pakistani intelligence, Mr. Jones said. ... 'The U.S. government also believes they have given monetary assistance and maybe weapons.'"

Financing, tipping off, weapons? The ISI helping and assisting the Taliban, the very people who housed Osama bin Laden?

PRES. MUSHARRAF: I would—I think—I totally disagree with this. They don't know the realities on ground, they are not conscious of the reality that I'm seeing, the extreme danger of this becoming a people's movement.

MR. RUSSERT: So nobody in the ISI is helping the Taliban?

PRES. MUSHARRAF: Now, nobody in the ISI helps. Now, there—I have some reports that some dissidents, some people, retired people who were in the forefront, in ISI, during a period of '79 to '89 may be assisting with the leaks somewhere here and there. We are keeping a very tight watch, and we'll get all of them if at all that happens.

MR. RUSSERT: Finally, Iraq. You write in your book that you never favored the invasion of Iraq, because you feared "it would exacerbate extremism, as it has most certainly done. The world is not a safer place because of the war in Iraq; the world has become far more dangerous." Have you said that to President Bush?

PRES. MUSHARRAF: Well, we discussed—we haven't discussed it in such detail, and I look more—instead of talking of what it has become, we are talking of what is the present, and what is the solution to the problem. That is more important to me, and I don't get—whatever's happened has happened in Iraq.

MR. RUSSERT: Should the U.S. get out of Iraq?

PRES. MUSHARRAF: No, they can't. They should not. Because again, it's going to destabilize this region, and I agree with President Bush and whatever he's doing. We cannot leave. Whatever has happened now has happened. Now we have to make sure that we stabilize and then come out. Otherwise, it has—its reverberation will be felt in the Gulf.

MR. RUSSERT: We thank you very much for joining us.

PRES. MUSHARRAF: Thank you very much.

MR. RUSSERT: Coming next, Iraq, the Bob Woodward book, the resignation of Republican Congressman Mark Foley. And today, all eyes on Ohio. Our MEET THE PRESS Senate Debate series continues with Senate candidates Republican Mike DeWine and Democrat Sherrod Brown. They are next, right here on MEET THE PRESS. A debate is coming up.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: It's often said "As goes Ohio, goes the nation." The Ohio U.S. Senate debate. Republican Mike DeWine. Democrat Sherrod Brown. After this station break.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: Welcome, Republican incumbent Senator Mike DeWine, Democratic challenger Sherrod Brown, welcome both.

SEN. MIKE DeWINE (R-OH): Yep.

REP. SHERROD BROWN (D-OH): Thank you, Tim.

SEN. DeWINE: Thank you.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me start with...

REP. BROWN: Nice to see you, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: Thank you. Let show you and start with Iraq. On Thursday, this was the president of the United States. Let's listen.

(Videotape, Thursday):

PRES. GEORGE W. BUSH: Five years after 9/11, the worst attack on American homeland in our history, the Democrats offer nothing but criticism and obstruction and endless second-guessing. The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut-and-run.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Senator DeWine, "party of cut-and-run"? Is that appropriate and fair?

SEN. DeWINE: Tim, I don't use that term at all. But there's fundamental differences between how I think we need to proceed in Iraq and how...

MR. RUSSERT: Why don't you use that term?

SEN. DeWINE: It's just not a term that I use, "cut and run."

MR. RUSSERT: Is it inappropriate?

SEN. DeWINE: I know what it means. I know what it means to people, but I, here's—let me tell you what I believe and what I feel in my heart and what I think the evidence clearly shows. We cannot leave Iraq with the job undone, and we cannot set an artificial timetable. It would bring disaster, just to set a date that we will be out. It will embolden the insurgents, it will tell them when we will be gone. They just sit back and wait. That would be a mistake.

If you don't believe me, look at what the three military leaders who came in and testified in front of the Democrat Senate committee the other day said. General Batiste for example, General Eaton. They said they were very critical of the president, very critical of Rumsfeld, very critical of the conduct of the war. But when Hillary Clinton asked the question, the key question, really, Senator Clinton asked, "Shall we set a date, a date specific, to be out of Iraq?" they all said "No." And the reasons they gave were, one, it would bring about chaos in Iraq; two, it would, it would, it would spread; three, the person—the country that would benefit the most would be Iran. And then it was also said, and I think absolutely correctly, that we would have in Iraq a situation like we had in the 1990s in Afghanistan, only it would be worse. It would become the focal point for the terrorists, a place where they could go, get sanctuary. It would be even worse, Tim, than Afghanistan because one of—the colonel who testified said, "Beirut's on a major, major airline route. They won't have any trouble getting there, it's very easy." So that's what is, really, Tim, is at stake. These are not easy choices.

MR. RUSSERT: It's at stake, Senator.

SEN. DeWINE: They're tough questions.

MR. RUSSERT: But it begs the question, what do you do? Is status quo acceptable?

SEN. DeWINE: No. What, what we do is—I think General McCaffrey has pointed out one of the things that we have to do a much better job of is to make sure that the Iraqi military has the real equipment they need. It is very expensive for us to be there. We are losing precious lives of Americans, many from Ohio. We need to give them the equipment, pay the price, give them the equipment. We also need to continue to train them. And once they are to a point where they can take this over, we're out of there. We want to be gone. No one wants to be out of there any more, any more than...

MR. RUSSERT: Months or years?

SEN. DeWINE: Tim, there again, you cannot set the, the date. You can't say, "We're going to be out by a certain date," because it emboldens. What—all I'm saying is we need, and I'm following what everybody who has looked at this seriously says, whether they were for us getting in or not, we cannot leave by setting an artificial date. What we have to do is let the facts on the ground control.

MR. RUSSERT: Congressman Brown, headlines everywhere here. Here's David Ignatius in The Washington Post. "The Big Question Democrats Are Ducking." The hard question, "What do we do in Iraq?" We know you're opposed to the war, but what specifically do you do now?

REP. BROWN: First it's a question of accountability and a question of competence. Every—we all know, everyone knows now, the book that just mentioned by Bob Woodward, "State of Denial," the book, "Fiasco," the new National Intelligence estimates all say that, that the administration, that particularly Cheney and Rumsfeld, either muzzled or ignored—muzzled the military, muzzled the intelligence or, or ignored their advice. People who sit on the Intelligence Committees, like Mike DeWine, simply haven't done their jobs. They've not demanded accountability. They, they, they didn't listen to the questions of—on weapons of mass destruction. They didn't demand that the president come up with a plan to win, a plan to provide body armor for our troops, and way more people died than needed to because of that. They didn't demand any—how—a plan to reconstruct Iraq and rebuild Iraq, and then they didn't demand an exit—any kind of exit strategy.

MR. RUSSERT: Assuming all that's true, what do we do now?

REP. BROWN: What we do is we, we pressure, we force, we push the Iraqis to build the security forces, the military and the police security forces that they need to build. Mike DeWine and the administration is just saying "status quo, just stay the course." They're not advocating any real change. They've been saying for three years that things were doing well. They've clearly, even with the differences in the administration as that book points out that you mention, they, they, they clearly haven't really made any real changes in what we're doing in Iraq. I think once we, we push them in a serious way, we push them and pressure them to compromise—the Iraqis, the Sunnis and the Shiites—and we say to the military, we instruct the military that we want to exit Iraq within a year and a half to two years, and we tell them that we order the military, we instruct the military to, to come up with a plan within that year and a half to two years specifically at what, at what speed, and that the troops exit Iraq in the most orderly and safe way for Americans.

MR. RUSSERT: You—if you had your way, you had suggested the troops be out this year, by the fall of '06. What would've happened to Iraq if the troops left right now?

REP. BROWN: No, I, I suggested—I didn't suggest that.

MR. RUSSERT: A year ago.

REP. BROWN: I suggested a year ago that the president come up with a plan to begin the exit—the, the withdrawal of troops and then it, then it would be within a year or so. Now, obviously, you can't bring them out right now. I've never said, "Bring them out today." I say we need to order the military, instruct the military over the next year and a half or two years to come up with the exit strategy to do it in the safest, most orderly way. Otherwise, otherwise, Tim, the, this, the policy is just "stay the course." And that's clearly not working. Two—in, in—you know, we—again, we've not—we've an Intelligence Committee that hasn't asked the tough questions. It's not demanded any real accountability. And we've had this war prosecuted so incompetently and ineptly as a result.

MR. RUSSERT: Back in October in '03, about six months into the war, you voted against $87 billion to fund the war. Would you consider, if the president does not change the course and you're elected to the U.S. Senate, measures to cut off funding for the war?

REP. BROWN: No, I would not vote against the troops in the field.

MR. RUSSERT: Why did you do that in '03?

REP. BROWN: I voted against the $87 billion because there was a better way to do it. Much of that $87 billion went to Halliburton and went to Bechtel and went to Parsons, and it was not—there was no accountability. It was a blank check. I wanted $87 billion, the money, to go to the troops for body armor. I spoke out on body armor in committee over, over and over, questioned people like administrator Paul Bremer. And today Mike DeWine is running ads on television saying that I voted against the $87 billion. He should be ashamed of himself for that because he knows I was speaking out...

SEN. DeWINE: Sherrod...

REP. BROWN: ...on the 87 billion...

SEN. DeWINE: Sherrod...

REP. BROWN: ...way earlier than he was.

SEN. DeWINE: Oh!

REP. BROWN: And that I was pushing our—he sent people to war without the proper body armor. I said to Colin Powell, I said to administrator Bremer, I wrote letters to President Bush in early 2003 before we were at war, saying it's time you made sure you answered these questions about body armor, about how many troops, about exit strategy, about how much it's going to cost. And if he had done that in the, in the Intelligence Committee, if he had asked those same questions, we would have a safer America today.

SEN. DeWINE: Sherrod...

MR. RUSSERT: A chance to respond.

SEN. DeWINE: ...you are absolutely unbelievable. I cannot believe you...

REP. BROWN: This is the same guy...

SEN. DeWINE: Can I finish?

REP. BROWN: ...that ran...

SEN. DeWINE: Can I finish? Can I finish? You had your turn.

REP. BROWN: OK, fair enough.

SEN. DeWINE: You are absolutely unbelievable. How can you say this when you, Sherrod, voted five different times against funding for body armor when it really counted, when it was real money? You voted five times against body armor. And this is a long pattern, Tim, that this congressman has, with all due respect. Fifteen different times he has voted against funding for the military when it really counted in the, in the final vote. But it's a long history, a long pattern. With all due respect...

REP. BROWN: Mike, you know better than to say things like that.

SEN. DeWINE: ...let me finish—let me just finish.

REP. BROWN: But you do know better than to say things like that.

SEN. DeWINE: Now let me finish. Now you let me finish now. Now you let me finish and then we'll, we'll go. It's a long history, Sherrod, that you have. You do not understand that this is a global war on terror. If you, if you—Tim, if he'd understand...

MR. RUSSERT: Well, this—stop—but senator, this is important, because the National Intelligence Estimate came out talking about a cause celebre. And this is what it said. "The Iraq conflict has become the cause celebre for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement." Has in fact the Iraq war made us less safe, created more terrorists than we've killed?

SEN. DeWINE: Tim, I think the National Intelligence Estimate said it very well. I think it is correct. It said a number of things. One, it said, as you pointed out, there was—it's become a cause celebre, I think that's the right word. The jihadists, the people who want to kill us, always have a cause. Osama bin Laden's cause before he, he went in and did September 11th was that we had troops in the, in the, in the Arabian Peninsula, Saudi Arabia. They have other reasons. They say Israel. They say that we have troops other places. So it is all—it is always something. But the, but the key finding, seems to me in that NIE, is they said, "If the jihadists are successful in Iraq, they will be emboldened and there will be more of them. If they're unsuccessful, there will be fewer of them." That to me is future-looking, Tim, and I think that is very instructive and it goes along with what the three military leaders who testified in front of the Democrats had the same plot, same plot in mind.

MR. RUSSERT: I want to, I want to look to the, I want to look to the future, but I just want to button this up because I think it's an important question for the voters of Ohio and the debate across the country. If the CIA came to you back in October of 2003 and said—October of 2002 and said, "Saddam Hussein does not have weapons of mass destruction," would you have still voted to go into Iraq?

SEN. DeWINE: No. I think...

MR. RUSSERT: So, so you regret your vote?

SEN. DeWINE: No. I think that, Tim, that the evidence—I've said this many times—the evidence that we would have never even had a vote. It would never have been presented by the president, we never would have had a vote. But saying that does not mean that our troops have not done a magnificent job, nor does it mean that the world is not better off for having Saddam Hussein—this man who had developed chemical weapons and biological weapons in the past—the world is better off, Tim, for him being gone.

One of the things that the Iraqi survey group that went in afterwards said, when they said they didn't have the weapons of mass destruction, but they said two other things that are very, very interesting. They said, one, he continued to have the capability, the scientists, and—to, to develop them in the future. And second, he had the will and inclination to do it.

MR. RUSSERT: So you stand by...

SEN. DeWINE: Two very...

MR. RUSSERT: ...you stand by your vote?

SEN. DeWINE: On what we knew at the time. But I will say again, Tim, that if we knew that at the time, my—the tipping point for me, as I think it would have been for most Americans, was, based on Saddam's history, what we knew about this man, this man who had, who had—that gassed the Kurds, 20,000 of them; this man who, who had, who had hidden from the U.N. for years and years and years what he had; defied 16 U.N. resolutions. Our intelligence—and it wasn't just the intelligence that Mike DeWine had, it was intelligence that Tony Blair had, Great Britain's Tony, the same intelligence that Bill Clinton had. We all had the same intelligence. The intelligence committee said, "This man has weapons of mass destruction." Knowing that, there was no choice at that point but to make that decision. But the intelligence was bad.

MR. RUSSERT: You, you believed that Saddam had weapons of mass destruction?

REP. BROWN: I voted against the war because the president hadn't proved, the president hadn't proved it.

SEN. DeWINE: What's the answer to that? What's the answer?MR. RUSSERT: But you did believe Saddam had weapons of mass destruction?

REP. BROWN: I wasn't sure. And I think the president did not prove, nor did Colin Powell, prove to the American public or to the Congress. Apparently he proved it to, to Mike DeWine and the Intelligence Committee, who believed it.

SEN. DeWINE: Well, he proved it to Bill Clinton, he proved it to Bill Clinton. And you know that, Sherrod.

REP. BROWN: But he, he—it's pretty clear—you always, you always say he proved it to Bill Clinton, to Bill Clinton. I've heard it before. But the funda—look at the real fundamental...

SEN. DeWINE: Well, look at the 198--90--but Tim, look at the 1998 speech that Bill Clinton gave where he laid out the case against Saddam. I'm not saying Bill Clinton would've gone into war or not. That's not the question. The question is...

REP. BROWN: Well, the...

SEN. DeWINE: ...what was the intelligence estimate that made Bill Clinton believe it? And he clearly did.

MR. RUSSERT: The policy, the policy of the Clinton administration was regime change in Iraq. You agreed with that?

REP. BROWN: And the policy of regime...

SEN. DeWINE: And you voted for regime change.

REP. BROWN: And the policy of regime change, but we were, we were changing the regime by what we were doing with the inspections, and the president should have let the inspections work. We, we would've overthrown Saddam Hussein, ultimately...

SEN. DeWINE: How?

REP. BROWN: ...by, by sanctions, by what we were doing. But, but the, the real fundamental thing is...

MR. RUSSERT: Without military action?

REP. BROWN: Well, I don't know. We might have. But we didn't need to go into Iraq at that time, and that's been proven.

The, the, the fundamental difference on, on this whole war on terror that Mike DeWine sits on the Intelligence Committee for 12 years. It's clear that, that he has failed on that committee. But the fundamental difference on the war on terror is, is look at how the United States has lost its focus. Look what's happened in Afghanistan. The Taliban is stronger than it's been at any time in five years. We know that more poppies are grown to--95 percent of the poppies in the, in the world are grown in Afghanistan. We're not supporting a moderate democratic government as well as we should in Afghanistan.

And then it's not just in Afghanistan that, that, that we've lost our focus that's caused, caused al-Qaeda to be stronger. Go look at what we've done in the United States. We've failed to protect our nuclear facilities, our water systems, our chemical plants. We tell our grandmothers to take their shoes off at the airport, yet we inspect fewer than 10 percent of cargo containers that come into our ports, that come across I-70 in the heart of Ohio, that come across the turnpike in I-90.

And we've—the, the intelligence operation in this country coupled with the loss of focus because of the war in Iraq has made the United States less safe.

And that's—so the question always, whom do you trust? Whom—Mike DeWine's been on the Intelligence Committee for 12 years. Whom do you trust to wage the war on terror? Somebody that's going to keep his focus on al-Qaeda, on protecting the United States of America, or somebody that's just saying, "Status quo in Iraq, status quo, status quo."

SEN. DeWINE: All right, let me answer that.

MR. RUSSERT: All right, let me, let me...

SEN. DeWINE: Let me answer the "who do you trust question," if I could.

Could I just answer that question?

MR. RUSSERT: All right, Senator, then I want to move to the future.

SEN. DeWINE: I'll be brief. I'll try to be brief.

MR. RUSSERT: Please.

SEN. DeWINE: Do you trust a man who, during the 1990s, when we were hit in the World Trade Center, Khobar Towers, USS Cole, all during the 1990s—it was clear what the terrorists were trying to do—this man voted 10 separate times to cut, to cut our intelligence spending. The majority of those times to put in...

REP. BROWN: Mike, Mike, you know better than that.

SEN. DeWINE: No, the truth.

REP. BROWN: You know, you know better than that, Mike.

SEN. DeWINE: You...

REP. BROWN: You've been to the Senate for 12 years,

SEN. DeWINE: You—can I finish? Can I finish?

REP. BROWN: ...you've been an Ohio state senator, you know better than making charges like that...

SEN. DeWINE: Can I finish? Tim, let me just, let me just...

REP. BROWN: ...that are just unsubstantiated.

SEN. DeWINE: You're unbelievable again. Ten different times, the roll call was there. You...

REP. BROWN: I joined, I joined Porter Gauss and Jim Sensenbrenner, the author of the Patriot Act...

SEN. DeWINE: Tim, Tim, let me ask him a question. Let me ask him a question. Tim...

REP. BROWN: ...because we knew that the...

SEN. DeWINE: Ten different times you voted.

REP. BROWN: ...that the intelligence operations in our government where he sat on the committee...

MR. RUSSERT: All right. All right, all right.

REP. BROWN: ...our intelligence operations were aimed...

MR. RUSSERT: All right.

SEN. DeWINE: Look, Tim, one point, just one point.

REP. BROWN: ...towards the Cold War and not towards the war on terror.

MR. RUSSERT: All right, hold on. Hold on. All right, Mike...

REP. BROWN: We wanted to see a shift in our intelligence focus...

SEN. DeWINE: Give me 60 seconds.

REP. BROWN: ...and Mike sat on that committee and failed to do it.

MR. RUSSERT: OK. All right. All right.

REP. BROWN: So we had to try to do it on the House floor. I ultimately voted...

MR. RUSSERT: Time out. Time out, time out, time out, time out, time out.

REP. BROWN: I ultimately voted every time for those intelligence budgets, and he knows that.

MR. RUSSERT: All right. Ask him one question and then I want to move on.

SEN. DeWINE: The majority of times of those 10 times where Sherrod Brown voted to cut our intelligence spending, he was the minority even of his own party. In addition to that, Tim, we passed the Patriot Act. We all came together, passed it, 98-to-1 in the Senate. That means Ted Kennedy voted for it, John Kerry voted for it. Sherrod Brown in the House, was one of 66 members of the House to vote against the Patriot Act, and he continues to vote against the Patriot Act, to deny our law enforcement the tools they need to go against terror.

MR. RUSSERT: All right. I'm going to give him 30 seconds to respond to that, then I want to move to the future.

REP. BROWN: Well, the, the—again, the—on the intelligence, the intelligence...

MR. RUSSERT: But you voted against the Patriot Act?

REP. BROWN: I did vote against the Patriot Act. The Patriot Act had a lot of good things in it, but it, it, it went too far. And it's, it's not—the Patriot Act is law now, but we've not done what we should do in Afghanistan. We've not done what we should do to protect the United States of America. And clearly his focus has been "stay the course" in Iraq, the status quo in Iraq, and that has caused all other parts of the war on terror—it's undermined all other parts of the war on terror, coupled with the fact the intelligence experts are saying the war in Iraq is making us less safe, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: Here's two...

REP. BROWN: As you know.

MR. RUSSERT: Here's two poll questions that I think caught the attention of a lot of Americans. Let me start with Senator DeWine.

"Most Iraqis Favor Immediate U.S. Pullout." "Most Iraqis." "A strong majority of Iraqis want U.S.-led military forces to immediately withdraw from the country, saying their swift departure would make Iraq more secure and decrease sectarian violence, according to new polls by the State Department and independent researchers."

And then this poll. "Iraqis back attacks on U.S. troops. About six in 10 Iraqis say they approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces ... [according to] the poll done for University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes."

Senator DeWine, if they want us out, and they're in favor of attacking us, why are we still there?

SEN. DeWINE: Tim, I was shocked by that as well. But you know, on reflection, this is their country. There's a lot of things going wrong. You blame someone who is there. Still does not change that we're not in Iraq primarily for the Iraqis. We're in Iraq for us. We're—have to do what we have to do, and it goes back to what the three generals—three military leaders said. It would be a total disaster for us to leave. It is in our self-interest, the interest to protect American families, that we are in Iraq. That's why we're there.

REP. BROWN: I, I guess I'm surprised that Mike DeWine is shocked by that. He sits on the Intelligence Committee, sat there 12 years. He's shocked that the Iraqi people think it's time to—that, that, that troops be pulled out of Iraq? We're in the midst—we're—what we're doing in Iraq now, all intents and purposes is we're refereeing a civil war. That's why we need to push the Iraqi military forces and police forces to build their own security units to protect their country, to make themselves more secure. And that's the, that's the solution, not "stay the course," not just status quo.

MR. RUSSERT: Let's assume that in a year, year and a half, the Iraqis become more secure in terms of the military operations, police operations, we redeploy, and then civil war breaks out. What do we do?

REP. BROWN: Well, civil war is broken out there now. I mean, it's, it's—with the Shiites, the Sunni—you know what's happened in, in Anbar; you know what's happened in, in central Iraq...(unintelligible)...

MR. RUSSERT: So if it's a failed state, what do we do?

REP. BROWN: Well, if it's a failed state, we—maintaining the status quo is getting us nowhere except more American lives, $2 billion a week, and a loss of focus on Afghanistan, which is in much worse shape than it was two, three, four years ago, and a failure to protect our ports, and a failure to protect our nuclear facilities.

MR. RUSSERT: But could Iraq become the next Afghanistan?

REP. BROWN: We don't know. But it's clear that the status quo's not working, and we need to begin to say to the Iraqis, "You've got to do it on your own." If they think we're going to stay as long as Mike DeWine does, and George—Condoleezza Rice said we might be there 10 more years, President Bush says it's going to be up to the next president. Our embassy in Iraq sits on, on 100 acres while the average U.S. embassy around the world sits on 10 acres. So they don't think we're leaving. As long as they don't think we're leaving, any time as far as the eye can see, there simply is not the incentive for them to, to compromise—the Sunnis, the Shiites and the Kurds—and there's not the incentive for them to build their security forces in spite of the pleas of President Bush to build your security forces.

MR. RUSSERT: Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," has this in it. "[Outgoing White House Chief of Staff Andy] Card was enough of a realist to see that there were two negative aspects to Bush's public persona that had come to define his presidency: incompetence and arrogance. ... Maybe unfair, unjustified in Card's opinion, but there it was. He was leaving. And the man most responsible for the postwar troubles, the one who should have gone, Rumsfeld," the secretary of defense, "was staying. 'It's Iraq, Iraq, Iraq,' Card told [his successor Josh] Bolten," the new chief of staff.

Senator DeWine, looking back at the number of troops involved, the judgment made about sectarian violence, the judgment made about the costs of the war, the judgment made about weapons of mass destruction, should President Bush have replaced the Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld?

SEN. DeWINE: I've already said, Tim, I don't have confidence in Rumsfeld.

He's made major mistakes in this war. There's absolutely no doubt about it. The decision to put Rumsfeld in was made by the president, and that's his decision to keep. I was not elected president of the United States, the president was. That's why we have elections.

MR. RUSSERT: Well, in order to...

SEN. DeWINE: Ultimately, I, I don't have confidence in him, no. I've already said that.

MR. RUSSERT: Would you urge the president to replace him?

SEN. DeWINE: I think by saying I don't have confidence, it makes it pretty clear what I think.

MR. RUSSERT: That you're urging the president?

SEN. DeWINE: I, I don't, I don't think that, you know, he's done a, he's done a good job. I think...

MR. RUSSERT: Who would you put in there?

SEN. DeWINE: I think history...

MR. RUSSERT: Who would you put in there?

SEN. DeWINE: I'm not going to be getting the point of speculating. We all know some, some people who, who have prestige and the talent to do the job. But that's not, that's the president's decision, that's not my decision. And I'm not going to tell the president what to do in this regard.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to the events on Friday. Congressman Brown, you're a member of the House of Representatives. Mark Foley, Republican senator from Florida, resigned because he had sent salacious e-mails to Capitol Hill pages, young high school boys who come to school here and work in the Congress. It now has been suggested that some in the Republican leadership knew about a year ago that the speaker of the House, the Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio, and Tom Reynolds, the chairman of the Republican Committee, knew earlier this year. Should more have been done? And should there be an investigation as to exactly who knew what when?

REP. BROWN: Oh, of course, and of course. Yes and yes. I—my first thought when I heard about that Friday—and to most of us it just happened like that—was that I was thinking about the families around the United States who sent their 15- and 16-year-olds to Washington, assuming they were safe, assuming they were part of a program that, that, that was uplifting for them and safe for them, and I think about what those families must think about the safety of their children. And when, when you hear that the leaders of the House of Representatives, the, the people's House, knew about this ahead of time and did nothing to protect the safety of those children, it's just absolutely outrageous.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator DeWine, Congressman Chris Shays, Republican from Connecticut, says that if anyone in the House leadership knew about these e-mails they should step down from their leadership role. Do you agree?

SEN. DeWINE: Tim, I—it's a horrible situation. You know, Fran and I have eight children. I think this could've been one of my kids who was out serving as an intern or serving as, as a page. It's a horrible, horrible situation. I think there has to be a full investigation of who knew what and when they knew it.

MR. RUSSERT: But should anyone in the House leadership step down, like Congressman Shays recommends, if they knew about this?

SEN. DeWINE: I think you have to look and see what they knew and what they did about it. I would want to know what they did about it. And, you know, this is reprehensible. I mean, these kids are entrusted to us when they come out here, they're either our pages or they're interns, sometimes they're college students. And, you know, they do magnificent work, they do wonderful jobs, it's a great program, but this is horrible, horrible.

MR. RUSSERT: Have you spoken to Congressman Boehner of Ohio about this?

SEN. DeWINE: I have not, sir.

MR. RUSSERT: Let...

REP. BROWN: Tim, I think anyone should resign, any leader that knew about this should resign, absolutely.

MR. RUSSERT: Should resign.

REP. BROWN: But, see, he's forfeited any public trust. The leader of the House of Representatives that, that knew about a situation that jeopardized the safety of 15- to 16-year-olds in the government's custody, in the, in the custody of the House of Representatives, if they did nothing to protect those children, they aren't fit to be House...

MR. RUSSERT: So Speaker Hastert and Majority Leader Boehner should resign?

REP. BROWN: If they, in fact, knew that—I don't—I've only read the articles in the paper—if they knew about this ahead of time and did nothing, any legislative leader that knew ahead of time and did nothing should resign. Yes, sir.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator DeWine, this is an article in the Financial Times about the Buckeye state. "Perhaps the most telling sign of the difficult environment Republicans face is in Ohio. ...[DeWine's] tough race against Sherrod Brown...took many by surprise. But it is evidence that the Republicans' overall weak standing...has been pushed still lower by corruption scandals in the state.

"Bob Taft, the Republican governor, has pleaded no contest to ethics violations, and Bob Ney, a Republican congressman ensnared in a separate investigation into the dealings of Jack Abramoff, a powerful Washington lobbyist, this month pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges."

On Friday the House Government Reform Committee says that Abramoff billed clients for 400 contacts with the White House. There are 66 e-mails to indicate those contacts. Are you caught up in a perception of a culture of corruption regarding the Republican Party, particularly in Ohio?

SEN. DeWINE: Tim, the climate, as they say, in politics is not good. But Ohioans know me. I've served Ohioans starting as a country prosecutor in 1976 for, for 30 years. I think they know my integrity, I think they know my honesty, I think they knew who, who I am. So in the end, Ohioans are very discerning. They pick and choose among parties and they, they will make a decision on an individual basis, but I think they know me.

MR. RUSSERT: Is it fair that Senator DeWine is caught up in this whole perception of corruption because it's the governor, Congressman Ney, Jack Abramoff, Mark Foley, but it's not Mike DeWine.

REP. BROWN: Well, it's, it's a bit more than a perception. Thomas Noe has contributed to money to Mike DeWine, so has Jack Abramoff. Senator DeWine has...

MR. RUSSERT: Thomas Noe being someone involved with Governor Taft.

REP. BROWN: Who is, who is, is now convicted of a crime and probably will serve time, may already be in prison, I'm not sure. He was a big Bush backer, close to Taft, funded much of the Republican Party. I mean, Senator DeWine has benefited, as have so many other Republicans have benefitted from this political machine in Ohio. It's right in the midst of the culture of corruption. But, but it's more than that, it's ultimately, you know, who you're going to—who you're going to trust to fight for the middle class when you see, not just what's happening in Columbus, but in Washington. Mike DeWine received more than $400,000 from oil and gas interests, votes for an energy bill...

MR. RUSSERT: But, Congressman Brown...

REP. BROWN: ...that they wrote.

MR. RUSSERT: ...one-third of Abramoff's money went to Democrats.

REP. BROWN: Maybe it did, it didn't go to me. And I went—but, as I'm saying, Mike DeWine received a third of a million dollars from the drug industry, votes for a Medicare bill that meant huge profits to the drug companies, huge profits to the HMOs and, and seniors are seeing drug prices go up faster and faster, faster than anytime in the last five years. It's a question of—you know, the fundamental difference in this campaign is I've devoted my whole career to fighting for the middle class. Middle-class tax cuts, working to help college kids go to, go to school.

Voted against these job-killing trade agreements that, that even conservative David Brooks in The New York Times today wrote about as something that's really important in Ohio. And that...

MR. RUSSERT: Would you repeal NAFTA?

REP. BROWN: I would renegotiate NAFTA, as I would renegotiate PNTR with

China, and I would write tax laws that benefit workers in communities rather than—and small businesses. We've lost so many small businesses in Ohio, machine shops, tool and dye makers in Akron and Dayton and Zanesville, as these big companies outsource. And Mike DeWine has supported every time these trade agreements, these tax bills that give incentives to the big corporations...

SEN. DeWINE: Yeah.

REP. BROWN: ...rather than to the small companies that stay in...

MR. RUSSERT: All right.

REP. BROWN: ...in, in Lima, in Toledo, and manufacture here.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me give Senator DeWine a chance to respond.

REP. BROWN: Sure.

MR. RUSSERT: First, as to contributions from pharmaceutical and oil companies, then onto tax cuts, and then onto the whole issue of trade.

SEN. DeWINE: Well, Sherrod would, would, would have people believe that who gives you money influences you. I get contributions from 20,000 to 30,000 Ohioans. The oil companies, let me tell you, Tim, were not happy and still are not happy about my vote in regard to drilling in, in the Arctic. Drug companies were not happy when Chris Dodd and I and Hillary Clinton and others passed legislation to make them make drugs safer for kids. So I take them on. I do what I think is right. I vote for Ohioans.

But let me talk, if I could, for a moment about this whole job issue, because Congressman Brown has made a big issue about that. It is one more example where the congressman talks a good game, but doesn't do anything. I'll give you an example on trade. Steel. I worked together with Senator Rockefeller and others to go to the White House when these steel companies—they were importing steel, dumping steel in the United States from China and other countries. We got the White House, we got the president to, to put the quotas on, to put the tariffs on. It made a big difference.

Another example. Senator Byrd and I worked together on what ultimately became the Byrd Amendment. I introduced it originally. And basically what it says is that when a foreign country dumps into the United States, instead of putting that money into the U.S. Treasury when we fine them, we give that money to the, to the U.S. companies. That's brought back $315 million just for Ohio companies.

But the bigger issue is, Sherrod thinks you can build a wall around the state of Ohio. One-fourth of our agriculture products are exported. One-fourth of our jobs, Tim, from manufacturing come from exporting to other countries. Thirteen thousand Ohio businesses export every single day. That's where our jobs come from. That's where our future comes from. And once again he—you know, he doesn't understand. He talks a good game about what he's doing. When it comes time to protect Ohio industries, he's not there. He doesn't do anything. I'm the one who has done it time and time again.

MR. RUSSERT: Thirty seconds.

REP. BROWN: First of all, Mike knows those efforts were bipartisan to get the president to do that. I was involved, he was involved, all of us were. The problem is the president pulled the rug out from under it, because under, under those, those, those, those tariffs to protect the steel industry, they didn't last very long. Neither of those laws that he says—that he talks about are still in effect.

But I want to see more trade. I just don't want one-way free trade where our biggest export is jobs to Mexico and jobs to China. I want fair trade, I fought for and got into Ohio my first year in, in the first session in Congress, the United States Export Assistance Center located in Ohio to serve the region. That's literally helped thousands, literally thousands of small business figure out how to export more. I want fair trade with more experts—more exports, not this free trade that causes the devastation of the Miami Valley, where Mike is from, that causes the kind of job loss in Jackson and Gallapolis and Chillicothe and Lima that we're seeing. We simply have abandoned the middle class when we passed these trade agreements, passed tax laws that give incentives to large corporations to outsource instead of helping our small businesses, helping our communities and helping our workers.

MR. RUSSERT: Twenty seconds.

SEN. DeWINE: When it came time to help the middle class with tax cuts, a tax cut that has taken five million Americans off the tax rolls, Tim, that's helped 4.3 million Ohioans, that has given the average Ohioan that makes $50,000 a year that has two kids, has saved $2,000 per year, Sherrod Brown voted no time and time again. He has not been with the middle class on taxes, either.

REP. BROWN: Mike, Mike, Mike, you know better than that, too.

SEN. DeWINE: Well, it's true.

REP. BROWN: Can I talk for a moment about taxes?

SEN. DeWINE: Again, what's the fact? You know, I keep citing...

REP. BROWN: Because since his whole ad campaign is, is fabricated on making up stuff about taxes.

SEN. DeWINE: I keep citing, I keep citing—no. You know the funny thing is? My ad cam is based on votes that you cast. You just want to run from your record, that's your problem.

REP. BROWN: You know, you know, interestingly, Mike's first ad in this campaign, he ran an ad of the World Trade Center on fire. The problem is, he doctored the ad. He took the most sacred symbol of a U.S. tragedy, and...

SEN. DeWINE: Have you ever denied the facts? Have you ever denied the facts in the ad, that you voted 10 different times against intelligence, and voted against the Patriot...

REP. BROWN: You—he, he said—he says on his ads, we all say—sit there very efficiently and say "I approve, I'm Sherrod Brown, I'm Mike DeWine, I approve this ad."

SEN. DeWINE: Well, deny the facts, Sherrod.

REP. BROWN: He approved an ad that showed—that, that doctored the picture of the World Trade Center. He also called--15 years ago, he said John Glenn was soft on Communism.

SEN. DeWINE: Tim, Tim, I, I said there was a mistake made in the picture, but there was no mistake in the facts.

REP. BROWN: This is how he runs ads. They aren't—"It was a mistake. It was a mistake."

SEN. DeWINE: You're still not denying the facts. Are the facts incorrect?

REP. BROWN: But no—just, just like Mike DeWine, it doesn't hold the drug companies accountable, doesn't hold the Defense Department accountable...

SEN. DeWINE: He won't, he won't answer the question, Tim. Ten votes against intelligence, 10 votes against...

REP. BROWN: He didn't even fire—he didn't fire the ad agency.

MR. RUSSERT: Was there anything other than the smokestack—smoke...

REP. BROWN: What was wrong with the ad?

MR. RUSSERT: Was there any factual other mistakes in terms of...(unintelligible).

REP. BROWN: Well, other, other than the smoke—the doctoring a photo?

MR. RUSSERT: Well, you made that point. You made that point.

REP. BROWN: That's a, that's a pretty important point. It just shows that Mike DeWine...

SEN. DeWINE: There he goes.

REP. BROWN: I could, I could document throughout how he's, he's on—let me talk about taxes, from what he says on his ads on taxes.

SEN. DeWINE: He won't answer the question, will he, Tim? He won't answer the question. The facts are correct.

REP. BROWN: No, I, I will answer the—no, I will be—I would be glad to answer the questions.

MR. RUSSERT: I think people watching these debates and this one have a sense that Washington has broken down in terms of our ability to find common ground. And I went through and, and found voting records which are quite interesting. Congressman Brown, here's your votes in support of President Bush. In 2005, you were with the president 7 percent of the time. In other words, 93 percent of the time you voted against the president. 2004 was 26, 11, 22 and 12 during the five years of the Bush presidency.

Senator DeWine, here's your voting record in terms of President Bush. The '05, year before running for re-election was 76 percent. Prior to that it was 94, 97, 98, 95. It's as if you—if you're a Republican, you have to be for Bush. If you're a Democrat, you have to be against Bush.

REP. BROWN: Well, can I, can I answer that...(unintelligible)?

MR. RUSSERT: Please.

REP. BROWN: My, my first—the eight years I served with—when President Clinton was president, on several major issues I took on the president and my party. I took them on in the North American Free Trade Agreement, because my interest was representing Ohio, not my party, and not the president of the United States. I took on the president on three—at least three other major issues: the balanced budget amendment, I supported it, President Clinton opposed it. On the line-item veto, I supported it, President Clinton opposed it. On the trade bill with China, PNTR with China, I opposed it. The president was pushing and lobbying hard. On major issues, I'll stand up to the president and my own party. Mike DeWine really hasn't. He's not just voted with President Bush almost all the time, including every single Bush appointee, every single Bush appointee, not one has Mike voted against. And I will show more independence when I'm in the Senate, because my allegiance will be to Ohio and to, to the communities in Ohio, not to the president, not to...

MR. RUSSERT: Is this election a referendum on George Bush?

REP. BROWN: This election's more a referendum on the special interest stranglehold in our government. The drug industry always gets its way, the HMOs always get their way, the oil industry always gets their way, the big companies that outsource jobs always get their way. That's what this is—that's really what this election's about. Who's fighting for the middle class? That's what this election's about.

MR. RUSSERT: What's this election about? Is it, is it a referendum on George W. Bush's policies?

SEN. DeWINE: I'll get to that in a minute. Can I answer the first question, though, about the bipartisanship breaking down? If I could do that, Tim.

Dick Durbin, certainly not a, a Republican, number two Democrat in the Senate, said this about me in the Columbus Dispatch. He said "Mike DeWine, yes, he votes Republican Party a lot of times." But he says, "When I go to him on specific important issues," he said, "he, he is not a rubber stamp. He is someone who will look at things and thinks about things." That's what number two man in the Senate, Dick Durbin, said.

The fundamental difference, really, when you put aside all the votes, between Sherrod Brown and Mike DeWine in this campaign is that, Tim, for 12 years in the Senate, I've gotten things done. And the way I've gotten things done is by working with Democrats and Republicans. I worked with Jay Rockefeller, for example, on highway safety issues. I worked with Jay on steel. I also worked with Jay on, on, on other issues, as well—adoption, foster care. I worked with Chris Dodd to get better medicines for kids, on the fire act to get money, $100 million, directly back in Ohio. Worked with Senator Levin in regard to the Great Lakes. I could go on and on and on. I have a long, long record of working with Democrats and Republicans alike. It is the only way, Tim, you get things done. And despite the headlines about all the acrimony in Washington, work still gets done. I've been able to do it. I've fought for kids, I have fought for better pharmaceuticals for children, highway safety, these are things I care passionately about.

The difference between myself and Sherrod is, if you look at his record, he has a very, very slim record in the House of Representatives of getting anything done. He has been described, he has been described as a partisan in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. He has been described as someone who is on the fringe by the National Journal. He's on the fringe of his own party. Many, many times his votes have been in the minority even of his own party. He is to the left of his own party and not in the mainstream of Ohio.

What Ohioans want, when I travel around the state, they say "Mike, we're sick of the acrimony, we're sick of the partisanship, we're sick of the fighting." I'm the one candidate in this race who has demonstrated I can work with Democrats and Republicans to get things done and make things happen for Ohio.

MR. RUSSERT: I'll consider that a closing statement and I'll give you 25 seconds.

REP. BROWN: Yeah, I, I don't—this whole thing about—that Mike DeWine just said—the Certified Public Accountants of Ohio, a, a Republican-leaning conservative business group that cares about economic development, that cares about tax cuts for the middle class, that cares about fairness, and is a, is a conservative Republican-leaning group, as I said, has endorsed me. I'm the only Democrat challenger in the country, I believe, that was endorsed by them. And we—I can make a list, a long list of bipartisan issues I worked on. I, I wrote with Bill Frist the first bioterrorism bill in the country—law in the country.

SEN. DeWINE: He denied that, by the way.

REP. BROWN: No, he denied five years later, another bill.

REP. BROWN: I've worked with Mike Bilrakis, Florida Republican, to change the way the children's health bill, how we do children's health research. I worked for—with John McCain on a bill to try to stop the gaming of the patent system by the drug companies. I will continue to work bipartisan in the, in the Senate, and—but my ultimate allegiance is to the middle class and working to help Ohioans.

MR. RUSSERT: To be continued. Sherrod Brown, Mike DeWine, thanks very much.

REP. BROWN: Thank you, Tim.

SEN. DeWINE: Thanks, Tim. Thank you very much.

MR. RUSSERT: And we'll be right back.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone.

Before Congress left town Friday, they gave President Bush the military tribunal legislation he demanded, but the White House and Republicans were also hit by a triple whammy of bad news late this week. A new report on Jack Abramoff, Congressman Mark Foley's resignation, and of course Bob Woodward's new book, State of Denial, also on the cover of Newsweek this morning.

Here to talk about all that is one of the president's closest advisers, Dan Bartlett. Welcome back to This Week.

BARTLETT: Thanks, George. Nice to be with you.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Now, in 2004, Bob Woodward wrote a book, Plan of Attack. You went out publicly, urged people to go buy it and read it. I take it you're not going to do that with State of Denial?

BARTLETT: Well, George, it is a book that we participated at various levels within the administration, both in the White House and other parts of the administration, Department of Defense and State.

But I must say, George, I think as we worked with Bob on this project from the very outset, it was unfortunate that we felt he had already formulated some conclusions even before the interviewing began.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That's a pretty stiff charge. You're saying he is a biased reporter on this?

BARTLETT: Well, we've had a lot of experience with Bob, and I think -- in the first two books, as you did mention -- and what we found in those books is that he came in very much with an open mind, very much wanting the facts to lead him to a conclusion. And after reading this book over the weekend, I was really struck by the fact that the central thesis of this book, the claim that the president was in a state of denial, that he was misleading the American people about what was happening in Iraq, quite frankly, is not backed up with the own facts that are in the book.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I want to get there in one second, but before we get there -- because you're making a pretty, pretty serious charge here. You're saying that Bob Woodward, been around Washington for an awful long time, went into this with an agenda and basically wasn't an honest reporter.

BARTLETT: I didn't say that he wasn't an honest reporter. Reporters come in with conclusions or some firm ideas about where they want to take a book, and certain occasions when he met with administration officials and they would come to talk to me about their meetings with him, there was just a sense that despite spending hours with him, that their points weren't getting across.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you thought he had an agenda?

BARTLETT: I'm not going to use the word agenda, but we did feel like he approached this book different than he did the first two, and that's why we made the decision that the president was not going to...

STEPHANOPOULOS: And the vice president didn't speak with him either.

BARTLETT: That's correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you know, from the outside, it looks like, well, if Bob Woodward is going to write a positive book, he gets cooperation, he gets praise. If it's a negative book, well, he didn't have an agenda, but you didn't approve of his approach.

BARTLETT: Well, I'll make the point, though, we didn't agree with everything he put in his second book either, but the fact of the matter is, many people in the administration, including myself, including the national security adviser, including the secretary of state, including the joint chairman -- the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, including many other people, did participate in this book.

But what we were struck by is the fact that time after time after time, counterevidence was provided to Bob and we didn't feel like our point was getting across. And you know, it's my job to make judgments like that as to whether the president ought to participate, and, you know, we made the decision...

STEPHANOPOULOS: And you don't feel he included the counterevidence in the book?

BARTLETT: Not as much as I thought. But as I said, what's interesting about this book is that he doesn't connect his own dots. What he talks about in here is that there is a grim picture in Iraq that the president wasn't sharing with the American people, that we didn't have a strategy, when in fact he references throughout the book time after time after time where the president was being presented with the bad information, was pushing the internal process to make sure that we were adapting to the enemy, and he was sharing this news with the American people.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But not always. Let's look at some of the specifics. Front page of The Washington Post this morning has an exert. Talk about May of this year, when the Joint Chiefs of Staff presented a private intelligence report to the Pentagon.

And it said, The report predicted a more violent 2007: 'Insurgents and terrorists retain the resources and capabilities to sustain and even increase current level of violence through the next year.' Very same month a public report goes from the Pentagon to Congress. The public report sent to Congress said the 'appeal and motivation for continued violent action will begin to wane in early 2007.'

That does seem like a contradiction.

BARTLETT: Well, no, the fact of the matter is is that the reports that go to Congress, the entire intelligence community takes a look at all data points for an assessment such as like that. The one specific memorandum that he points to is one data point. All of these are taken into consideration, but the fact of the matter is, he uses these daily attack chars or weekly or monthly attack charts as if this is some shocking revelation, when in fact, those very...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But that's not what I was talking about here.

BARTLETT: ... attack charts are put...

STEPHANOPOULOS: This is very specific. On the one hand, you have the joint chiefs of staff intelligence report saying insurgents and terrorists retain the capabilities to increase the level of violence, and then the public report says, you expect basically the appeal and motivation for the insurgents to wane in 2007.

BARTLETT: In the assessment made then -- and remember, you've got to take yourself back into the point of May. And this is in the wake of the Golden Samarra Mosque bombing, in which sectarian violence is beginning to increase, we have a new government that is being formed.

And I think the prediction by many of the people looking at this is if you have a unity government that is fighting the forces of evil in Iraq that you are going to see better assessments. Having said that, the president has been very clear with the American people that the difficulties of the fight in Iraq was one that's going to take some time.

We've had generals go before Congress and argue very forcefully that this is a very difficult fight, that it's going to require our troops to be on the ground. George, the politically expedient thing for the president to do in the last two years has been, let's just pull down the troops and get out. Let's not follow a timetable, a conditions-based approach to this.

What he has done is said, I'm going to listen to my commanders on the ground. I'm going to constantly adapt our tactics to meet a very important strategic objective. And what this book shows is that there was a lot of disagreement.

There's a lot of people who are very smart, very experienced grappling with very difficult issues, sometimes coming to opposite conclusions, but at the end of the day, what we see is a process that is showing us adapt to the enemy. And the enemy is very good, and they have been to our extent more vicious and more violent than we probably originally expected. And the president has talked about that with the American people.

STEPHANOPOULOS: One of the more explosive allegations in the book goes back to before the war in Iraq. It goes back to 2001. He talks about a meeting July 10th, 2001, two months before 9/11. CIA Director George Tenet and his counterterrorism chief, Cofer Black, are reading intelligence. They are so caught up by what they're seeing. They see an attack coming.

They call up Condi Rice for an unscheduled meeting, go to the White House, warn her of this, say that we need action. But after the meeting, They both felt they were not getting through to Rice. She was polite, but they felt the brush-off. A coherent plan for covert action against bin Laden was in the pipeline, but it would take some time.

They believe it was a mistake not to act after that meeting.

BARTLETT: Well, I must say, myself and other members including Secretary Rice, who alleges was in this meeting, and there was a meeting...

STEPHANOPOULOS: You've spoken to her?

BARTLETT: I spoke to her this morning. She believes that this is a very grossly misaccurate characterization of the meeting they had. Look, George, the first eight months of President Bush's presidency has been some of the most investigated eight months in any presidency because of the 9/11 attack.

We had the 9-11 Commission, a bipartisan commission, look at all of it, look at all of the information that was provided to government officials. They testified before it. Now 4 1/2, 5 years later we're just now hearing about these vivid accounts of meetings with Secretary Rice...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Cofer Black says the only thing we didn't do was pull the trigger to the gun we were holding to Rice's head.

BARTLETT: And Cofer Black and George Tenet and others also testified before the 9-11 Commission. Why is it now that this information...

STEPHANOPOULOS: So this didn't happen? BARTLETT: And that's Secretary Rice's view that that type of urgent request to go after bin Laden as the book alleges in her mind didn't happen. But I don't want to leave the wrong impression, George. Everybody in government felt we could have done a better job before 9/11. We had huge gaps in our intelligence-gathering capabilities, the wall between law enforcement, intel, and that's why we've worked so hard in the last couple years to repair these things so we can do a better job of protecting the American people.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally on this book. Woodward reports that not only the chief of staff, Andy Card, but also the secretary -- who wanted Rumsfeld to go, but also the secretary of state, the national security adviser and her deputy all recommended a new national security team after the election.

Yet the president didn't take that advice. He said Colin Powell has to go; Donald Rumsfeld should stay. Why?

BARTLETT: Well, what you would expect a chief of staff to do at the beginning of a new term is to make an assessment of all senior staff as well as your cabinet. And that's exactly what Andy Card did; in fact recommending to the president that he may want to change his chief of staff himself.

And what Steve Hadley and Condi Rice and others say, Mr. President, maybe you ought to think about just bringing in a whole new team, do it all at once.

And the president decided that's not the approach he wanted to take. And what Andy, as a chief of staff, should do was providing options to the president in case he decided to make changes. But as everybody knows, the president has decided months ago that Secretary Rumsfeld is the right person for the job.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Newsweek is reporting this morning that the president is actually sounding out people, including Henry Kissinger and James Baker about whether he should replace Rumsfeld.

And it quotes a senior White House official, saying, so far, the advice has been Rumsfeld should stay, but I can't predict the future.

Is his job secure throughout this term?

BARTLETT: I can only speak for what the president -- the president has full confidence in Secretary Rumsfeld. Every cabinet member serves at the pleasure of the president. He is doing an enormously difficult job fighting a war, trying to transform our military to meet the new threats of the 21st century.

We recognize that he has his critics. We recognize that he's made some very difficult decisions. Some people don't like his bedside manner. But what President Bush looks to in Secretary Rumsfeld is to bring him the type of information he needs to make the right decisions in this war.

And make no mistake about it, George, this has been a difficult war. The enemy we're up against is determined to do everything they can to bring America to its knees. And we have to do everything we can to fight this enemy. And he believes that Secretary Rumsfeld is the right person to help him lead that fight. STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me turn to this issue, the congressional report on White House contacts with Jack Abramoff -- alleged some more than 400 contacts with Abramoff and his clients when he was active.

When Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, was asked about contacts earlier this year, here's what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

QUESTION: Can you be more specific about the contacts with the senior staff?

You said you were going to get back to us on that.

MCCLELLAN: No, I did check. There were a few staff-level meetings.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Now this report also says there were about 187 contacts over drinks and meals with White House staffers, for a tab of almost $25,000.

There seems to be a great discrepancy between what Scott McClellan and the White House has admitted to and the evidence in this report.

BARTLETT: Well, George, I don't think that's the case. And the report itself concludes that you can't draw any firm conclusion from the quote-unquote contacts because many times, these so-called contacts were just an excuse for Jack Abramoff and his cronies to bill their clients for activities that didn't really take place.

(CROSSTALK)

BARTLETT: What Scott McClellan was talking about and what all the discussion back then was about were what was called ways records. These are basically the records of people coming in and out of the White House...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me stop you there because it was more than that. He was asked on several occasions over those days, can you talk about contacts?

Do you have records of any phone calls or e-mails between staff members and Mr. Abramoff?

He was asked several times, on several different occasions. He always chose to answer by saying there were just a few high-level staff meetings, when in fact there were far more contacts.

BARTLETT: Well, George, what Scott was saying is we were not going to go on a fishing expedition looking for people's contacts when there was no suggestion of wrongdoing.

The bottom line about this report and about this whole scandal was the fact of how much this person, Jack Abramoff, bilked his clients for work they didn't do. And every time it shows...

(CROSSTALK)

BARTLETT: And every time it shows -- now, this is important for the viewers to understand is that he didn't get anything from this administration. He billed his clients thousands upon thousands upon thousands of dollars for very casual contacts.

In fact, in one case, he sees Karl Rove at a Gridiron dinner, which is a Washington media dinner, and he bills his client for it.

(CROSSTALK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me just stop you. But it does show that some of his clients did get funding after -- the e-mails say White House intervention -- but more specifically, his former aide, Susan Ralston, became Karl Rove's aide.

There's dozens of contacts between the two. She's shown in these e-mails, negotiating for a job, and according to the evidence here, accepted tickets to sporting events, concerts on seven different occasions, for a total of about $2,000.

That seems, on its face, to be a clear violation of White House ethics rules.

BARTLETT: Well, this report was received on Friday. We're obviously looking at all the different things in this report.

I will make a couple distinctions that are important to understand, that there are different reporting requirements for different levels of staff. There are different standards for people who have prior relationships. And Susan Ralston, as you may know, used to work for Jack Abramoff.

So these are all mitigating factors that we will look at. But this is still under review. And we're going to look at the evidence that was brought forward by this report.

STEPHANOPOULOS: One final, quick question on this Mark Foley situation in the House: Number one, was the president aware of any of these allegations?

Number two, the Washington Post is calling for an independent investigation. Do you think that's appropriate?

BARTLETT: The president was not aware of this. It is a shocking revelation to see this type of allegation. The members of the House of Representatives, the leadership appear to be very aggressive in pursuing this investigation, and I think that's the best place is for the leadership to determine the way forward.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Dan Bartlett, thanks very much.

BARTLETT: Thanks for having me, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Congressman John Murtha is next, and later, America's new poet laureate.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HALL: I think that the world needs even more poetry than it has. It needs to pay attention more.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And we are back now for the Democratic response from Congressman John Murtha. Good morning, Congressman.

MURTHA: Good morning, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, you heard Dan Bartlett there on his response to State of Denial. He says the president is not in a state of denial. He's been straight with America, and he's going to stick with Don Rumsfeld. What's your response?

MURTHA: George, we're fighting for the soul of America. They have been mischaracterizing and misrepresenting this war for the last two years. I spoke out two years ago and said we can't win it militarily. The military leaders have told me that. General Pace has said this publicly, and they continue to put our troops in harm's way. They're caught in a civil war. What Bob Woodward said doesn't surprise me a bit. It's the kind of thing that he dug into and got facts to verify what I've been saying.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You make...

MURTHA: They've mishandled this war. Rumsfeld ought to go, George. STEPHANOPOULOS: You make a cameo appearance in State of Denial on page 451. It discusses last March 16th. On that day, General John Abizaid, the head of Central Command, was testifying to the Senate. And he told the Senate in public that a precipitous withdrawal from Iraq would undermine U.S. strategy.

But Woodward writes that Abizaid then came to see you, and according to you, Abizaid raised his hand for emphasis and held his thumb and forefinger a quarter of an inch from each other and said, 'we're that far apart.'

Now that sounds like a contradiction. What did he mean by that?

MURTHA: Well, George, that's exactly what he said. My staff was in the meeting when we talked. There's no question about it. The military commander has been telling me this for a long time.

The administration and the civilian leadership, I told Bremer over and over again. I told Secretary Rumsfeld, you're too optimistic about what's going on. Incidents have increased from 400 a week last year to 800 a week. George, we got 130,000 people -- more than that now, but as a whole, 130,000 people on the ground.

And the worst two months. More Iraqis were killed in July and August than any other time.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But are you saying, sir, are you saying that General Abizaid was saying you and he were this far apart on the notion of withdrawing troops over the next year?

MURTHA: You heard Casey say he wanted to withdraw troops. Everybody wanted to withdraw troops. I don't remember what he was doing beforehand, but all the military commanders know that we have become the enemy. Seventy percent of the Iraqis say it's all right to kill Americans.

George, this thing's gotten out of hand. It's Sunnis fighting Shias, and our troops are caught in between. This is -- the Democrats are unified against terrorism. But terrorism is not the -- the heart of terrorism is not in Iraq. The heart of terrorism is worldwide, and you have to do it internationally.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But, sir...

MURTHA: You have to do it diplomatically.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Even generals on your side, General John Batiste, no one has been more critical of Secretary Rumsfeld than General John Batiste, the former commander of the 1st Infantry Division. He agrees with you on that, but he disagrees with your solution. Look at this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RETIRED MAJOR GENERAL JOHN BATISTE, U.S. ARMY: Should we pull out of Iraq on some timeline in the future without finishing the work that we started, I think the result will be a civil war of some magnitude, which will turn into a regional mess.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: He fears your solution would cause a regional mess.

MURTHA: Yeah, George, let me tell you something, when I came back from Vietnam in 1967, Lyndon Johnson, president of the United States, said -- it was a month later. It was in August of '67. He said there's been an election. Everything's going to be all right. Now, 35,000 people died after that, and you know the circumstance when we got out. We have to get out of there. We have to redeploy our troops. We're not deserting Iraq. What we're going to do is redeploy to the periphery. And that's what's going to happen.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The president says that's cut and run.

MURTHA: It's going to happen next week. It's going to happen next year. We have to redeploy out of Iraq. There's no question about it. Let them settle it themselves. The British were in India for 75 years as colonies, and when they left, there was a civil war.

Now, the Iraqis themselves say it's not going to be any worse. Who do I believe? This administration who said there's al Qaida connection, who said there's weapons of mass destruction, say it's going better every day, do I believe them? Or do I believe the people I've been talking to, the troops in the field, the troops in the hospitals and the generals who say we can't win it militarily?

What is the point? We've got 130,000 people on the ground for two years, and it's getting worse every day.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, sir, though, the National Intelligence Estimate said just this week even though Iraq has become a cause celebre for Islamic jihadists, they would take failure in Iraq as an even greater boost.

MURTHA: George, let me tell you something. They say that. They said there was weapons of mass destruction. They said there was an al Qaida connection. George, it's just the facts. We're going to have to get out of Iraq, and it's a matter of time.

We're putting our young people -- I go to the hospitals every week. It breaks my heart to see these young people. They're stretched so thin. Some of these young people are going back to Iraq with less than a year in the United States. It should be two time. We've got people who are, they're taken back in the service with lower standards.

We're lowering our standards on the Geneva Convention. We're lowering our standards morally for the world. We have the lowest level, according to the polls, internationally that we've ever had because of what we're doing in Iraq. We have to change our tactics.

First of all, you have to hold somebody accountable, and then the second thing you have to do is start to work diplomatically, international, politically. You cannot solve this militarily.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me...

MURTHA: The longer we stay there, the worse it's going to get.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me turn to this issue of Congressman Mark Foley's resignation. It now turns out that five members of the Republican leadership, members of Congress were informed of these allegations in some level earlier this year. Do you think they handled it appropriately?

MURTHA: George, they did not, and you were there in the Congress working for Gephardt when some of these other things happened. Let me tell you something, that -- we have an obligation to protect these young pages. It's outrageous.

If they knew any extent at all of what happened, I just cannot believe that they allowed this to happen and just told him, OK, stay away from this kid. I don't know what they saw. But it's really makes me nervous that they looked like they tried to cover it up.

This is what the investigation has to be all about, and it has to be a very quick investigation. We have to protect these young people who come up there and try to learn what's going on with the government.

STEPHANOPOULOS: It's being handled by the ethics committee. You just saw Dan Bartlett say he thought that was appropriate. The Washington Post says no, you need an independent investigation. What do you think?

MURTHA: Well, I think the ethics committee can handle it if they do a quick job of it. I mean, this is something that could be done internally. There's no question in my mind about that, George. I'm convinced, but it has to be done very quickly.

We cannot afford -- you know, the reputation of Congress under the Republican leadership is lower than used car salesmen. They have responsibility, the Senate, the House and the White House.

They talk about the responsibility of Congress. We need -- these are the kind of things that destroy the confidence. When I say we're fighting for the soul of America -- we work two or three days a week. We need to get back to five days a week starting on Monday, work through Friday.

And in these answers and solutions, we have to be bipartisan. You cannot do them partisan as they've been doing them the last couple years.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You say this has to be done quickly. You mean before the election?

MURTHA: Absolutely. I think they have to get into this; they have to call people in; they have to call these pages in; they have to look at these e-mails, see who knew when. And they have to hold them accountable.

This is what's happened with this administration. They don't hold people accountable. The world knows it. And the public knows it, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, sir, you know, you've said and signaled you want to be majority leader if the Democrats take control. I am starting to hear from Democrats who worry that having you as leader will send the wrong message.

They point to your involvement in the Abscam scandal two decades ago. They also say you have a record of helping your brother's lobbying clients get government contracts.

Are they right to be worried?

MURTHA: George, let me tell you something. I've been in this business a long time. I've worked with leadership, as you know, from Gephardt to Tip to -- I've tried to get things done.

Twenty-five years ago, they offered me money and I said I didn't want the money. I wanted the best for my district. It had 24 percent unemployment.

I take no back seat to -- my brother was treated like everybody else. We do it by the book. Everything we do in our office is by the book. And I think you'll see it's going to turn out a little differently than my detractors are pointing to, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Congressman Murtha, thank you very much.

MURTHA: Nice talking to you, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The roundtable is next with George Will, Donna Brazile, Torie Clarke and Mark Halperin.

And later, the Sunday funnies.

CONAN O'BRIEN, HOST, LATE NIGHT WITH CONAN O'BRIEN : Oprah Winfrey's in the news. In a recent interview, Oprah Winfrey says that she wants Senator Barack Obama to be the next president.

Yes, yes. Yes, when Oprah heard that Obama doesn't want to be president, she parted the clouds and said, Oprah has spoken.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our voice this week, Donald Hall.

For nearly all his 78 years, Hall has been a poet, writing about, in his words, love, death and New Hampshire. Today he becomes America's poet laureate and shares with us his first poem as laureate. It's calls Two Hays (ph).

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

HALL: My grandfather and I were riding the horse. It took four days to hay and rake the acres of grass from the fields on both fields of the house.

After riding, he pulled the mowing machine all morning. He drank a bucket of water, then pulled a horse rake and turned the hay to dry in the sun, then heaped it together.

With a sigh, I trimmed the uncut hay around boulders and trees, by stone walls, and raked every blade to one of Riley's (ph) piles. My grandfather pitched it up on the rack, where I climbed to load it, pitting forkfuls in place.

We left behind us hayfields as neat as lawns.

Sixty-odd years later, a farmer's machines take alfalfa down in an afternoon. Next morning, an engine with huge claws grapples round green bales onto truck, leaving loose hay scattered and grasses waving at the field's margin. From the porch where I rock with my book, I marvel at acceleration and dishevelment.

Poetry has shown me the way to feel again and again, how to contain my feeling, how to -- how to be able to feel in that complicated human way, when you feel more than one way at once, ways that seem contradictory but which are true, both at the same time.

Thanks for sharing part of your Sunday with us. We'll see you next week.

WALLACE: Today, we'll discuss how our interview has changed the landscape for November with Congresswoman Jane Harman and former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich.

Plus, separating fact from spin about what two presidents did before 9/11. We've assembled a truth squad: a former member of the Clinton National Security Council, the former CIA official in charge of hunting Osama bin Laden, and a journalist who spent years traveling the world and dug up new information on our fight against Al Qaida.

Then Bob Woodward's new book says the situation in Iraq is worse than the White House is telling us. We'll talk with our Sunday regulars: Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams.

And a special look back at our week that was -- all right now on "Fox News Sunday."

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. Here's a quick check of the latest headlines.

There's new video out this morning of Mohammed Atta, the terrorist who flew a hijacked jet into the World Trade Center on 9/11. The tape, made in January of 2000, shows Atta along with others who took part in the attacks. Officials say the tape helps confirm Atta's movements before 9/11.

House Republican leaders have apparently known for months that Congressman Mark Foley sent inappropriate e-mails to a 16-year-old male page. A report today says Speaker Dennis Hastert learned about the e-mails early this year, but that they were described as "overfriendly."

And a former teammate of Roger Clemens allegedly has linked the all- star pitcher to performance-enhancing drugs. Clemens and five other players are named in a legal affidavit.

Well, our interview last week with former President Clinton prompted an outpouring of reaction. Joining us to discuss the fallout, Congresswoman Jane Harman, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, and former Republican Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich.

Welcome back, both of you, to "Fox News Sunday."

NEWT GINGRICH, FORMER SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: Good to be here.

WALLACE: Before we get to the Clinton interview, let's start, as we always do, with the latest news.

It now turns out that, as we said, top Republican House leaders knew for months that Congressman Mark Foley sent inappropriate e-mails to at least one 16-year-old male page.

Speaker Gingrich, did House Republican leaders do all they should have?

GINGRICH: Well, I think if you look at what they actually knew, which was that the family did not want anyone involved and the actual notes were relatively innocuous -- there was nothing sexual in those notes. They had him counseled. They had the head of the page program, Congressman Shimkus, talk to him very directly. And I think they thought it was over. The newest incident only surfaced when ABC News interviewed Foley, and he resigned within two hours, or I think the House leaders would have moved to expel him.

WALLACE: But during all those months, they left Foley in the House Republican leadership. They left him as the head of the congressional caucus dealing with exploited children. No second thoughts about that?

GINGRICH: Well, you can have second thoughts about it, but I think, had they overly aggressively reacted to the initial round, they would have also been accused of gay bashing. I mean, the original notes had no sexual innuendo, and the parents did not want any action taken.

WALLACE: Well, how would it have been gay bashing?

GINGRICH: Because it was a male-male relationship. And they had no -- there was no proof, there was nothing that I know of in that initial round that would have led you to say in a normal circumstance that this is a predatory person. It's very clear -- and let me remind you, in 1983, I moved to expel two members for dealing with pages inappropriately, because I do think we have an en loco parentis responsibility. But I think it would have been very hard to have done much more than they did with the first action. And in the second action, had he not resigned, I think they would have expelled him.

WALLACE: Congresswoman Harman, did top Republican leaders in the House act appropriately in this case?

REP. JANE HARMAN (D), CALIFORNIA: Well, I'm a mother of four and a newly minted grandmother. And I don't know all the facts. All I know are the facts I read in the newspaper and some conversation on the floor, which I don't think is adequate. But I think this should be investigated objectively. I think the Democratic leadership should have been told 10 months ago. This was a very serious charge. And just because one page's family doesn't want facts out, I don't think is an adequate reason to do nothing. And I gather that basically nothing was done, except that Foley was warned, and Foley appears to have misled people, obviously misled people, about what he was up to. I mean, it's a human tragedy, not just for him but for all those involved. And I am not comfortable with where we're leaving this. It's not my call what we do next, but more needs to be done.

WALLACE: When you say not comfortable with where they're leaving it, it's going to the House Ethics Committee.

HARMAN: Well, it's going to the House Ethics Committee now. There's been a Republican investigation for 24 hours of Republican activity. I just don't think that that is adequate. And it's not my call what is asked for next, but my view is, as a parent and a grandparent, that we need to do more to create a comfort level for those parents who are sending young pages, children under 18, to serve in the House.

WALLACE: Let's turn to my interview with former President Clinton in which he said that he did a better job fighting Al Qaida than President Bush has. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

W. CLINTON: If I were still president, we'd have more than 20,000 troops there trying to kill him. Now, I've never criticized President Bush, and I don't think this is useful. But you know we do have a government that thinks Afghanistan is only one-seventh as important as Iraq. And you ask me about terror?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Let's turn to the issue of what both presidents did pre- 9/11. We already know about the August 2001 CIA memo to the president that warned him that bin Laden wanted to attack America. But now we have learned, in the new Bob Woodward book, that in July of 2001, CIA Director George Tenet was so worried about an imminent attack -- this was just two months before 9/11 -- that he met with then-National Security Advisor Rice and felt that she gave him the brush-off.

Speaker Gingrich, does former President Clinton have a point about the Bush administration?

GINGRICH: I think he has a point about the Bush administration; I think people have a point about his administration. But we need to start figuring out how to play the solution game.

We are in a very hard war against people who hate us and want to destroy us. The fact is neither administration has gotten bin Laden. And instead of pointing fingers at each other, it would be nice for President Clinton to give us six or eight solutions. It would be nice for President Bush to admit this is going to be much harder than anybody ever dreamed. Winning this campaign is going to be a long, bitter, difficult problem.

WALLACE: I promise to move forward in a moment, but, Congresswoman Harman, I want to give you a chance to respond to the same question. Bill Clinton had eight years. George W. Bush had eight months.

HARMAN: Well, let's look at the history. It goes over four presidencies. I mean, the first modern terrorist attacks were to the U.S. Marine barracks in Lebanon, the U.S. embassy in Lebanon, the Achille Lauro, Pan Am 103. Those were all during the Reagan administration.

Then in Bush I, we cut the defense and intelligence budgets because we declared a peace dividend because the Cold War ended. Great achievement. And I'd love to give credit to Reagan and Bush I for that.

Then we start the Clinton years with too-low expenditures, I'm sure Newt would agree with me, both on defense and intelligence. I was elected to Congress then, and my aerospace district in California had lots of triple Ph.D.s out of work.

In the mid '90s, we realized the world was more dangerous on a bipartisan basis, and we start adding to the budgets on a bipartisan basis. We double the counterterrorism budget. We add 20 percent to intelligence. We prevent the millennium plot. Yes, I think Bill Clinton did a lot.

Then we have eight months, nine months of Bush. And this July 10 memo you just mentioned, Chris, is news to me, the July 10 meeting, and it's something we should explore. I mean, that is as close to a smoking gun as I can imagine. Condi Rice did nothing, and she was told by two senior terrorism officials that their hair was on fire.

WALLACE: Let's move if we can, because I know you want to, Speaker Gingrich, to the present, because there's plenty in the Bob Woodward book about that as well.

He reveals that, this May, the intelligence division of the Joint Chiefs of Staff sent a secret assessment of the situation in Iraq to the president and all the top officials. And let's put it up on the screen: "Insurgents and terrorists retain the resources and capabilities to sustain and even increase the current level of violence through the next year."

But two days after that secret Pentagon report, which said that, in fact, the situation could get even worse in 2007, the Pentagon sent a public report to Congress, and let's put part of that up on the screen, in which it said: "Appeal and motivation for continued violent action will begin to wane, to reduce, in early 2007."

Speaker Gingrich, is the president misleading the American people about the situation in Iraq?

GINGRICH: Well, I think what you just said -- and Jane may want to comment -- I think what you just reported was two Pentagon documents. I mean, I think there's a genuine intellectual fight under way inside the government among professionals over the way ahead. And I think one group is saying, "Stay the course. Hold things steady. This will all work." And the other group of equally serious professionals is saying, "This is much harder than you think it is. You had better rethink your entire strategy."

This is a genuine fight in the intelligence community and a genuine fight at the State and Defense departments. And I think the president, in that sense, has two different camps in the government today over how to do this.

WALLACE: Congresswoman Harman, how do you explain this disparity between the private intelligence estimates that the top officials in the Bush administration are getting and what they're putting out, in this particular case in a report to the Congress and public and statements that the president has made?

HARMAN: Well, first of all, I want to applaud Newt for saying in 2003 that an occupation of Iraq was a bad idea. He criticized Jerry Bremer, who was then there and our Coalition Provisional Authority, for following the wrong strategy. He turned out to be right, as he sometimes is.

(LAUGHTER)

The intelligence is not in equal piles. The intelligence is overwhelmingly negative and has been since the military effort ended. We didn't have a post-war plan. We've made incredible mistakes. And stubbornly, this president sticks to stay the course.

He says there are only two options: stay the course or cut and run. The right option is change the course, protect our troops on the ground. It's almost reckless endangerment, Chris, to have these kids there and have the intelligence say so clearly that they're in harm's way.

WALLACE: But I'm asking a different question, not the question of what the policy should be. How do you explain the fact that the public statements do not reflect the private intelligence?

HARMAN: Well, I think that there's an evidence-free zone in the White House and the top levels of the Pentagon. Regardless of what the intelligence says, regardless of what some of their key inside advisors say, they say something different in public.

WALLACE: All right. I'm going to ask you a question, though, about the situation, Congresswoman Harman. President Bush went after your party and, in fact, you personally the other day. Let's take a look. Here it is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: But, Congresswoman, this week Congress passed a bill authorizing the interrogation and prosecution of terror detainees. And I want you to take a look at the vote count. Let's put it up on the screen. In the House, 82 percent of Democrats, including you, voted against that measure. In the Senate, 32 of 44 senators opposed the measure.

Doesn't the president have a point when he says, "Every time I ask for a tool to fight the terrorists, whether it's the Patriot Act, whether it's warrantless wiretaps, whether it's this bill to handle terror detainees, most Democrats, including yourself, oppose it"?

HARMAN: Let me respond: Bring it on. Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution says Congress shall regulate captures on land and on water. Members of Congress, including me, for five years have been talking to this White House about drafting fair and balanced legislation to deal with this problem. We're all for detaining these guys. We're all for prosecuting them. And I am for, if it's under strict limits, with clear oversight by Congress, treating high-value detainees differently.

But this bill, with the exception of the one piece that John McCain negotiated, is a power shift from Congress and the courts to the White House so that they can do whatever they want. We've just ratified their blank check. And I think it's irresponsible, and I think it's probably unconstitutional.

And they did it in the last week of Congress to put Democrats and some conscientious Republicans in a box so they could cut their 30- second spots for the election.

WALLACE: So, Speaker Gingrich, have they, in fact, put Democrats in a box? And is this now back to the Karl Rove playbook, they're "soft on terrorism"?

GINGRICH: First of all, this was all in response to a Supreme Court decision called Hamdan, in which the administration had to get something passed or they had no authority.

Second, there's a genuine, legitimate disagreement between those people who believe that this is a vicious, brutal war and requires wartime rules and those people who believe you can handle this as a criminal justice matter and have procedures that are more like the criminal justice system.

That's a very significant difference of approach, and it tends to fall into the two parties -- not totally. I think Senator Lieberman, for example, voted for the administration bill.

But the challenge you have I think is going to get worse. There's a French professor today who is in hiding because there are Web sites that show his home and that urge people to go kill him because he wrote an article that criticized Muhammad. Now, we're going to find ourselves in the next four or five years looking at bills involving civil liberties we never dreamed of because our enemies are going to give us no choice.

And I just think we have to confront -- I mean, Jane's right. This is a very important debate about the future of the country. There are two very different approaches to how to do it. And I think what you saw was an honest reflection of the difference between the two parties.

WALLACE: We're going to have to leave it there. Speaker Gingrich, Congresswoman Harman, I want to thank you both for coming in and talking with us today. Pleasure, as always.

Up next, what really was done by two presidents before 9/11 to fight Al Qaida? We'll ask a truth squad we've assembled, right after this break.

WALLACE: Bill Clinton said a lot of things in our interview last week. How much of it was true? Well, we've assembled a panel of experts to discuss just that: Daniel Benjamin, a counterterrorism expert for the Clinton National Security Council; Michael Scheuer, who ran the CIA unit that hunted Osama bin Laden; and Lawrence Wright, author of a behind-the- scenes new book on the run-up to 9/11 called "The Looming Tower."

We should note we invited Richard Clarke, the counterterrorism expert President Clinton mentioned last week, but he declined.

Gentlemen, thank you all for coming today.

Let's start with President Clinton's claim in our interview that he may not have known in 1993 about Osama bin Laden but that, as time went on, he became very knowledgeable about him. Here it is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Did they know in 1996 when he declared war on the U.S.? Did they know in 1998...

W. CLINTON: Absolutely, absolutely...

WALLACE: ... when he bombed the two embassies? Did they know in 2000 when he hit the Cole?

W. CLINTON: What did I do? I worked hard to try to kill him. I authorized the finding for the CIA to kill him. We contracted with people to kill him. I got closer to killing him than anybody's gotten since.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Mr. Scheuer, as the man in charge of what was called "Alec Station," the CIA unit in charge of hunting down Osama bin Laden, you say the Clinton administration missed at least 10 chances to get him. I don't want to go into all 10, but what was the problem?

MICHAEL SCHEUER, FORMER CIA AGENT: Well, the president is correct, in that he got - President Clinton is correct that he got closer than anyone, but, of course, he always refused to pull the trigger. And in addition, we were never authorized, while I was the chief of operations, to kill Osama bin Laden. In fact, Mr. Richard Clarke definitely told us we had no authorization to kill bin Laden.

Why they didn't shoot, of course, is, at least from Mr. Tenet's viewpoint it was because one time they were afraid to have shrapnel hit a mosque when they killed bin Laden. And two other times I think they were afraid they actually would have to do something, so they warned the emirates on one occasion, the princes from the United Arab Emirates, to move so we couldn't attack bin Laden.

WALLACE: They were on a hunting trip with bin Laden.

SCHEUER: Yes, sir. And Richard Clarke called the emirates and warned them that they should get out of that area, which cost us the chance to kill him.

WALLACE: Mr. Benjamin, you were working in the National Security Council at that time. Weren't there a number of cases where the Clinton administration had bin Laden in their sights and refused or failed to pull the trigger?

DAVID BENJAMIN, FORMER MEMBER OF CLINTON'S NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL: Well, as the 9/11 Commission report has shown, the answer to that is no. On three different occasions we had some intelligence that bin Laden might be in a particular place at a particular time, and we had warships off the coast of Pakistan ready to shoot cruise missiles. However, we never got the confirming intelligence.

I have the greatest respect for Mike Scheuer, but on this case I think he's wrong, because, quite simply, we never had enough information to do this with confidence, knowing that we would get the target. And it doesn't help your deterrence and it doesn't help your case if you fire and you don't hit the right person.

WALLACE: Mr. Wright, one of the strongest points I picked out from your book was, you talk a lot about the so-called wall that was barring the sharing of information between the CIA and the FBI. And you say repeatedly that it blocked, it hindered efforts to get bin Laden.

LAWRENCE WRIGHT, AUTHOR: Right. The wall was, to some extent, legal. There was a small legal wall constructed within the FBI between criminal and intelligence agents. But the mythical wall, the nonexistent legal wall, grew up between these cultures, and they naturally decided not to share information. There's a natural jealousy in all intelligence agencies about their information.

WALLACE: But give us one, very briefly, an example of the kind of case where if one side, the FBI, had known what the CIA knew or vice versa, it could have made all the difference.

WRIGHT: Well, in January of 2000, two members of Al Qaida flew from Kuala Lumpur to Los Angeles and then moved to San Diego. In March of 2000, the CIA learned of this, and they didn't tell the FBI. This is a year and a half before 9/11. And once they're in the U.S., they really belong to the FBI.

WALLACE: In our interview, President Clinton was very emphatic that after the attack on the USS Cole in October of 2000, he was ready to go to war. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

W. CLINTON: After the Cole, I had battle plans drawn to go into Afghanistan, overthrow the Taliban, and launch a full-scale attack and search for bin Laden.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Now, Mr. Wright, you say in your book - and I must say I mentioned this to President Clinton in our interview last week - that bin Laden was so sure after the Cole attack that he was going to be hit that he separated, he scattered all of his leaders, but there was no response. Why not?

WRIGHT: Well, they took place 25 days before the general election, for one thing, so it would have been politically difficult.

I think this whole thing about the FBI and the CIA not warranting that Al Qaida did it was done as a kind of "you don't want to know" basis. Because everybody knew Al Qaida did it. And, you know, the intelligence agencies were reporting to the NSC what the FBI guys on the ground in Yemen were finding. They knew that it was Al Qaida in early November. But the leadership of those two agencies wouldn't certify it, in my opinion, because they didn't want the president to have to know that.

WALLACE: Let me ask you about that, Mr. Benjamin, because that was one of the points that President Clinton made in our interview, that it wasn't certified by the FBI and the CIA. Two points about that: One, he's the commander in chief. The CIA and the FBI don't work for - I mean, they work for him, he doesn't work for them. And two, doesn't this get to the whole issue as to whether or not this was viewed as law enforcement or a war?

BENJAMIN: No, I don't think it has anything to do with that. I think it has to do with having a standard of proof that you know that there was outside leadership of Al Qaida directing an attack in Yemen, and could you attack that outside leadership in Afghanistan on that basis? I think it's a very clear issue.

The whole discussion of a law enforcement paradigm versus a war paradigm is, in many ways, just a myth, because the war on terror, if you want to call it that, was conducted in a way before 9/11 that involved an awful lot of intelligence operations that had nothing to do with law enforcement.

This was about being able to say we got the right guys. And it was a very difficult time. It was right before the election. He needed to have proof to justify this kind of attack.

WALLACE: But, Mr. Scheuer, I can see you beginning to shake your head. I mean, whether or not they had certifiable proof about the Cole, they certainly knew that Al Qaida had been involved in the 1998 bombing of the U.S. embassies in Africa. In your opinion, as somebody who was up close and personal, why didn't the Clinton administration go after Al Qaida after the USS Cole?

SCHEUER: Mr. Wallace, my opinion is not all that important. I went to a little Jesuit school in Buffalo called Canicius, and the priests taught us never to lie, but if you had to lie, never lie about facts. Mr. Richard Clarke, Mr. Sandy Berger, President Clinton are lying about the opportunities they had to kill Osama bin Laden. That's the plain truth, the exact truth.

Men and women at the CIA risked their lives to provide occasions to kill a man we knew had declared war and had attacked America four or five times before 1998. We had plans that had been approved by the Joint Operations Command at Fort Bragg. We had opportunities, many opportunities to kill him.

But that's the president's decision. That's absolutely the case. It's not a simple, dumb bureaucrat like me; that's not my decision. It's his. But for him to get on the television and say to the American people he did all he could is a flat lie, sir.

WALLACE: Mr. Benjamin?

BENJAMIN: Well, I simply disagree. The plans that Mike is referring to about being approved were actually disapproved by his own chain of command. The CIA did not have confidence in the operation that was drawn up, and we couldn't go forward with it.

After the attack on the East Africa embassies, the covert operations were restarted, and again the same assets that were being involved earlier proved to be feckless and didn't deliver the goods.

(CROSSTALK)

SCHEUER: ... saying this, that what Mr. Benjamin, who I have a great deal of respect for, but what I say doesn't matter. What matters is the documents that back up what I have to say or what Mr. Benjamin has to say.

The 9/11 Commission ignored those documents, didn't publish them to the American people, let no one involved with the effort to get bin Laden testify to the American people.

This is not a question of interpretation or judgment. This is a question of fact. And the documents will show the president had the opportunity.

WALLACE: All right. I want to get into one last area here, and I'll give you all an opportunity. One of the other issues that I discussed with President Clinton was the transition to the Bush administration in 2001, and here's what President Clinton had to say about that.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

W. CLINTON: At least I tried. That's the difference in me and some, including all of the right-wingers that are attacking me now. They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try. They did not try. I tried.

So I tried and failed. When I failed, I left a comprehensive anti- terror strategy and the best guy in the country, Dick Clarke, who got demoted.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Mr. Benjamin, wasn't the plan that President Clinton talks about there, the plan that Dick Clarke presented to Condi Rice in January of 2001, wasn't that awfully close to the delenda plan, "delenda" being Latin for destruction, which, in fact, he had drawn up in 1998 in the Clinton years and in fact was rejected by the Clinton White House?

BENJAMIN: Well, I was no longer in the administration. My understanding was that it was an elaboration of the original program. And things, of course, had changed because of the bombing of the Cole. This involved elaborate diplomatic approaches to other governments that a new administration needed to take on.

I do think that the key point here is that President Clinton is correct. The administration came into office. They held a meeting immediately on regime change in Iraq. They didn't hold a meeting of the principals of the National Security Council until September 4 on Al Qaida. They didn't take the threat nearly as seriously as their predecessors had, and valuable time was lost.

WALLACE: Mr. Scheuer, you're very critical of President Clinton, as we've seen today, but you also are on the record as saying that President Bush was, quote, "absolutely negligent in his failure to do more in the first eight months."

SCHEUER: Oh, I think that's absolutely the case. And I think that this administration has led us into a tremendously difficult long-term problem, which will be very bloody and costly for Americans.

I think fair is fair, though. Mr. Clarke, Mr. Berger, Mr. Clinton did have opportunities that were delivered by the men and women of the CIA to kill Osama bin Laden. In the first eight months of the Bush administration, there were no such opportunities. Could Bush have done more?

BENJAMIN: He didn't create any either.

SCHEUER: There were no such opportunities.

BENJAMIN: There were no votes (ph)?

SCHEUER: Well, the agency was still in the field. We were still trying to collect information. We didn't know where he was. I'm not saying that what they did or not was right, but the fact is Bush didn't have eyes on target.

WALLACE: Let me bring Mr. Wright into this, as well.

As someone -- and I have read your book -- who has reported this exhaustively for years around the world, after the bombing of the U.S. embassies in Africa, after the attack on the USS Cole, and it's not like the slate gets wiped clean when a new president comes in, why did both presidents fail to appreciate and take more seriously the threat of Al Qaida?

WRIGHT: Well, first of all, they were both poorly served by their intelligence agencies. And this is not a Clinton or a Bush problem; it goes back to Carter. It has been withered for decades under many administrations. And the will to act had also withered along with that.

And so, when it gets down time for Mike -- you know, when Clinton says, "Get him," and Mike is in charge of getting him, he doesn't have the kind of people really available to him. They're trying to hire tribal people who are not CIA employees. They're trying to give them some kind of reward if they capture him. They don't have people that speak natively Arabic and...

WALLACE: I understand that, but wasn't it also failure of will by both presidents?

WRIGHT: I think if they actually had a real moment of having bin Laden in their sights, but the truth is, on each of these occasions, when they had tribals who said they thought that he was there, one time when he was in the governor's house but he actually left, another time when the CIA had mistakenly given information that led to the bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade, and then the best opportunity to get bin Laden arises right after that, and, you know, and Clinton -- and Tenet had a failure of nerve.

In each of these cases, the intelligence was not great. And the reason the intelligence was not great is they didn't have people that were capable of getting inside the tent.

WALLACE: All right. We could talk about this, and I wish we could, talk about this a lot more. And I want to thank you for coming in today and helping us try to set the record straight.

Coming up, our panel of Sunday regulars talks national security: Democrats energized by the Clinton interview, while Republicans pass legislation to handle terror detainees. Stay tuned.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: All the different, you know, finger-pointing and all that business -- I don't have enough time to finger-point.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was just part of the fallout this week from Bill Clinton's energetic interview on "FOX News Sunday." And it's panel time now for our Sunday regulars. Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of FOX News, and FOX News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of "The Weekly Standard," and Juan Williams also from National Public Radio.

Well, I have to say that I am shocked -- not displeased, but shocked - - to see that the Clinton interview continues to have this kind of fallout a week later. But as you just saw from those clips, it seemed to dovetail neatly into the larger national security debate between the Republican and Democratic parties.

At one point this week, we had Secretary of State Rice and Senator Clinton facing off again with each other. Brit, why do you think that the pre-9/11 actions or failures to act are still so politically explosive?

HUME: Because 9/11 is the biggest event of our time. It was a terrible thing, and responsibility for it is something historians will be examining for as long as there are historians. It's just a very big deal.

And for President Clinton, who had a successful, popular presidency during what appeared, at least on the surface, to be a wonderful time in America with a booming stock market and no wars in the world to speak of, this is a terrific threat to the legacy of a president who really had no massive major huge challenges of the kind that make big history.

And what I think he's concerned about -- and understandably so -- is that the big history that will be made about him is that he did nothing serious to abate the greatest threat then facing our country, which then came into fruition on 9/11.

LIASSON: Look, I think it is definitely good politics for the Republican base when Clinton is blamed for pre-11 lapses. I think it's great for the Democratic base when Clinton fights back hard against his detractors. I think one thing we've seen with President Clinton over and over again is, as usual, he gives ammunition to his enemies and heart to his supporters all at the very same time.

And I think when you hear Hillary Rodham Clinton saying, "My husband is right to fight back against these accusations," she is really representing the kind of battle cry of the Democrats this year, which is, "We will not be swift-boated again."

And they feel that they've been unfairly attacked for being weak on national security again and again, and that this year, this election year, is going to be different. And I think it fits perfectly into the bigger debate over national security in a week where you have the president of the United States saying the Democratic Party is the party of cut and run.

This issue is intensely partisan; it's intensely politicized. What you're not hearing anything about in this election campaign is what do we do now, what do we do next, to solve this problem?

WALLACE: You know, I seldom, seldom disagree with you. But you advanced a theory this week that perhaps this whole thing was premeditated by Bill Clinton to rally the Democrats. And I'm not saying you fell into this, but some of your colleagues in the press, a fellow named David Remnick, who seems to be in full Clinton spin cycle, advanced the same theory.

I'm going to reveal something today for the first time, which was that we -- I've mentioned it in the past -- that when the interview was going on, that the press secretary to Bill Clinton was jabbing my producer in the shoulder saying, "End this interview right away. Shut off the cameras."

After he left -- and I said before that he was shouting at his staff in the hall -- in fact, he threatened to fire them if they ever got into this kind of situation again. So premeditated, I don't think so.

KRISTOL: Well, maybe not. I, of course, agree with Hillary Clinton. I admire Bill for standing up to the outrageous assault that you launched on him by daring to ask him about whether he was entirely happy with what he had done to prevent 9/11.

I don't know. He obviously got genuinely angry. I also think that he had stored up these arguments, and he wanted to lay them out. He thought there was an advantage to defending his legacy, to trying to intimidate journalists from asking this question in the future. That was what was going on there. I do think that's true.

He may have been genuinely angry, but he thought -- he didn't intimidate you, but he thought if he could intimidate others from raising the whole issue of his administration's actions and failures to act prior to 9/11 and, therefore, in a sense, to prevent -- to almost make the whole discussion about which party is better on terror, make that sort of illegitimate. Put it out of bounds.

We had a vote this past week. Obviously, the two parties differed on this particular issue of how to treat detainees. The Democratic talking point isn't to defend their position. It's to say, "Well, this is politically an illegitimate debate," almost. I think that's what Clinton was trying to do.

WILLIAMS: What strikes me is that whenever we question -- have questions about President Bush's conduct pre-9/11, people say, "Well, why politicize that? You know, we're all struggling, we're all trying to get it done." But when it comes to discussions of President Clinton's role, it's apparently fair game to go after Clinton. I think that's a double standard. And I think that's what Clinton, in part, is reacting to.

It's interesting to me -- I saw a Gallup Poll this week that asked the American people, "Who do you think is more responsible for the failure to capture bin Laden or kill bin Laden?" And the answer is like 53 percent. It's President Bush, not Bill Clinton.

And, yet, the emphasis -- and I think this is something Clinton said to you in a challenging way -- the emphasis is always on what Clinton hasn't done as opposed to what Bush didn't do. And so all those questions, it seems to me, reside on Bush's watch, and yet the emphasis coming from the right wing has been, maybe astutely so, to attack Clinton and undermine Clinton going forward.

HUME: Until, Chris, Clinton sat for this round of interviews -- and, by the way, it's not clear to me, Bill, that any intimidation of journalists were needed to avoid that question because Chris, after all, despite the fact that a number of other media celebrities interviewed him, was the only one who asked the question, as you've noted. The question was very mildly worded.

I must tell you, Juan, I haven't been listening and hearing much of many, many attacks in recent times about the Clinton record on this. It's kind of -- until he came out and this all happened, it wasn't being talked about.

WILLIAMS: What about "The Path to 9/11," that ABC movie?

HUME: Well, that was fictionalized history.

WILLIAMS: What about Rush Limbaugh literally days after in the pages of the "Wall Street Journal"?

HUME: Well, they made a big deal out of trying to suppress that documentary. What I'm saying to you is that the national debate as you see it played out here in Washington and day in and day out in the pages of the news media has not much been about the Clinton record pre-9/11.

Most people, I think, in the country felt that after the 9/11 Commission report came out that that whole pre-9/11 question had been reviewed, authoritatively, nobody was covered with glory, and ended.

WALLACE: Let me, if I can -- because everybody keeps saying -- we keep going back into this, but everybody says, "Let's talk about the present and the future." There was another big development on the national security front this week, Mara.

Congress passed this terror detainee bill that, as I pointed out to Congresswoman Harman, 80-plus percent of Democrats in the House opposed the Bill; 3/4 of Democrats in the Senate opposed the bill. Have they once again opened themselves up to Karl Rove's attack line, they're soft on terror?

LIASSON: Well, the attack lines are happening all over the country now regardless of how Democrats in the majority voted on these bills. I do think two things are happening. One, Democrats feel as a whole that these attacks are not as potent as they were in the past because of what's happening in Iraq.

I think on the other hand, when you look at who voted for it, it's Democrats in tight races. So Democrats in tight races in general voted with the president. But on the whole, as you said, a majority of Democrats voted against it. And I don't think they're as worried as they were in the past. They chose not to filibuster. They clearly chose not to make this some kind of a huge fight, but they're not as afraid of those attacks as they were in the past.

WALLACE: Real quickly, Bill.

KRISTOL: I think they should be worried. This was a vote. You know, as Mara said, people attack each other all the time. Here we have a vote on the record, more than 3/4 of Democrats voting against tough interrogation techniques for detainees. I think the Republicans -- it genuinely illustrates the difference and understanding on how to fight the war on terror between the two parties. It was an actual, recorded vote in both houses of Congress.

WILLIAMS: Let me just say very quickly, there's a 14th Amendment in our Constitution that requires equal treatment under law for all Americans.

HUME: Enemy combatants? Battlefield detainees?

WILLIAMS: We should apply it in a way that keeps with our morals, Brit. We are Americans. We have a different standard than the terrorists, and I don't want to go down to the terrorists' standard.

HUME: When we had several hundred thousand prisoners held here with no trial of any kind during the Second World War, were we an immoral nation then?

WILLIAM: I think we had a challenge then, we had a different situation. We were fighting a clear enemy state. We're fighting terrorists now.

WALLACE: We need to take a break here, but we're going to continue this conversation. And also coming up, the new Bob Woodward book and that leaked national intelligence estimate. How does it all fit into the fall campaign? We'll ask the panel when we come back.

WALLACE: On this day in 1908, the Model T Ford was introduced to the American public as a reliable car for the average American. Better known as the Tin Lizzie, the Model T helped put America on the road. Stay tuned for more from our panel.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TONY SNOW, WHITE HOUSE PRESS SECRETARY: In a lot of ways, the books are like cotton candy. It kind of melts on contact.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), HOUSE MINORITY LEADER: The president failed on all of those scores, and he has become Mr. Rosy-Scenario.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was White House Press Secretary Tony Snow and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi reacting to Bob Woodward's new book called "State of Denial." And we're back now with Brit, Mara, Bill and Juan.

Well, as we've been saying, Woodward has written another book just in time for the fall campaign, and it is interesting. He says the president has been far more optimistic about Iraq in public than the secret intelligence he's getting.

And he also says that everybody, just about, in the Bush administration except the president and the vice president -- those are two pretty big exceptions -- was fed up and wanted Don Rumsfeld out. Brit, your thoughts about what we know about the book so far.

HUME: Well, I haven't had -- don't have the book, haven't read the book. I just read some of the excerpts. It's not all that much to go on. My guess is that most of what's reported in the book is right. Bob Woodward is a careful reporter, and he probably -- the facts as stated are probably correct.

The question is whether they fit into an overall pattern of the kind he describes, and that's where I think it's probably more subject to challenge. And there are obviously some details in there, the question, for example, of whether a request for more troops by Paul Bremer was disregarded, it turns out, perhaps, not to be so.

But on balance, is this administration and this president in what the book calls a state of denial about the situation in Iraq? I don't think so. I think that no one is more aware of the difficulties there than the president and those around him.

The question they face is, of course, whether you try to see this through, believing, as Henry Kissinger is quoted in the book as saying, victory is the only exit strategy, or whether you try to figure out a way to get the heck out of there. So I think that's what it comes down to.

WALLACE: Mara, when you take this and you add it to what the national intelligence estimate that was partially leaked last Sunday and then more of it was disclosed this week by the president, which again seems to indicate that the president is receiving more negative, grimmer private intelligence than perhaps what he's saying to the American public, is that a problem for him, and is it an avenue of attack for the Democrats?

LIASSON: I think it is, because I think what the White House has been trying to do is to kind of de-link Iraq from the war on terror. The war on terror is where, politically, they're firmer on ground. But I think the NIE and the Woodward book re-links it again in a negative way.

It adds up to an impression that, gee, the Iraq war is going badly, more badly than we thought or more badly than the administration is telling you. Now, that clearly can be used as ammunition for the Democrats.

It doesn't suggest the solution. Does it suggest that we should get out? Not necessarily. Maybe it merely suggests we should try to figure out a better plan for being victorious there, because if we're not, whether we fail or whether we get out, the results will be disastrous.

WALLACE: Bill?

KRISTOL: The Bush administration has not tried to de-link Iraq and the war on terror. The president says in every speech that Iraq is a central front in the war on terror. The question is, are we doing everything we should be doing to win in Iraq?

I think the American people -- the FOX poll shows this -- they want to win in Iraq, and they will support changes in strategy to win in Iraq. What they won't support, I think, is a sense that we're just hunkering down, we're going to try to tough it out, and that the president is not open to rethinking strategy and tactics.

But if he can -- the president can make clear that if he gets a Republican Congress, he's going to pursue the war on terror on all fronts, whether it's detainees or Iraq or Iran, that we're fighting one jihadist enemy, and that he's willing to rethink tactics where they're not working. I think he gets support. If it becomes a president who's hunkered down, not listening to criticism, then he's in trouble.

WILLIAMS: Well, that's the problem. He's been hunkered down. And people have a sense that he is detached, in a bubble, however you want to put it, and hasn't been listening.

Now, the president was on a roll, and I think Republicans were doing better approaching the midterms over the last several weeks. I don't think there's any question about that. You saw his numbers bump up, not anything great, but over 40 percent, where it wasn't going to quite be the drag on Republican candidates.

But with the NIE and now the Woodward book, the conversation has shifted back from war on terror, where the president is strong, as Mara was saying, and back clearly to this ground that's so controversial where you have 2/3 of the American people saying, "It's wrong, it's a mistake. We don't like this policy."

KRISTOL: Wait, wait, wait. But the NIE says getting out of Iraq would be disastrous.

WALLACE: You know what, guys? We could talk about this forever. And we'll talk about it next week. But before we leave -- and we've got a couple of minutes left -- I want to talk about the Mark Foley scandal. Mara, you're the one who spent the most time covering -- and there's two issues: what Foley did, and perhaps most importantly, the issue of what the House Republican leaders did or failed to do.

LIASSON: Right. I think the question now is how this affects the midterms. That's what people are talking about. Foley's seat, which was considered to be his -- it's a competitive seat, but he was going to win -- now, I think, might be a potential loss to the Republicans.

There's another seat that's affected, which is Tom Reynolds, the head of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, who now is at war with Dennis Hastert about how soon the speaker's office actually knew about this problem. Reynolds is in a very tight race of his own in upstate New York. That also could be hurt.

WALLACE: Brit, bigger issue here. Does this feed into a sense that, certainly at least the Democrats are arguing, that it shows an arrogant Republican majority that, you know, is more concerned about incumbency than about, in this particular case, protecting kids?

HUME: It is serious misbehavior on the part of Congressman Foley. Whether it stems from some overall arrogance or just the weakness of the human flesh is another question.

It's probably worth noting here that there's a difference between the two parties on these issues. Inappropriate behavior towards subordinates didn't cost Gerry Studs his Democratic seat in Massachusetts, nor Barney Frank his.

Nor did inappropriate behavior toward a subordinate even cost Bill Clinton his standing within the Democratic Party, even though indirectly, he was impeached for it. Mark Foley found out about this, was found out to have done this, and he's out of office and in total disgrace in his party.

WILLIAMS: It took him long enough, don't you think?

HUME: What do you mean?

WILLIAMS: Well, gee, they knew about it way back. No action taken. That's the question.

HUME: We don't know.

(CROSSTALK)

HUME: It is worth noting that we don't yet know exactly what they knew and when they knew it. Obviously, we'll find out this week.

WILLIAMS: Well, there's an argument among Republicans that have a very different time record here for what Hastert is saying.

WALLACE: All right, guys. You can take it outside afterward. Thank you, panel. That's it for today. See you next week.

Time for some mail. And we received the most ever, more than 4,000 e- mails, about our interview with former President Clinton. Here's a sample.

Anne Hilton from Massachusetts writes, "Chris Wallace was rude and out of line, and it was completely inappropriate of him to ask Bill Clinton about Al Qaeda and 9/11 before talking about Clinton's global initiative."

From Mike Murray in Kansas, "Why is Clinton so defensive? I would think that if you did all you could to get bin Laden, you would not get so angry when questioned about it."

From Drew Wheeler in California: "You were shamed by the president, and you deserved to be. He made a very valid point."

From David Holtkamp in New Mexico: "Thank you for showing more grace and restraint than President Clinton did. Anyone who disagrees with him is obviously part of the vast right-wing conspiracy."

And Denny Delk in California sees a marketing opportunity. "I would like to place my order for the Chris Wallace action figure with the kung-fu conservative smirk. I'll be able to use it with my Bill Clinton doll to re-enact the exciting adventure." Denny, you need to get out more. Be sure to let us know your thoughts by e-mailing us at fns@FOXnews.com.

Up next, some final thoughts about the week that was around here.

WALLACE: Well, it's been quite a week. While I was still interviewing Bill Clinton, I thought, "I've got a heck of a story here." But even I'm surprised just how big it became. A couple of points. First, President Clinton questioned whether we ever asked officials in the Bush administration what they did before 9/11. Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: What I want to know, how many people in the Bush administration you asked this question of. You didn't ask that, did you? Tell the truth, Chris. Tell the truth, Chris.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: The problem is, at my age, I can't remember what I had for lunch yesterday. But we checked. And sure enough, on the week that Clinton counter-terrorism advisor Richard Clarke spoke to the 9/11 Commission and apologized to families of the victims, we had Defense Secretary Rumsfeld on. Here's how that went.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Do you think it would be appropriate for someone in the administration from the president on down to consider making a similar statement to the families? What do you make of his basic charge that pre- 9/1 that this government, the Bush administration, largely ignored the threat from Al Qaeda? It sure sounds like fighting terrorism was not a top priority.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: And that's point one. This is what we do every week on "FOX News Sunday," get the best guests we can, Republican, Democrat or vegetarian, and ask them tough, probing questions about the most important and interesting subjects of the day.

Then, there were the hundreds of emails we got before the interview even ran. If you like Bill Clinton, I was a jerk. If you dislike him, I was a hero. Respectfully, I think both sides missed the point. When we ask questions, we are not pushing a cause or expressing an opinion. We're trying to cut through all the talking points these politicians have, all their handlers, to get them off their script and telling you what they really think. It's a shame when a question to anyone is attacked as a hit job.

And that's it for today. Have a great week. And we'll see you next "FOX News Sunday."

CBS – FACE THE NATION

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:
Today on FACE THE NATION, another Bob Woodward bombshell. He says flatly the Bush administration has hidden the truth about Iraq from the American people. Is he right or wrong? We'll hear some of his interview with Mike Wallace, and we'll get the other side from one of the president's top aides.

The accusations come in Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," in which he not only questions that administration line on Iraq, but says top officials also ignored warnings that the attack on 9/11 was coming. We'll ask Joe Biden, the ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, to assess that, and we'll hear from the president's counselor Dan Bartlett.

Then, in my final word, I'll shift to some good news. Andy Rooney is spouting off again.Well, some would call it good news. In any case, we'll have it.

But first, Iraq, the White House and Bob Woodward on FACE THE NATION.

Announcer: FACE THE NATION with CBS News chief Washington correspondent Bob Schieffer. And now, from CBS News in Washington, Bob Schieffer.

SCHIEFFER: And good morning again.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:

The president's top communications man, Dan Bartlett, will be here in a minute to talk about all this. But before we get to him, we want to get a Democrat's view of this. Senator Joe Biden, of course, is the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Senator JOSEPH BIDEN (Democrat, Delaware; Member, Foreign Relations Committee): Hey, Bob.

SCHIEFFER: He's with us this morning.

And Senator, before we talk about Iraq and what's going on there, I want to ask you about another passage in this book, because Bob Woodward says that in 2001, in July--that is before the attacks on 9/11--the CIA director George Tenet and his top counterterrorism man, Cofer Black, asked for basically an emergency appointment with Condoleezza Rice, the president's national security adviser, and they told her that they believed that al-Qaeda was going to attack us in this country.

Sen. BIDEN: Yes.

SCHIEFFER: Now as far as I know, this was not known about until Bob Woodward published this book. I want to ask you, did you know about this as the top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee? And what do you make of this?

Sen.BIDEN: Bob, I didn't know about it. There are all kinds of rumors of that effect.But it raises two really important questions. If that meeting really did take place, why didn't Condie Rice or George Tenet tell the 9/11 Commission about that? They were obliged to do that, and they didn't. And the second thing it raises is if they left us unprotected there, it forces us to focus now. I mean, the 9/11 Commission report is out there telling us what we have to do to protect ourselves, and this administration's done virtually nothing to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 report. So the real scandal will be if, God forbid, we're attacked again, why did they sit on their hands for the last three years and not do anything about chemical plants, not do anything about the number of other things that the 9/11 Commission report urgently says we have to do?

SCHIEFFER: Well, apparently this meeting was not known about by the 9/11 Commission. You said, if I understood you, you did not know about it.

Sen. BIDEN: Correct.

SCHIEFFER: It's hard to see what happened here, because Tenet and Cofer Black say...

Sen. BIDEN: No.

SCHIEFFER: ...according to this book, that they went away from this meeting feeling that they had been, basically, ignored and brushed off.

Sen. BIDEN: Well, I think there's a lot of evidence of that in other meetings as well, and subsequent meetings. But the point here is that if this, in fact, did occur, and take Woodward at his word that he has proof that it did occur, then Dr. Rice, Secretary of State Rice, did not meet her obligation to the 9/11 Commission, and George Tenet did not meet his obligation. They were obliged to tell the 9/11 Commission when they're investigating, of all relevant meetings that took place, relevant to the attack on 9/11.This sure sounds relevant to me. Why did they not do that?

SCHIEFFER: Now, Dan Bartlett, the president's communications chief who'll be here in a minute, says--and he said it again this morning on another broadcast--that the president retains confidence in Don Rumsfeld, the secretary of defense. Woodward's book, over and over, says that Rumsfeld, at many times, is at odds with other members of the administration. It even goes so far as to say that Andy Card, then the president's chief of staff, tried on several occasions to have Rumsfeld replaced. What do you know about that?

Sen.BIDEN: Well, that's my understanding as well. Bob, I was on your program right after Abu Ghraib.I called for Rumsfeld's resignation. I went down to the White House to meet with the president and the vice president in the Oval Office. The president said to me, quote, "Why you keep picking on Rummy?" I looked at the president, I said, `Mr. President, with all due respect,' and I looked at the vice president, `Mr. Vice President, I would call for your recommen--your resignation as well were you not a constitutional officer.' And the president said, `Why would you say that?' And I said, `Mr. President, not one piece of advice either Don Rumsfeld or Dick Cheney has given you has turned out to be correct with regard to Iraq.' And the president just seemed completed wedded to the notion.

But it's way beyond Rumsfeld now. Rumsfeld's resignation is almost irrelevant now. The issue is what is the president of the United States going to do about changing direction and policy in Iraq? He obviously has bought onto Rumsfeld and Cheney's notion. He's rejected the notion of everyone else in this administration--not everyone, others with a different view. It's the president's responsibility.He's got to change. Staying the course and saying we're not going to stand down till the Iraqi troops stand up, when the issue is getting them to stand together. There's 600,000-plus armed troops in Iraq, Bob, 600,000 trained. And there's more violence.

SCHIEFFER: Did you--did you just say that you would've called for the president's recommendation, had that been constitutionally possible, when you called for...

Sen. BIDEN: Yeah.

SCHIEFFER: You told the president that to his face?

Sen.BIDEN: I told the president, with Dick Cheney right there. I was straightforward. And I--and it's not...

SCHIEFFER: What did they say?

Sen.BIDEN: They just looked at me like I was crazy. I mean, look, it--this isn't about--it's not personal. When the president asked me why, I said, `Can you name me one piece of advice, with all due respect, Mr. President, one piece of advice you've gotten on a major issue relating to Iraq from the vice president or from the secretary of defense that's turned out to be correct?'

SCHIEFFER: Well, Senator Biden, are you saying--would--do you think the president ought to resign?

Sen. BIDEN: No, no, not--I didn't say the president, the vice president.

SCHIEFFER: Oh, the vice president.

Sen. BIDEN: I said to the president, I said--I said--I said to him, `With all due respect, Mr. President,' and I looked over at Dick Cheney, and I said, `Mr. Vice President, I not only call for Rumsfeld's resignation, were you not a constitutional officer, I would suggest you resign.' I didn't mean he literally should resign, I was making the point.

SCHIEFFER: I understand. Well, do you think he ought to resign?

Sen. BIDEN: That there is just no...

SCHIEFFER: Do you think the vice president ought to resign?

Sen. BIDEN: No, no, no, no.

SCHIEFFER: OK.

Sen. BIDEN: I was making--I was making the point that these guys...

SCHIEFFER: OK.

Sen.BIDEN: ...just don't know what they're doing. And no one takes them seriously anymore, except the president, apparently.

SCHIEFFER: The president said the Democratic Party, and I will quote here, "the party of Roosevelt and Truman has now become the party of cut-and-run."

Sen. BIDEN: No.

SCHIEFFER: And he says Democrats offer "nothing but criticism and obstruction and endless second-guessing." True or false?

Sen.BIDEN: That is absolutely not true.Absolutely false. I've been on your show today and the lead editorial in the Philadelphia Inquirer, in every major newspaper in America, I've offered a detailed plan, I've gone down and talked about it.Everyone knows we need a political settlement here, Bob. My plan--and many Democrats have embraced, and many Democratic candidates embraced--says you got to give breathing room to the Kurds, the Shia and the Sunnis, with a federal city called Baghdad, let them have their own regions within this federation, give the Sunnis a piece of the oil and have an American force stay in--over the horizon to keep the neighbors from interfering.That's a political solution.You may disagree with it. An awful lot of people agree. But it is an offer of a reasonable way we could responsibly take our troops home.

The president is, I think, wallowing now in a--in a combination of--there's--within the administration, Bob, and all your sources, ask them--they are completely at odds with one another, they have no idea what to do next. As I said, there's 600,000-plus trained forces by us, counting our forces, things are getting worse and worse, it's spiraling out of hand. There's a political solution needed, and the president is doing nothing, nothing, nothing about it. He is the one who should cut the old program and run on a new program.No one is cut and run. Nobody in the Democratic Party has called for the immediate withdrawal of those forces. We're calling for some sanity and recognition of reality. There's a civil war spiraling out of control and all the king's horses and all the king's men will not be able to hold Iraq together if it becomes a full-blown civil war. There's a need for a political solution.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, Senator Biden, I think that's a good point to stop.

Sen. BIDEN: Thank you.

SCHIEFFER: And when we come back, we'll get what the White House thinks about all of this and what you've just said. Dan Bartlett will be here, next.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host: And with us now, Dan Bartlett, the counselor to President Bush in the studio with us this morning.

Well, you just heard Senator Biden, he left you several things to talk about. But let me go first, Mr. Bartlett, to this July 10 meeting in 2001 where according to Bob Woodward, George Tenet, the head of the CIA asked for what amounted to an emergency meeting with Condoleezza Rice. They kind of called her on the way and said, `We've got to see you.'

Mr. DAN BARTLETT (Counselor to the President): Mm-hmm.

SCHIEFFER: And they said that they feared there was an attack coming by al-Qaeda in this country. How would you characterize that meeting?

Mr. BARTLETT: Well, Bob, we were very surprised to see the account in this book because it really didn't match Secretary Rice's recollection of the--of the meeting at all. In fact, these very vivid accounts we're hearing from, allegedly from Cofer Black and from George Tenet were not shared with the 9/11 Commission. As we all know, that eight months of the president's presidency was one of the most investigated eight months of any presidency because of 9/11. And nowhere over the last several years have these quotes showed up? These people testified under sworn testimony? So I--we find it to be puzzling to see some sort of quote like this. I talked to Secretary Rice this morning. She disputes it, vigorously.

SCHIEFFER: Well, what does she say happened?

Mr. BARTLETT: Well, she said there were ongoing conversations about general threat levels, as we've testified to the 9/11 Commission about. We were taking actions to do everything we could to protect the country, but what we know now, Bob, is that all of government could've done a better job before 9/11. We had serious gaps in our capabilities, both intelligence and law enforcement to stop the type of attack that we had today. So I must say, we've--we're puzzled by this. No one has seen these type of quotes before. Each of these participants went before the commission and testified.

SCHIEFFER: Well...

Mr. BARTLETT: So it kind of leaves us scratching her head because we don't believe that's an accurate account.

SCHIEFFER: Did the White House tell the 9/11 Commission that this meeting in fact, took place? I mean, did they have the information that there was such a meeting?

Mr. BARTLETT: Well, I'm pretty sure that the 9/11 Commission knew about all the conversations that Secretary Rice had.They went through calendars. They went through meetings.They went through dockets. They went through intelligence. As you recall, this was a very, very scrutinized period of time in the Bush presidency.

SCHIEFFER: Sure.

Mr. BARTLETT: So it is kind of--leaves you scratching your head a little bit to see these type of vivid quotes from a meeting that hasn't showed up in the last four years.

SCHIEFFER: Well, you say she disputes these quotes, but does she have any recollection herself of what she said at that meeting? Does she remember the meeting specifically?

Mr. BARTLETT: She does remember a meeting--this meeting and other meetings that they had where they were talking generalized about the threats and about what we're doing. But the suggestion in this is that they asked for a very specific plan to go after bin Laden, we knew an attack on America was going to happen. That is just not how she recalls it whatsoever, and none of the evidence, as shown, in the 9/11 Commission book, says otherwise. And I know Bob in the book says, "Well, the 9/11"--Cofer Black said, "the 9/11 Commission didn't want to hear all the facts." Well, I think anybody who followed that report, they looked under every stone, they penetrated every piece of intelligence and gave what was a very critical report of the administration and the Clinton administration about what hadn't happened. So I'm very skeptical about that.

SCHIEFFER: What do you think, he just made this up?

Mr.BARTLETT: I just don't know. Like I said, it leaves us, somewhat puzzled.

SCHIEFFER: Let me just ask you about the general tenor of Bob Woodward's book, and, and that is that the administration simply did not tell the truth about what was really happening in Iraq, almost from the beginning. And he cites it in these statistics now about 900 attacks. He talks about how when the White House was saying things were getting better, that in fact they had information, secret reports, telling him they were getting worse.

Mr. BARTLETT: And that part of the critique is one that really I must say after reading the book the last two days is not really backed up by the own evidence in Bob's book.And for example, take the 900 attacks daily. If you open up the New York Times today, the Brookings does these--based on governmental reports--these charts saying exactly the type of violence there's been.

The president himself in more than one occasion has been very blunt with the American people about the challenges in Iraq. Last year and early part of this year, he gave a series of speeches where we talked about how we're constantly adapting our strategies, where we had to fix things on reconstruction, on training Iraqi security forces. So I think the president--I know the president has been very blunt with the American people about the challenges we face in Iraq. We've given that information.

And if you just take a step back, Bob, I think you can look at the fact no American out there doesn't understand the violence in Iraq. We see it every night on our TV screens and every day we wake up and read the papers. Everybody knows it's tough. The president...

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me just show you something...

Mr. BARTLETT: Sure.

SCHIEFFER: ...Mr.Bartlett. Here the, the Washington Post this morning puts out a--basically a full-page, and where they go down the line here and say, you know--well let me just take one for example.

Mr. BARTLETT: Sure.

SCHIEFFER: It says, "On March 16th, 2003 Vice President Cheney told Tim Russert to suggest we need several hundred thousand troops there after military operations cease" I don't think is accurate. I think that's overstatement. But a month, or two months--well, a month before that, in February of 2003 it says that CENTCOM, that's the commanders, showed that estimates that it would take 450,000 US troops to occupy Iraq based on the experience in Bosnia. Now the president's always said, `I depend on my military commanders.'

Mr. BARTLETT: Mm-hmm.

SCHIEFFER: `If he tells me we need more people, we send them.' Well, that seems to be what they were telling him, and yet the administration was saying, `We don't need all those people.'

Mr.BARTLETT: Actually that's not the case, Bob. The General Tommy Franks was the commander of CENTCOM, came forward with a plan with--for the president. One of the big mischaracterizations, or at least one of the things we learned after the fact was that our overestimation on the Iraqi security forces themselves, the Iraqi army, that they would stay and be relatively intact, and if you removed the Saddam loyalists from the top that they would be there and able to supply order and civility to the streets. Quite frankly that didn't happen, and is one of the things that you learn during a war is that some things you anticipate don't happen and some of the things you do anticipate do happen. In this case we felt there was going to be a much more intact security force provided by the Iraqis, and that didn't materialize, and we've had to adapt to that, and we have adapted.

I think one of the things if you read the book...

SCHIEFFER: But maybe, maybe the CENTCOM people anticipated something like that was going to happen and that's why they said you needed 450,000 troops.

Mr. BARTLETT: Well, the CENTCOM was run by General Tommy Franks, and General Tommy Franks was repeatedly asked the question by this president.

SCHIEFFER: So you're just saying that's false?

Mr. BARTLETT: I am in the sense that if you're saying that the president...

SCHIEFFER: That there was no such intelligence report?

Mr. BARTLETT: ...well, the president didn't--the president did not reject advice from the CENTCOM--from the central command or from Tommy Franks for more troops and they didn't get it. At every step of the way, the president has given the commanders what they wanted.

Quite frankly, the politically expedient thing to do these days in the last few years has been to draw down the troops. That's what apparently so many critics here in Washington have claimed we should do. The president has resisted that because the commanders on the ground are asking for strengthened number of troop levels. And General Abizaid has said we're going to keep the current strength level through the spring of 2007, reflecting the fact that the president, more than anybody else, understands the realities of what's happening in Iraq and is sharing those realities with the American people, regardless of the political consequences.

SCHIEFFER: In another book that is hitting the stands this week...

Mr. BARTLETT: It's the season for books.

SCHIEFFER: ...Secretary of State Powell, former Secretary of State Powell, talks about how in his last meeting with the president, he tried to warn him about what was ahead in Iraq. And it--he seems--the book says that the president didn't seem to respond to that, that he didn't seem to understand what he was saying. What do you know about that?

Mr. BARTLETT: Well, I don't know about the specific occurrence, and I haven't read this book, I'm still working on the book that is about to hit the bookstands. But, Bob, I think the point I would want to make to you is that every day the president gets the full story about what's happening in Iraq. He understands the challenges. He understands the forces of evil that are working in that country to try to prevent us from helping Iraq succeed. He understands mistakes there. He understands that sectarian violence is a serious problem that has to be dealt with. But he remains optimistic, and--about the strategy in Iraq. He remains optimistic that we have to win in Iraq.He understands the consequences of failure. And Senator Joe Biden and others--and I must say, Senator Biden had a lot to say, somebody who's declared that he's going to run for president. Obviously he's going to have a lot of political ambition to make those points. But the Democratic Party across the board has adopted a position that is more about getting out than winning.

SCHIEFFER: All right, let me just, before you go, because we're out of time, and I have to ask you. A lot of this book places a lot of the blame on Secretary Rumsfeld. It says he couldn't get along with anybody very much in the administration, wouldn't return Condoleezza Rice's phone calls. Several things, that he should resign, that Andy Card wanted him to resign. Where are you, and where is the president right now on Don Rumsfeld?

Mr.BARTLETT: Well, I'll make a point first before I get to that. The fact that people aren't returning phone calls is silly.

SCHIEFFER: OK.

Mr. BARTLETT: Secretary Rice and Don Rumsfeld, they talk every morning, they return phone calls. I think people are conflating the difference between having differences of opinion and dysfunction. The president has confidence in Don Rumsfeld, he's the right man to do this job. It's a very difficult job, there are a lot of second--armchair quarterbacks, but he's the right man.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Thank you very much, Dan.

Mr. BARTLETT: You're welcome.

SCHIEFFER: Back with a final word in just a minute.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host: Finally today, the politicians are always asking why we don't report the good news. Well, I'm ready to do just that. The politicians won't like it, because this good news is not about them. But the good news is that Andy Rooney has written a new book of original essays called "Out of My Mind," and it is one of the funniest, wisest books I've ever read. The bad news is I started reading it last night when I should have been writing my commentary to end this broadcast. I couldn't stop. I fell asleep with a smile on my face, but I awoke with no commentary, which leaves me no choice but to quote from Andy's book.

You know it's Andy talking when early on he ponders how much the earth weighs. Who but Andy would care? When he discovered there are two million American men in prison and only 100,000 women, who but Andy would wonder if that is because women are just more honest, or just smarter and don't get caught? Who but Andy would question the conventional wisdom that we grow wiser with age? He says that if we noticed how our face changes, or the shape of our feet as we age, who of us would argue an old brain is as agile as it was when we were 21? I can certainly relate to that.

Actually, I have mixed feelings about telling you to buy this book. If no one buys it, I can keep cribbing from it when I have nothing much to say and a deadline is near, like today. Being a writer, Andy can relate to that. Now, isn't this the part where that stopwatch starts ticking?

BLITZER: An explosive new book by journalist Bob Woodward claims a White House dysfunctional and divided over Iraq. White House counselor Dan Bartlett responds in an interview. Plus, reaction to the book and a controversial intelligence report on the war in Iraq from two key members of the Senate foreign relations committee, Republican Chairman Richard Lugar and Democrat Chris Dodd. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "Late Edition." We'll get to my interview with the U.S. Ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, in just a moment.

First, though, let's get a quick check with what's in the news right now. CNN's Fredricka Whitfield standing by. Fred?

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much. We'll get to the U.S. ambassador in Iraq in a moment. First, an update on a major scandal unfolding in the United States right now. Republican Congressman Mark Foley of Florida forced to resign over allegations he sent sexually suggestive e-mail to a 16-year-old boy, a former Congressional page, and House Republicans are taking heat for the handling of the scandal. Our Congressional correspondent, Dana Bash, is following this still developing story. Lots of fallout here in Washington, Dana.

DANA BASH, CNN CONGRESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT: That's for sure, Wolf. And you know, yesterday, all day long GOP leadership aides huddled in the Capitol. They're trying to explain their own conduct in the Mark Foley scandal.

And what we found out is that three Republican leaders knew months ago, last spring, about one questionable e-mail exchange between Foley and a former page. Now, one of those leaders is House Speaker Dennis Hastert, who had to issue a correction of sorts. Now, top Hastert aides insisted to CNN Friday that Hastert knew nothing about any questionable Foley conduct until late last week.

But yesterday, Congressman Tom Reynolds of New York revealed he actually knew about one incident a few months ago, last spring, and brought it to the speaker's attention in the spring. Now, Hastert says he has no reason to dispute that, but insists he, quote, "does not explicitly recall this conversation."

The question isn't, though, just when did they know about this. It's what did they do about it. And Republican leaders say GOP representatives on the page board, the House page board, confronted Foley and told him to cease contact with the young man and to be mindful of his conduct with pages. And allegedly, Foley then promised that he would do so.

So the GOP leadership maintains they investigated one incident that they knew about. But one Democrat on the House page board, the only Democrat on that board, says he knew nothing about any of this. Democrat Dale Kildee said, quote, "I was never informed of the allegations about Mr. Foley's inappropriate communications with a House page, and I was never involved in any inquiry into this matter." So even after spending 36 hours trying to coordinate statements, they're still, Wolf, facing intense criticism, especially from Democrats, who say this is not the way to investigate. It is not appropriate to keep this an internal Republican matter, something that could be potentially this serious.

BLITZER: And right now, I guess the Republicans are being very, very harsh on now former Congressman Foley.

BASH: They are. You know, we should point out that what Republican leaders insist is that they didn't know really anything about the much more explicit e-mails, instant messages, I should say, that came out on Friday night that really forced Foley's resignation. But right now, what they do know and what they are trying to do is try to make the point that what he did, what Foley did, was, quote, "unacceptable and abhorrent."

And what GOP leadership said in a statement yesterday is that there should be the full weight of the criminal justice system forced on Foley. And they're taking new measures to protect pages in the future, setting up a toll-free number, for example, for pages and family members to call with complaints and concerns. But, Wolf, there is a fair amount of eye-rolling, if you will, about this, because this is perhaps another example, many people out there will say, of members of Congress treating themselves differently from how average citizens would be treated.

Remember a few months ago, Patrick Kennedy, for example, he had a DUI incident, and he wasn't given the same treatment by Capitol police that others might have been. So, this is going to probably raise other questions about how members of Congress are treated versus average citizens.

BLITZER: And we're going to be speaking much more about this with Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor, also the two key senators who will be joining us. I suspect this sandal only just beginning here in Washington. Dana, thanks very much for that. Much more on this story coming up later on "Late Edition."

But now let's move to the war in Iraq. President Bush trying to reassure an uneasy American public about the situation in Iraq, but he isn't getting much cooperation from the actual developments on the ground. The country is struggling with brutal sectarian violence, and new polls indicate Iraqis are growing increasingly wary of the U.S. military presence in their country.

Just a short while ago, I spoke with the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Mr. Ambassador, thanks very much for joining us. Welcome back to "Late Edition." Lots going on in Iraq, as is always the case. Let's begin with some assertions in Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial." One section suggesting that next year, 2007, is going to be even worse than potentially this year, 2006. He quotes -- he writes this in the book:

"Wednesday, May 24th," of this year, "the intelligence division of the Joint Staff, J-2, circulated an intelligence assessment classified "secret" that showed that the forces in Iraq were not in retreat. In large print that assessment said," quote, " 'The Sunni Arab insurgency is gaining strength and increasing capacity despite political progress and Iraqi security forces development. Insurgents and terrorists retain the resources and capabilities to sustain and even increase current level of violence through next year."

Is that your current assessment?

KHALILZAD: Well, no. I believe that a main part of the violence now is sectarian violence, violence between death squads associated with militias, and some of the insurgents.

It is true that the insurgency's still there and is targeting us. And the terrorists are there, although I believe that the al Qaida terrorists in Iraq are weaker now than they were a while back, and that they are under pressure.

But there is the sectarian violence that has increased. And there is also some Shia-on-Shia violence in the south. That is the situation. And I believe with the reconciliation program that the prime minister has put forward with the Baghdad security effort that we and the Iraqis are making, it is very plausible in my mind that next year the level of violence will be lower than this year.

BLITZER: What you are saying is that the sectarian violence between Sunni and Shia right now is the main threat to Iraq as opposed to the al Qaida or other insurgency that has been so prevalent over these past few years.

KHALILZAD: I think that is true that the importance of the sectarian violence has increased. While the insurgency persists, the terrorists, I think -- the al Qaida terrorists are weakened in the course of the past several months.

BLITZER: Can we describe this level of the sectarian violence right now between Sunni and Shia as a low-grade civil war?

KHALILZAD: Well, I don't know. It depends on the definition. I don't call it a civil war because the main political leaders want Iraq to stay together.

KHALILZAD: They are in the government together. They have not left the government. The security forces that are mixed have not fragmented.

But there is the sectarian violence that is there. And forces associated with them of the political groups are involved in the sectarian violence. So it is a matter of definition, but I believe that based on the definition that I gave, that it is not a civil war. BLITZER: Here is what you said early in June of this year to Der Spiegel. You said: "The next six months will be critical in terms of reining in the danger of civil war. If the government fails to achieve this, we will have lost its opportunity."

It's been four months since you said that. So based on your assessment, the next two months will be critical. Is that a fair assessment?

KHALILZAD: That is a fair assessment. I stand by that. The government, in the course of the next two months, has to make progress in terms of containing sectarian violence. And the government has been working hard. And the prime minister's reconciliation effort is moving forward.

He has meetings, even tonight, of the political leaders, to bring an agreement among them to decrease violence in Baghdad. The Baghdad security plan is moving forward.

In the areas where the security forces have cleared, the level of violence in general has come down significantly. But in the areas that have not yet been cleared, there is significant, and in some cases, increased level of violence, as the people responsible for violence have been pushed out into those other areas.

BLITZER: Here's some statistics we'll put up on the screen, Mr. Ambassador. In August and July of this year, more than 3,000 Iraqi civilian deaths, according to the latest statistics, 36 attacks a day earlier, now increasing to about 42 a day.

And as far as the internally displaced persons, according to the Brookings Institution, in August of 2003, 100,000, a year later, 200,000, then 250,000. And in August of this year, half a million Iraqis have been internally displaced.

It seems to be getting worse, not better. KHALILZAD: Of course, it's cumulative. And the displaced people and the level of violence -- there are days that it's higher than other days. But it has been quite high since the Samarra attacks that took place by the terrorists in the spring.

But I believe that progress is being made in terms of the reconciliation, which is necessary. In order to deal with this situation, you need to reduce the sources of violence -- that is reconciliation -- and increase the capacity of the security forces, and to go after those who are responsible for violence.

And steps are being taken with regard to each of those. But the situation remains a difficult one. I don't want to sugarcoat it in any way.

BLITZER: Here's what the spokesman for the multinational forces, Major General William Caldwell said on Wednesday. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM CALDWELL, MNF-1 SPOKESMAN: This week's suicide attacks were at their highest level in any given week with half of them targeting security forces.

Last week, almost 50 percent of the vehicle-borne improvised explosive devices were suicide attacks.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Well, if it's the worst week yet since the start of this war, what, three-and-a-half years ago or so, it doesn't sound like it's getting better. It sounds like it's getting worse.

KHALILZAD: Well, as I said, if you look at the Baghdad situation, the cleared areas are getting better. But the terrorists and the death squads are punching back. And they have used IEDs and suicide attacks as one of their responses, using quite a number of them. But they have been largely less effective than they were earlier.

But it is a challenging environment; there is no question about that. But, as I said, with reconciliation, building security capabilities of the Iraqi forces, and going after those who were involved in violence, we are making progress on each of those tracks.

But difficulties remain, of course.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And just ahead, Ambassador Khalilzad talks about his deep concerns that the Iraqi prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, may not necessarily be able to hold his country. He says he's confident in this man, but we'll see how far he can go in dealing with the death squads.

And at the top of the next hour, on "Late Edition," White House counsel Dan Bartlett responds to Bob Woodward's stunning new book about the war in Iraq.

And insight from a man who has President Bush's ear, the top outside adviser to the president, according to Bob Woodward's new book; that would be the former secretary of state Henry Kissinger.

And this note for our North American viewers: Don't forget to join John Roberts for an in-depth look at "This Week at War." That comes up at 1 p.m. Eastern, right after "Late Edition." We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're speaking to -- we're standing by, that is, to speak live with former secretary of state Henry Kissinger and former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski. That's coming up shortly.

First, though, let's return to my interview with the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: A lot of people seem to be losing confidence in the prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, that he's so far not taken the steps to deal with the death squads, the militias, the kind of tough political decisions that you and others have been urging him to take.

And when I reading Bob Woodward's book, "State of Denial," I came up along this quote from the former secretary of state, Colin Powell, who said this.

He said: "I'd like to" -- back in May of this year -- "I'd like to offer you caution about Mr. Maliki, because, frankly, I don't think any of us have heard anything about him or knew anything about him. I have a little bit of caution about somebody who spent most of the last 20-odd years in Iran and Syria."

Is the prime minister of Iraq, Nouri al-Maliki, up to the job or have you lost confidence in him?

KHALILZAD: No. I have full confidence in him. He has made tough decisions. And he is making tough decisions. He has authorized moving against death squads. He has moved forward in terms of the reconciliation.

There is the issue of militias. And we have agreed that there should be a plan for demobilizing, decommissioning, and reintegrating militia forces by the end of this year.

KHALILZAD: There are some people who say that force should be used immediately against the militias. But he believes, and I agree with him, that there has to be an integrated plan that is political to begin with to convince the political leaders who have militias to agree to a decommissioning and demobilization and reintegration plan, and to keep the military option as a last resort, if necessary, to coerce them into cooperation.

Also, he has agreed that all of Baghdad, no matter who is in charge of which parts of it, ultimately has to come under the control of the government and that is willing to use force if that becomes necessary, and use necessary amount of force to bring that about.

I think he is a strong leader. He is a good decision-maker. He sets priorities. And he follows through.

BLITZER: Let me read to you from the portions of the National Intelligence Estimate that were declassified this week: "We assess that the Iraq jihad is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives. Perceived jihadist success there would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere. Fighters with experience in Iraq are a potential source of leadership for jihadists."

Lots of other stuff in there as well. The bottom line, though, that's has been widely interpreted from this NIE, this National Intelligence Estimate, is that the war in Iraq is exacerbating the terror threat against the United States.

KHALILZAD: I think that the al Qaida folks that came here, they came in order to attack the coalition forces. And according to the leader of al Qaida in Iraq that replaced Zarqawi, al-Masri, 4,000 al Qaida terrorists have been killed in Iraq who probably would have gone elsewhere to cause difficulties and do destruction.

Whether the U.S. presence, the coalition presence here, produced more people to come and join al Qaida, the issue now is that the fact that we are here, if we leave Iraq before the job is done, before Iraq can stand on its own feet, a terrorist problem will be created that will be far greater than what we have faced so far, because al Qaida could gain control of a region of Iraq, and from there expand further into Iraq and the rest of the world and use the resources of Iraq to threaten the United States and the world.

So it's very important, given where we are now in Iraq, that we help Iraq succeed in order to avoid the scenario that I mentioned. BLITZER: We are almost out of time, Mr. Ambassador. But a quick question about this book, "State of Denial," by Bob Woodward, a couple of references to you in there, historic references.

One suggesting that you were among those, together with retired General Jay Garner, who was originally brought in for reconstruction in Iraq, thinking there should be an Iraqi face quickly, an Iraqi provisional government put forward, rather than a U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority that Ambassador Paul Bremer undertook.

Were you -- is that an accurate depiction of your thoughts at that time that it was a mistake for a U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority to be put in place, as opposed to an Iraqi face on this government?

KHALILZAD: Right. Well, as you know, I was earlier working on Afghanistan. And I participated in a process that immediately after the U.S. forces went there to produce a government -- a transitional government headed by Mr. Karzai.

And my thought was that we should do the same in Iraq, that in the aftermath of the liberation here, we ought to put a government together. And the president assigned me the task of doing that.

And I had organized a number of meetings, and the last of which was then March in Baghdad. But then, of course, Mr. Bremer was appointed, and I was nominated to go to Afghanistan.

BLITZER: So you disagreed with that assessment. Did you threaten to resign? Did you want to quit when Bremer replaced General Garner?

KHALILZAD: No. The idea was that I would come together with Bremer and that he would work -- there was at least the idea before the final decision was made that I would come together with him, that I would work on the government formation, and Mr. Bremer would deal with the rest. And ultimately the president decided to send only Bremer. And I was nominated by the president to go as our ambassador to Afghanistan. And I accepted that. As you know, I went and served there before coming to Iraq.

BLITZER: Because in the book, Bob Woodward quotes you. There is a quote of you as saying, "I quit," when you heard that Bremer was going to replace -- "then I would quit," something like that, when I -- when you heard that Bremer was going to replace Garner.

KHALILZAD: That's not accurate.

BLITZER: We will leave it at that, then. And we will continue this discussion down the road. Mr. Ambassador, thanks very much for joining us.

KHALILZAD: Well, it's good to be with you, Wolf.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And coming up, critics of President Bush accuse him of having a deaf ear when it comes to the war in Iraq. We'll get two views on that and more from the former secretary of state, Henry Kissinger, and the former national security adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Bob Woodward in his new book says Kissinger has been a secret outside adviser to the president and the vice president on Iraq. We're going to ask the former secretary of state about that.

And this program reminder: Bob Woodward will join our Larry King tomorrow night, 9 p.m. Eastern. You're going to want to see that. Bob Woodward will be taking your phone calls as well.

But up next, a quick check of what's in the news right now. Stay with "Late Edition."

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RUMSFELD: I haven't seen the book. I haven't read his first two books yet, either. So I wouldn't hold your breath on this one.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, commenting on accounts of Bob Woodward's new book of a Bush administration sharply divided over the war in Iraq, as well as Rumsfeld's own leadership.

Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. Joining us now from Connecticut, another prominent figure mentioned in Bob Woodward's book, the former secretary of state Henry Kissinger, and here in Washington, former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski. He served during the Jimmy Carter administration. He's not mentioned in Bob Woodward's book. But Dr. Kissinger, I want to go to you first. The picture we get from this book is that you, in effect, over these past six years, have served as an informal outside adviser to the president and the vice president, playing a key role in shaping President Bush's policies and decisions. I want your reaction.

KISSINGER: I haven't read the book, but I have -- first of all, my conversations with the president and the vice president -- I think if they counted the number of times Secretary Powell and Secretary Rice have asked my opinion, they would be at least as frequent as the other two.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Excuse me for interrupting, Dr. Kissinger, but the book suggests that, at least once a month, if not more frequently, you're consulted, you're brought in by the president or the vice president.

KISSINGER: I have told you what the balance is. And I think you will find that I have seen the secretary of state as frequently as I've seen the president and the vice president and that it's almost always at the request of the people that I'm talking to.

But there's a more fundamental point to be made. It is absurd to believe that an outsider who comes in, at most, once every six weeks for an hour or so, has any significant influence on tactical decisions.

Where outsiders like myself and Zbig can be helpful is to give a middle-term perspective and to deal with and to advise on issues that may not be right front, center.

And that has been the role that I believe where I can be useful. I have tried to play that with every president since I left office and, to some extent, have.

And it is simply wrong to imply that I am a shaper of day-to-day decisions. This is not my role. I'm an outsider; I'm a friend. And I respond to questions that are put to me, but they're mostly conceptual and have to do with problems that are not ready for decision.

BLITZER: Dr. Brzezinski, you've been an outside adviser to other presidents, not necessarily to this one. You've been a serious critic of this president.

But on one page, page 427, in Bob Woodward's book, "State of Denial," he says this: "The document was given the title "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq" -- referring to a document the Bush administration released -- "It was right out of the Kissinger playbook -- the only meaningful exit strategy would be victory."

Now, Dr. Kissinger and you have been on "Late Edition" several times. You know his views. His view, basically, is that the United States must win in Iraq and can't allow to happen in Iraq what happened in Vietnam. Is that an excellent strategy or not such an excellent strategy that he has been recommending to the Bush White House?

BRZEZINSKI: Gee, you're really throwing a tough question at me, aren't you?

(LAUGHTER)

We have been at this for a couple of years, now, Henry and I. We have appeared on your program many times. And you know and the viewers know that I think the war is a calamity for the United States.

It was undertaken under false pretenses. It's been conducted badly. And it's destroying the American position in the Middle East, eventually posing the risk that the United States will be pushed out of the region. Israel, incidentally, at that point, will be in mortal danger. And therefore, it is a policy that is destructive, self- destructive.

I think that the United States ought to decide, think through, the implications of its quest for quote, unquote "victory." That word is used, but what does it mean?

When all of the indices that you have cited earlier in the program about the level of violence, the destructiveness, the killings, the hostility of the Iraqi people toward us, indicate that a simple-minded victory is not attainable.

We have to re-think the strategy fundamentally. And I don't blame Henry for the strategy because he's right. He didn't formulate it. He gives them, however, external reassurance.

What the administration needs is a willingness to meet with the critic critics, not me, but think of Senator Hagel, for example...

BLITZER: He's described in this book as well...

BRZEZINSKI: ... people like that.

BLITZER: He's been an outspoken critic of the policy.

BRZEZINSKI: The administration needs to reconsider what it is doing, quite fundamentally.

BLITZER: Is this, Dr. Kissinger, an accurate assessment of your view, what Bob Woodward, in this book, suggests, that you're telling the president and the vice president the only exit strategy for the United States is victory in Iraq?

KISSINGER: Well, first of all, I will obviously not comment on any discussions I have in private conversations with the president, the vice president, or the secretary of state.

That phrase that Mr. Woodward quoted is from an article I wrote 15 months ago -- so it's been publicly available for a long time -- in which I said the only effective exit strategy is victory. Nobody can question this.

Now, as one analyzes the situation, one could think (ph) to ask, what could does one mean by victory?

And secondly, what is attainable at any given point?

And finally, what are the alternatives?

I have been opposed to setting a deadline because I believe that it will shift the psychological and political pattern. And I believe, also, that leaving a vacuum in Iraq which will then become the target for all the surrounding forces, plus an intensified civil war, plus the conflicts that may arise between the fragments that then exist and the surrounding country, is an extremely dangerous strategy.

BLITZER: Let me let Dr. Brzezinski weigh in on that issue of a deadline.

You're suggesting -- correct me if I'm wrong, Dr. Brzezinski, because you've been on this program with Dr. Kissinger several times, that the United States should set a deadline and effectively get out?

BRZEZINSKI: Let me be more precise.

BRZEZINSKI: What I've suggested, and I stick with it, is that we ought to initiate serious discussions with the Iraqis about setting a deadline, discuss it with them, set it jointly. I would push for leaving within a year. I believe that it is absolutely mistaken to stay, quote, unquote, "on course."

All of the negative scenarios that Henry outlines of our departure have to be weighed against the negative consequences of staying on course. We're heading towards an increasing disaster. In Iraq itself, where the overwhelming majority of the people want us to leave and to leave within a year. And we're heading toward a disaster in the region as a whole, where we're becoming increasingly identified as enemies of the Muslims, as hostile to all of their aspirations, and indifferent to their suffering.

BLITZER: All right. We're going to continue this conversation. I'll pick it up right after a short break. I first want to just read what Bob Woodward wrote specifically about Dr. Kissinger in the book, "State of Denial": "Former Secretary of State Kissinger has a powerful, largely invisible influence on the foreign policy of the Bush administration. Vice President Cheney told me in the summer of 2005, 'I probably talk to Henry Kissinger more than I talk to anybody else.' "

"The president also met privately with Kissinger every couple of months, making the former secretary the most regular and frequent outside adviser to Bush on foreign affairs." All right, Dr. Kissinger, Dr. Brzezinski, stand by. We're going to pick up that thought. Lots more to talk about, including the rift between two major U.S. allies, Pakistan and Afghanistan. Are both countries doing enough to fight the war on terror? And for our North American viewers, a reminder that coming up right after "Late Edition" at 1 p.m. Eastern, "This Week at War" with John Roberts. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're getting perspective on the situation in Iraq and the overall war on terror from former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and former National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Dr. Kissinger, let me quote one other passage from Bob Woodward's book, "State of Denial": "Kissinger liked Bush personally, though he told colleagues that it was not clear to him that the president knew how to run the government. One of the big problems, he felt, was that Bush did not have the people or the system of national security policy decision making that ensured careful examination of the downsides of major decisions. Kissinger sensed wobbliness everywhere in Iraq."

Is that true?

KISSINGER: Look, it is amazing that I'm asked to comment on a book that I haven't read, that Brzezinski's asked to comment on views that I don't hold. I have written nine articles on Iraq in the last two years. Anybody can get them on the Internet and can see that I have tried to analyze the various aspects of the war. In some of them I have made recommendations for changes.

I agree that we need a comprehensive strategy. I do not believe that there is wobbliness within the administration. Of course there are sharp differences, which have been widely reported, but in almost every administration that I have seen, there have been differences, sometimes more, sometimes less intense.

And I think we should focus our national agenda -- discussion on where we should go now. I believe at some point, at some early point, other countries have to be brought into the discussion of the future of Iraq. Something that I've been writing about also for some time. I don't think the choice is between victory in the abstract and pulling out in the abstract.

The choice is between trying to leave the situation in such a way that the security of the free people is not being threatened by the emergence of al Qaida-type regimes on Iraqi territory and that America does not leave the conditions under conditions of total chaos. But that does not preclude that one -- and in fact, it requires that one also has a strategy that expresses this in concrete terms, and that has been my major theme. And not platitudes like victory or wobbliness.

BLITZER: All right. Well, that's fair enough.

KISSINGER: That is not my view.

BLITZER: I'm just quoting from Bob Woodward's book, "State of Denial," Dr. Kissinger. I want to move on and talk about a huge issue that developed in Washington this past week, the summit, the three-way summit involving the president of the United States and the presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan, Pervez Musharraf and Hamid Karzai.

Dr. Brzezinski, it looks like these two critical allies the United States has in Afghanistan and Pakistan are at serious odds right now, precisely at a time when the United States needs them to cooperate in this war against the Taliban and al Qaida. How big of a problem is this?

BRZEZINSKI: I think it's a very serious problem. It's a very serious problem because the animus between the two creates room for groups such as Taliban to stage a comeback. We have a real problem with Pakistan because we've asked Pakistan to do a lot for us. Now, Musharraf has put his life on the line. But, at the same time, for example, we have cozied up to the Indians. We're supporting the Indian nuclear program while we're still maintaining a series of restrictions in Pakistan and so forth. So there's a lot of resentment in Pakistan, not only against Musharraf but against us.

At the same time, in Afghanistan, it is a fact that Karzai is our best friend. We have a government in Afghanistan that's based on people whom we supported in the war and who feel grateful to us. And that's a big difference than Iraq. But it is also a government that is weighed heavily against the dominant Pashtuns in the country. And they feel discriminated, and some are gravitating toward the Taliban.

BLITZER: Dr. Kissinger, what does the president of the United States need to do to get these two allies on the same page?

KISSINGER: These two allies in these two countries haven't necessarily been on the same page for a few hundred years. We should make it clear to Pakistan that tolerating al Qaida on their territory and supporting the insurrection in Afghanistan is not compatible in the long term with good relations with the United States.

KISSINGER: But it is without doubt an extremely complicated situation. What we need is a bipartisan national strategy on these issues. It is a very complex problem. It has turned out to be more complicated than the administration expected at the beginning or could expect at the beginning. And therefore, we have to define the direction in which we can move and carry it out. But there isn't any quick gimmick by which it can be solved.

BLITZER: Dr. Kissinger, we have to leave it right there. We're out of time. But a quick -- I want to put a picture up on the screen. You were in Rome this week at the Vatican. There it is, a picture of Dr. Henry Kissinger and Pope Benedict XVI. You had an audience with the pontiff. How did that go, briefly? And did you discuss the issue that's come up, his critical comments, if you will, about Islam that's caused so much of a stir in the Muslim world?

KISSINGER: Look, Wolf, you know that it is not appropriate to discuss the substance of a papal audience on television. I've had the privilege of conversations with the Pope when he was cardinal. And I found him then and now a man of great profundity. BLITZER: Only appropriate that the German-born Henry Kissinger would have an audience with the German-born pontiff. Just as the Polish former national security adviser often met with the Polish pontiff, John Paul. Is that right, Dr. Brzezinski?

BRZEZINSKI: Correct.

BLITZER: All right. Good to have both of you on "Late Edition" as always. Thanks to both of you for coming in.

And we're going to have much more on "Late Edition," including a revealing profile of the U.S. defense secretary that airs tonight. "CNN Presents: Rumsfeld, Man of War." We're going to bring you an excerpt of that. "Late Edition" continues right after this.

BLITZER: Tonight on CNN, an unprecedented up-close look at the U.S. secretary of defense, Donald Rumsfeld. CNN special correspondent Frank Sesno was given rare access to the defense secretary, his allies and critics of his stewardship of the war in Iraq. Here's a look at the Rumsfeld military strategy.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE) FRANK SESNO, CNN SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT: Even before Tora Bora, President Bush told Rumsfeld to have his generals start looking at Iraq. Rumsfeld had a long history with the place. As Reagan's envoy, he went there, shook Saddam's hand when Saddam was at war with Iran, America's archenemy.

But after Saddam's invasion of Kuwait and the first Gulf War, Rumsfeld signed on to a new line of neoconservative thought, that America should actively promote democracy in Iraq and oust Saddam Hussein. At the end of 2001, Rumsfeld ordered Tommy Franks to throw out the existing Iraq war plan, which called for more than 400,000 troops.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DONALD RUMSFELD, U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENSE: It didn't reflect any of the lessons from Afghanistan, that it didn't reflect the current state of affairs in Iraq.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

SESNO: Rumsfeld was adamant, leaning hard on General Tommy Franks, who was putting together the war plan.

THOMAS RICKS, THE WASHINGTON POST: There was quite a lot of friction. Fairly harsh tone. Franks would fly up to Washington, show it to him, and Rumsfeld would say, fewer troops, faster. Cut it down. Pare it down.

SESNO: Rumsfeld was thinking transformation and asking tough questions.

U.S. ARMY GENERAL JACK KEANE, RETIRED: The question sort of goes like this: Listen, Saddam Hussein's army today is half the size it used to be. Why do we have to attack with the same size force we did back then? Isn't it reasonable to do it with less? Well, that's a very good question, and it deserves to be asked.

SESNO: The U.S. would attack with fewer than 150,000 troops, though more were available if needed. Rumsfeld's vision had prevailed. It was about to be tested again but on a very different battlefield.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And don't miss "CNN Presents: Rumsfeld, Man of War." That airs tonight, 8 p.m. Eastern.

BLITZER: Welcome back. We'll have my interview with the White House counselor, Dan Bartlett, in just a moment. First, though, let's check in with CNN's Fredricka Whitfield at the CNN center for a quick look at what's in the news right now. Hi, Fred.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks, Fred.

Just five weeks before key congressional elections here in the United States, House Republicans are finding themselves in hot water over one of their own. Republican Congressman Mark Foley of Florida resigned Friday, suddenly, over alleged sexually suggestive computer messages he sent to a 16-year-old boy, a former congressional page.

Our congressional correspondent Dana Bash, joining us, once again, with the latest. What a story this is. It's caused a huge uproar here in Washington.

BASH: It has. Because we now know that three Republican leaders actually knew about this months ago. In addition, several other Republican lawmakers knew, as well, about one questionable e-mail exchange between Foley and a former male page, but they kept it secret.

And over the past 36 hours, we've been getting some contradictory explanations from Republican leaders about their own conduct and knowledge about this matter.

For example, House Speaker Dennis Hastert said Friday he knew nothing about any of this. And now he's issued a correction of sorts after it was revealed that he was, in fact, informed.

Now, beyond the question of what did they know, it's what did they do about it?

Republicans say they confronted Foley late last year when they found out about that one questionable e-mail exchange, but Democrats are saying, that's simply unacceptable. They were never notified about this.

Even the Democrat on the House page board, which allegedly investigated, was not part of that inquiry at all. Listen to what the Democrat running for Foley's seat in Florida said yesterday about this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TIM MAHONEY, DEMOCRATIC HOUSE CANDIDATE: It's now clear, from all the press reports, that the Republican leadership team knew this was going on and they had to make a choice. They had to do what was right for the children that were in the care of the government, or they could try to hold on to a seat and they decided to try to hold on to a seat.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BASH: Now, it should be noted that Republicans say they only knew about what they call an overly friendly e-mail, not the sexually explicit instant messages that, of course, forced Foley to resign on Friday.

BLITZER: And let me read some of those to give this some context of this uproar here in Washington, this reported by ABC News, which broke the story.

Here's one of those very sexually explicit instant messages: "What ya wearing?" "tshirt and shorts" "Love to slip them off of you."

And another one said this: "Do I make you a little horny?" "A little." "Cool."

Now, it's that kind of stuff -- these are young boys who, in effect, are being hit on, allegedly, by a member of Congress in his 50s.

And that's bad enough, but the question is this: Did other leaders, Republican leaders know about this and decide, you know what, we're going to turn a blind eye; we're going to admonish him and warn him of this but not pay attention and let him go on.

I mean, potentially, the scandal is only just beginning. BASH: That's right. And again, they say they didn't know about what you just read; they only knew about one e-mail that was what they considered overly friendly. It wasn't anywhere near as explicit as what you read.

But another question is, what happens in terms of Congressman Foley, criminally?

As of Friday, before what you just read became public, there was no indication of any criminal investigation. But now, considering what we know, it is possible, of course, federal investigators are going to have to look into whether any federal laws were broken.

And in a statement yesterday, Republicans seem to encourage the idea of a criminal investigation. They said that former Congressman Foley should fall under the full weight of the criminal justice system. And we do know that Foley used a private e-mail account, but we don't know where he was instant-messaging from, whether it was home, somewhere else or in his office.

But as of now, the Capitol police have sealed off his former office on Capitol Hill. And they're apparently guarding it, potentially, to protect any evidence.

BLITZER: We'll watch the story. We're going to have more on it this hour. Thanks very much, Dana Bash, reporting.

President Bush came out swinging this week. He slammed Democrats as cut-and-run second-guessers of his Iraq policy. And his team dumped on a new book that claims he's giving a false, overly optimistic picture of what's actually happening on the ground in Iraq. I sat down with one of President Bush's closest advisers, the counselor Dan Bartlett, earlier today.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Dan Bartlett, thanks very much for coming in.

BARTLETT: Thanks, Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, we've got a lot to talk about. This book, "State of Denial," by Bob Woodward, the national intelligence estimate, lots more.

But first, this uproar that's developed over the past couple of days, Republican Congressman Mark Foley of Florida resigning suddenly because of inappropriate e-mail to a teenage boy, who was a page. Apparently, there's a lot of this going on.

When did you at the White House begin to learn that this was unfolding?

BARTLETT: It's my understanding, Wolf, we learned when the American people learned, when Representative Foley put out a press release saying he was stepping down. We were all shocked by it, deeply concerned about what exactly happened, and we're glad to see that there's going to be an investigation into the particulars of this case.

But the president, the entire administration was just as surprised as everybody else.

BLITZER: Because there are suggestions that the Republican leadership in the House knew much earlier about this inappropriate e- mail and effectively did nothing.

BARTLETT: Well, the speaker's office and the leadership offices have all put out statements explaining what they knew when and why. And I think that's the best place for it to be handled, and my understanding is there's going to be an investigation. BLITZER: Should there be an independent, outside investigation, given the fact that the Republican leadership, at least by some, have been implicated, at least tacitly in complicity with this?

BARTLETT: Well, I think the leadership is being very forthcoming about what they know and when they knew it. There is going to be, I'm sure, a criminal investigation into the particulars of this case.

So I don't think anybody has to worry about this being thoroughly investigated. We're going to get to the bottom of this, the leadership is, and that's very important, because we need to make sure that the page system is one in which children come up here and can work and make sure that they are protected.

BLITZER: When you say a criminal investigation, who would undertake that kind of criminal investigation?

I assume a criminal investigation of Mark Foley.

BARTLETT: Well, if you take the allegations at face value, I think there would have to be at least a preliminary look to see if there's any breaking of criminal law.

I'm not a lawyer and I don't know all the particulars of the case, but I think this is going to get a lot of scrutiny, and it should get a lot of scrutiny, and I'm sure if there's, as Speaker Hastert and others have said, if someone needs to be held accountable -- Representative Foley -- they will be.

BLITZER: I want to move on, but what about this notion, though, that there were leaders, Republican leaders in the House -- suggestion, including the speaker of the House -- who knew earlier about this inappropriate e-mail.

Should they be held accountable if they, in effect, turned a blind eye and said, just make sure he stops doing this?

BARTLETT: Well, Wolf, I think it's important, at least from the reports I have seen, is that the leadership made clear that they did not know about the specific e-mails that are now being discussed, that they saw were described in a much different way, maybe not an appropriate way, but much different than the sensational e-mails that have now been revealed.

And the referrals were taken by the speaker's office, and they were given to the appropriate people. But again, this all is going to be looked at. It should be looked at.

Most importantly, we have to make sure that we have the integrity of the page system on Capitol Hill, and no one takes that more seriously than the speaker.

BLITZER: All right, let's talk about this bombshell of a book, "State of Denial: Bush at War Part III," by Bob Woodward.

BLITZER: The final paragraph basically sums up the main theme of the book: "With all Bush's upbeat talk and optimism, he had not told the American public the truth about what Iraq had become."

It's in effect suggesting, as the title says, that the president of the United States and his top advisers were in a state of denial.

BARTLETT: You know, Wolf, it's interesting, because I've obviously spent a lot of time with Bob over the last six years, five years, talking about his various projects, and a lot of the discussions, a lot of the debate about this book is about old debates that we've had about the number of troops and the post-reconstruction phase, disagreements between Jerry Bremer and the Pentagon and the State Department.

But I must say, I was quite struck by the cover of the book and the central thesis of denial, because the evidence in the book itself -- and I've read it over the last 48 hours as quickly as I could -- but I was struck by the fact, Wolf, that there is evidence that contradicts his very thesis of denial. Throughout this book, throughout many of the president's public speeches, he's been very blunt with the American people about the difficulty of this war. He's been very blunt about the challenges we face.

He's gone to great lengths to explain how we're adapting our strategy to the enemy's tactics. As you've covered before, in late last year and early this year, the president gave a series of speeches where he was talking about how we had made some mistakes, how we've changed the way we're training Iraqi security forces, for example.

In this book, I must say, I was really -- I am puzzled by the fact that he's come to the conclusion of this title, this central thesis, because I don't even think the evidence in his own book backs it up.

BLITZER: Because his two earlier books on President Bush were seen by the White House, seen by many as very sympathetic, very supportive, if you will, of the president. That's why this one stands in stark contrast.

Let me read from page 471 and 472: "Wednesday, May 24. The intelligence division of the Joint Staff, J-2, circulated an intelligence assessment, classified, secret, that showed that the forces in Iraq were not in retreat. In large print, the assessment said, quote, "The Sunni Arab insurgency is gaining strength and increasing capacity despite political progress and Iraqi security forces development. Insurgents and terrorists retain the resources and capabilities to sustain and even increase level of violence through next year."

This at a time when the president was saying this publicly. Listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: Years from now people will look back on the formation of a unity government in Iraq as a decisive moment in the story of liberty. A moment when freedom gained a firm foothold in the Middle East and the forces of terror began their long retreat.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right. The contrast being that he was privately being told about a gloomy assessment, the situation in Iraq would probably be worse next year than it is this year, and suggesting to the American people publicly that, in his words, the terror forces were in a long retreat.

BARTLETT: Well, the first part of that quote -- and I think this is a very classic example where you can take a quote from a presidential speech and draw any conclusion you want.

The bottom line, the president years from now, he has taken a historical perspective that we're going to look back on this project and decide that when an Iraqi government was formed, when 12 million Iraqis came together and voted for a new way of life, that this was going to be a demonstrable difference in the lives of the Iraqi people.

In that very speech, the president talks about the necessary sacrifices, a lot of challenges going ahead. As you know, Wolf, because you were reporting at the time, this was in the wake of the sectarian violence that erupted after the bombing of the Golden Samarra Mosque.

We recognized that there was a very difficult period. The president was explaining that to the American people, but...

BLITZER: Do you expect the violence in Iraq in 2007 to be worse than it has been in 2006?

BARTLETT: Well, I can't make that prediction myself. But...

BLITZER: But what are you hearing from your intelligence and your military officers?

BARTLETT: I think it's interesting, Wolf, because General Abizaid has made very clear that we're going to keep the current strength of troops at about 140-something thousand at that level through the spring of '07. That's the difference here. The president at every step of the way, despite maybe the political expediency there may be to actually reduce troops, the president is listening to the generals on the ground, and I think that's what the American people want. It's going to be a conditions-based strategy. If we need more troops, we'll send more troops. If we need less troops, there'll be less troops there.

And the president has been very clear about that. And I think that's what so puzzling about this book, is that time and time again in this book, it points to evidence of saying we're in denial, when in fact you can look at the very same speeches or very same reports that show contradictory evidence to his thesis.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And coming up, more of my conversation with Dan Bartlett about how his boss, the president of the United States, is running the country and the war. And I'll ask him whether Donald Rumsfeld should be dumped as the defense secretary. And later, is Iraq out of control? I'll speak with two senior members of the Senate foreign relations committee.

And remember, tomorrow night, "Larry King Live" with Bob Woodward about his new book, "State of Denial." Bob Woodward will take your questions, 9 p.m. Eastern.

Stay with "Late Edition" and CNN.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're standing by to speak live with senators Richard Lugar and Chris Dodd of the Foreign Relations Committee. That's coming up. But first, more now of my conversation earlier today with one of President Bush's closest advisers, the counselor, Dan Bartlett.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Here's the part of the National Intelligence Estimate that was released publicly this past week: "The Iraq conflict has become the cause celebre for jihadists, breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement. We assess that the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities."

That's one segment. It's talking about the impact of the fighting in Iraq on the worldwide terror threat against the United States.

This is what the president said on September 7th.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: We are safer because we've taken action to protect the homeland. We're safer because we are on the offense against our enemies overseas. We're safer because of the skill and sacrifice of the brave Americans who defend our people.

(END VIDEO CLIP) BLITZER: Is there a contradiction there? Because the suggestion being is the American people are not safer right now because Iraq has become a breeding ground for jihadists and terrorists against the United States.

BARTLETT: Well, Wolf, you packed a lot into the question and the quotes and it's important to take a close look at the NIE because the NIE says that Iraq is one of four different factors that is fueling extremism and the recruits of the jihadists. And they're all very serious and they're all the type of underlying factors that had been there even before we went into Iraq.

Iraq is being used by the extremists as a recruiting tool. That is not a mystery. That is not -- they do it on their Web sites. They do it in calls by bin Laden himself.

BARTLETT: The irony is that bin Laden was using Iraq even before 2003 as a rallying cry for the jihadist movement.

The other point I would make: In that very speech that you quoted President Bush from, he went on to say that we are not yet safe, that the remaining challenges, that the enemy we're up against is very skillful, they're determined, they have a hateful ideology that they're trying to spread throughout the world.

In fact, the irony here is that about two weeks ago when right around September 11th, the critics were saying that the president has a campaign of fear; he is only talking about the enemy; he is only talking about how bad things are to try to scare the voters into voting for him.

Well, you can't have it both ways. The president is being very blunt about...

BLITZER: But the suggestion is...

BARTLETT: ... the prospects of what's happening in this war, the consequences. And one thing the NIE does say -- and it's an important debate to have in Washington -- is, if we leave Iraq, if the jihadists leave Iraq thinking they won this battle, they will even grow in more strength. We will have perceived to have lost if we pull out and that's the lesson the policymakers here in Washington should take.

BLITZER: But has the war in Iraq increased the terror threat against the United States?

BARTLETT: Well, that report doesn't say that. What the report says is there are four underlying factors that they are using to recruit more extremists. To say that that directly results in vulnerability here at home is not a conclusion that this NIE draws.

What we draw from this NIE is that it's a very frank assessment, that we have a very tough enemy that we're up against; they're very skilled at propaganda; they are very skilled at using age-old grievances or current conflicts as a recruiting tool but if we don't find this war on offense, Wolf, we will be more vulnerable at home.

And that's why this president will continue to fight for the tools necessary to fight them over there so we don't have to face them here at home.

BLITZER: Here's what Bob Woodward writes in his book, "State of Denial," quoting General Colin Powell, the former secretary of state: "I think things have gotten worse. We have a raging insurgency still. We still have terrorism. But the new element which came out from the bombing of the religious site at Samarra is that we now have sect on sect violence and it's serious. And this is a new war. And it's a war that American troops have less and less to do with. I understand that the CIA chiefs of station have a somewhat more negative view now."

Once again, the suggestion by Bob Woodward, in this book, that the president is misleading the American public on how bad things have deteriorated inside Iraq.

BARTLETT: Well, that would require somebody who -- a typical American who is out there following the news to not just see the obvious, every time you turn on your TV or open up your paper. People know how difficult it is in Iraq. And the president has been very blunt about that.

And the sectarian violence is something that we're seriously concerned about and the president has spoken at length about what we're doing to try to fix that.

And Colin Powell does raise a very serious point and it is, it's less and less about what we're doing but what the Iraqis are doing.

And part of our strategy is a political strategy to help this new unity government make the difficult decisions to reconcile differences between age-old sectarian divides. And it's a divide that Saddam Hussein himself exploited in order to rule his country in a brutal way, so it is a complicated strategy. It's the necessary strategy.

But most importantly, and I think the American people understand this, Wolf, is that, if we don't win in Iraq, if we don't have a victory in Iraq, sustaining a government there that can protect itself and be an ally in the war on terror, we will have made this country less safe.

And that is the conclusion all the intelligence reports show.

BLITZER: In this book, "State of Denial," and you read it now, basically, the other theme that comes across is that this has been an administration, a dysfunctional administration where you have bitter internal battles, that the president was under enormous pressure from some of his top advisers to fire the defense secretary, Donald Rumsfeld.

He resisted. He obviously has not done that. But the dysfunctional White House, as it's depicted in this book, comes across. I'll read to you from page 428: "After Thanksgiving, then-White House Chief of Staff Andy Card made another concerted effort to get the president to replace Rumsfeld. Many of the Republican and Democratic leaders were telling Card privately that they could just not deal with him. He was more arrogant and unresponsive than ever. Card was also hearing from members of the old foreign policy establishment connected to the president's father -- the gray beards, as he called them -- who were complaining more and more. A focus was Rumsfeld."

Is this true, that so many of the president's top advisers -- Powell, Condoleezza Rice, Andy Card, among others -- were urging the president to dump Rumsfeld?

BARTLETT: Well, you made two different points in here, and I'll take both of them squarely.

The first one was that there's dysfunction in the administration. And I think what's happening in this book is there's a conflation of disagreement with dysfunction.

You want to have an administration, a team, that has differences of opinion. These are very tough issues, Wolf. They're not easy, black and white, easy to call. They're very difficult, and they're ones in which when you have hindsight seem easy to make.

The president wants advisers that are strong-willed, that have differences of opinion, share those opinions with him so then he can make the best decision possible.

Now, the issue about Secretary Rumsfeld. And if you read the book carefully, Secretary Rice didn't call for Secretary Rumsfeld's dismissal. She suggested to the president maybe he ought to bring in a whole new national security team, starting in the second term.

Andy Card, his job as chief of staff is to analyze every senior post within the White House and within the cabinet. And he did that, even recommending to the president that he should replace himself. His job was to give him options.

But as we all know, the president is very -- has all the confidence in Secretary Rumsfeld, believes he's the right man to do the job, as he is doing. He has a very complicated job. He's fighting a war...

BLITZER: So he's saying Rumsfeld is not going anywhere?

BARTLETT: He has the fullest confidence in Secretary Rumsfeld.

BLITZER: One final question. Henry Kissinger: Has he been, as this book suggests, a major outside informal adviser to the president and the vice president, frequently visiting the White House and offering assessments on Iraq and other issues?

BARTLETT: Well, I think it's funny because there's a lot -- the conventional wisdom is that the president's in this bubble, that he doesn't listen to anybody.

But he's always talking to people, outside advisers, people who have long experience, such as Henry Kissinger. Of course he listens to Henry Kissinger. The man's got a wealth of experience and knowledge. But to suggest he has -- he's the driving influence behind the president's policy, I think, is a mischaracterization. BLITZER: Dan Bartlett, thanks very much for coming in.

BARTLETT: Thanks for having me, Wolf.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And from inside the White House to two insiders in the United States Senate, I'll speak live with two senior members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the chairman, Richard Lugar and Democrat Chris Dodd.

And remember, for our North American viewers, in the next hour, much more on the situation in Iraq as well as the war on terrorism. "This Week at War" airs at 1:00 p.m. Eastern.

But up next, a quick check of what's in the news right now. Stay with us. We'll be right back.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: We're just getting this in, some new videotape that has just come in, very disturbing videotape showing two of the 9/11 hijackers, Mohammed Atta, the ringleader of the 9/11 attacks, as well as Ziad Jarrah. He was the hijacker that piloted United Airlines Flight 93 that crashed in Pennsylvania.

You can see both of them smiling. This was video that was supposedly taken in Afghanistan as they went there to meet together with Osama bin Laden just before they went on their mission here in the United States, and we all know what happened as a result of that.

The Sunday Times says the video is dated January 18th, 2000, about a year and a half before the attacks against the United States, and was made in Afghanistan to be released after their death. Not exactly clear why this is being released right now, but let's get some instant analysis of what we're seeing here, disturbing video.

Joining us is the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Richard Lugar, Republican of Indiana, and a senior Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, Chris Dodd of Connecticut. Senators, thanks very much. Mr. Chairman, when you see this kind of video, you see these guys planning and plotting, working together, what goes through your mind?

LUGAR: Well, what goes through my mind is the same thoughts as when I learned some of the hijackers were exercising in Gold's Gym out here in Maryland the week before. You wonder what kind of people these are, what motivates them to do this. Now, we've thought a lot about this during the last five years because this is a jihadist movement of an extreme sorts, but these exemplify that type of psychology. It is horrible to witness, and it's horrible to witness in our world currently.

BLITZER: What about you, Senator Dodd, because these were not necessarily individuals who came from poor backgrounds, uneducated. They were educated, sophisticated. They could float around and mingle in the Western world, and we all know what they did in commandeering those planes.

DODD: What bothers me most I think as I'm looking at this is that's almost six years old, that video, and today according to the administration figures, not mine or anyone else's, the ranks of al Qaida have swelled from 20,000 members to 50,000 members. So we're looking at two individuals here who were prepared to take their lives and the lives of innocent people.

How many more people are we looking at today prepared to do that? And that's -- I know we're going to talk about this, but I think frankly we're at greater risk today as a result of not really taking the -- doing the steps, taking the steps necessary to deal with this. So I'm worried we're looking at a bigger problem.

BLITZER: So, in other words, not just the 19, but right now there may be a lot more...

DODD: A lot more.

BLITZER: ... of these guys.

DODD: We know there are a lot more.

BLITZER: Well, here's what the National Intelligence Estimate, the declassified estimate that was released this week, portions of it, concluded, among other things: "Jihadists, although a small percentage of Muslims, are increasing in both number and geographic dispersion. If this trend continues, threats to U.S. interests at home and abroad will become more diverse, leading to increasing attacks worldwide."

You've read this National Intelligence Estimate, and one of the conclusions is that a key factor in promoting the creation of this -- these jihadists is the war in Iraq.

LUGAR: Well, the key factor you've just mentioned is clearly disputable. The fact is that Iraq is a battle zone, and it has brought a lot of people in. Of course, the sectarian violence between

Shiites and Sunnis and the militias and elsewhere likewise is equally violent. I think before jumping to the conclusion that Iraq is the cause of all of this, you have to examine why our embassies were bombed in Africa long ago, why Afghanistan happened, why jihadists have been, really, throughout the Middle East with the Saudis now planning a 550-mile fence to keep them out. It is a worldwide phenomenon.

BLITZER: And 9/11 happened before the U.S. invaded Iraq. LUGAR: That's true, and let me just point out that we are vigilant, but we have not had attacks upon America since 9/11. The attacks have come in European capitals. The dispersion of jihadists has really headed more in that direction. Maybe they are learning some things and we are working better together in terms of our intelligence, as we found with the reports on the potential blowing up of aircraft across the Atlantic.

BLITZER: Senator Dodd?

DODD: Well, it's pretty bleak here. This is a war of choice, and it's causing a serious problem. These are 16 agencies who comprise the intelligence community, have drawn the conclusion here that this war is a failure. It's causing us deep and serious problems. We prematurely have abandoned Afghanistan or at least apparently so because that is collapsing as we talk. And have given up on some time for the search for Osama bin Laden and became obsessed with Saddam Hussein, and this is causing us serious, serious problems.

Now, all of us, of course, recognize we've got a major threat to our country, and certainly while we have not been attacked in the United States, it's not much consolation to the families of almost 3,000 of our young men and women who lost their lives in Iraq, not to mention the loss of treasury. And certainly when our allies are faced with these difficulties, the problem persists.

BLITZER: Listen to what the president said on this National Intelligence Estimate, Senator Dodd. And I want you to respond.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: The Democrats are using the NIE to mislead the American people and justify their policy of withdrawal from Iraq. The American people need to know what withdrawal from Iraq would mean. By withdrawing from Iraq before the job is done, we would be doing exactly what the extremists and terrorists want.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Do you agree with the president?

DODD: No, absolutely. I mean, 65 percent of the Iraqi people want us out of their country. Many people think that we're actually becoming the fuel that causes the loss of life in that country on a daily basis. I'm not advocating any instantaneous withdrawal. Nor are many, many serious people that I know advocating that.

But clearly, we need to be talking about redeployment, and clearly, the Iraqi people have to assume this responsibility. It's not going to be resolved. There isn't a treasury deep enough or an army big enough that can guarantee for the Iraqis what they have to decide for themselves.

BLITZER: All right, but that University of Maryland survey said close to 70 percent of Iraqis want the U.S. military out of their country within the next year. LUGAR: Almost 100 percent of the Sunnis were a part of that sample. Fifty-six percent of the Kurds want us to stay.

LUGAR: We have just an exemplification of what Chris Dodd has pointed out. The real battle is to find an Iraq in which three parts come together.

BLITZER: Can that happen?

Can these three parts of Iraq...

LUGAR: Well, it really has happen...

BLITZER: ... come together, Kurds, Shia and Sunni?

LUGAR: If they're going to have a future, they'll have to. Because the 303,000 people, now, are trained. But there isn't a government that knows, really, how to deploy and make effective the defenses Iraqis have built for themselves.

BLITZER: Do you have confidence in Nouri al-Maliki the prime minister?

LUGAR: I'm not going to make a comment whether I have confidence or not. He is the prime minister and we need to give him every bit of support right now and push to get on with it.

BLITZER: Stand by, guys, because we have a lot more to talk about. We're going to continue our conversation with these two influential senators. I'll ask them more about what's happening in Iraq and other hot spots.

And remember, for our North American viewers and all of our viewers, in fact, Bob Woodward will be talking about his new book, taking your phone calls on "Larry King Live." That airs tomorrow night, 9:00 p.m. Eastern. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back. We're just getting in a copy of a letter that the Democratic leader in the House of Representatives, Nancy Pelosi, the minority leader in the House has just written, demanding a full-scale investigation of the Mark Foley incident, Mark Foley, the Republican, now former Republican from Florida accused of getting engaged in sexually explicit e-mail with a 16-year-old congressional page, a young boy.

It is a nightmare for every child, parent and grandparent to learn that a child is being stalked on the Internet by an adult in a position of authority. She goes on to say she believes that Republican leaders who knew about this for six months to a year must be investigated themselves.

Since that resolution unanimously passed on Friday, Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year and they chose to cover it up rather than protect these children.

Joining us, now, once again, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Richard Lugar and a ranking Democrat, Chris Dodd.

This is so awful, potentially, not only for the parents of these young pages -- and both of you have dealt with these pages for many years -- but for confidence in the United States Congress, right now, what is unfolding.

Mr. Chairman?

LUGAR: Well, I would join Congresswoman Pelosi in saying an investigation ought to occur. That's what she's suggesting.

BLITZER: But she's really saying, though, that the Republican leadership -- they failed. They knew about this six months ago, or a year ago. Maybe they didn't have all the details, but they basically said to Congressman Foley, you know what, stop. And that was it. If in fact that was the case, somebody was derelict.

LUGAR: Well, they will have to speak for themselves. I would just say, simply, that, to what has occurred is just as terrible as is being suggested.

There needs to be, clearly, protection for pages. There needs to be at least the opportunity for these young people to serve. It's a great experience, but it has to be unencumbered by the type of thing we're talking about now.

BLITZER: This is so worrying because parents, they send their 15, 16, 17-year-old kids to Washington. And there is a responsibility that all of you have.

DODD: First of all, I'll tell you, there is a very good program and it's much, much better today than it was years ago, where these young people came and basically lived on their own.

Today there's a school and dormitories and they're much more closely monitored and watched.

What is troubling here is the point that Congresswoman Pelosi raised. And that is, if people knew about this -- we saw examples of this -- as a Catholic, I say, we saw examples of this in the Catholic Church not that long ago, where hierarchy in the church neglected to pursue these matters aggressively.

And if that is the case, then she's absolutely correct. And the only way we're going to know that is by pursuing it. So I underscore what Senator Lugar has said here. This needs to be thoroughly examined and explored. And if, in fact, they did know, then people are going to have an awful lot of explaining to do.

BLITZER: All right, let's move on and talk about this book, "State of Denial," this Bob Woodward book, which basically accuses President Bush and his top advisers of being in a state of denial. I'll read to you from page 400 because it refers to Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, a friend of yours, a colleague of yours: "Hagel made a pitch that Iraq was a much bigger mess than they were acknowledging and the administration should do more on security, training, governance and infrastructure. He left unsatisfied and gave an interview to U.S. News and World Report, saying, quote, 'Things aren't getting better. They're getting worse.' His private assessment was worse. The administration had no strategic thinker. Condoleezza Rice was weak. The military was being emasculated and severely damaged by uniformed sycophants."

Tough words. You know Chuck Hagel. He's a serious member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. What do you make of this?

LUGAR: Well, I would just say that both Senator Dodd and I have sat through hearings that Senator Biden conducted when he was chairman, that I have conducted.

We have talked explicitly about Iraq, about the preparation for war, preparation, hopefully, for peace and reconstruction, the lack of reconstruction progress, the dilemmas that we've just been discussing today with the Al Qaida -- all of this, all of us have expressed ourselves on.

Sometimes we've been listened to and sometimes not. I would just say, clearly, we have responsibility to continue to do that and to offer the very best counsel that we can.

I'm not going to offer judgments, categorically, person by person as to whether the president should have this person or that. I would think, conceivably, a wider circle of advisers and, maybe, now, in a bipartisan way, would be very helpful to the president as opposed to a much narrower circle that, apparently, has been the case.

BLITZER: The president, this week, at a political fund-raiser down in Alabama this week said that your party, the Democratic party, of FDR and the party of Harry Truman, in his words, has become the party of cut-and-run.

DODD: Well, this is campaign season here. And let me just mention a couple -- the title of this book which is getting so much attention, "State of Denial" -- and I say this not because he's sitting here, but I sit on the committee with Dick Lugar. We've had hearings on Iraq and Afghanistan, on Iran, wonderful hearings, comprehensive hearings with people who have testified, who are not necessarily in favor of present policies.

Unfortunately, that's been the exception, Wolf, not the rule. And denial also has to go to members of Congress. The Republican leadership in Congress have not conducted the kind of oversight that should have been conducted.

Why are we having a rump hearing, listening to three senior military people who gave up a career in the military because of their total objections to what this administration was doing? Those individuals should have been before serious committees of the Congress. So members of Congress bear responsibility as well here, the leadership does, for not doing what Dick Lugar has done, I might add, on several occasions, giving us the opportunity to examine these issues more thoroughly.

BLITZER: We're totally out of time, but a quick question: Who's going to win, Lieberman or Ned Lamont, in your home state of Connecticut?

DODD: Well, it's going to be close. Look at it that way.

BLITZER: Who do you want?

DODD: Well, I'm supporting Ned Lamont.

BLITZER: That must be so painful for you...

DODD: Of course, it is. Thank you for asking me, though.

BLITZER: ... the tough...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: .... very close relationship you've had with Joe Lieberman.

DODD: We're very good friends. But 145,000 Democrats, on August 8, made a decision.

DODD: I cannot not respect the decision of the members of my party and my state. That was the decision they made. I had a different one. I wanted Joe to win. Worked hard for him. But they reached a different conclusion.

BLITZER: All right. We'll leave it right there. Have you concluded yet whether you're running for president?

LUGAR: I'm exploring it very thoroughly.

BLITZER: Sounds like you are.

LUGAR: Sounds like I am.

BLITZER: OK.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Always good to have you on the program, Senator Dodd, Senator Lugar. Both of you are always good on the program because you're both candid and frank with our viewers. Appreciate it very much.

And up next, much more of our program. What was said on the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States about the U.S. mission in Iraq. We'll update you on that. And don't forget, to find the latest political news, including highlights from all the network Sunday talk shows, check out our CNN Political Ticker. Easy way to do it, go to cnn.com/ticker.

And for our North American viewers, coming up right at the top of the hour, "This Week at War" looks at how a big majority of Iraqis now say they want the U.S. out. John Roberts in "This Week at War," 1 p.m. Eastern. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: And now, in case you missed it, let's check some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States. On all of them, discussion centered on the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq and the way ahead for the U.S. mission there.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) NEWT GINGRICH, FORMER HOUSE SPEAKER: I think there is a genuine intellectual fight under way inside the government among professionals over the way ahead. And I think one group is saying stay the course, hold things steady, this will all work. And the other group of equally serious professionals is saying, this is much harder than you think it is. You had better rethink your entire strategy.

And this is a genuine fight in the intelligence community, and a genuine fight at the state and defense departments. And I think the president in that sense has two different camps in the government today over how to do this.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. REP. JOHN MURTHA, D-PENNSYLVANIA: Who do I believe, this administration, who said there's al Qaida connection, who said there's weapons of mass destruction, say it's going better every day? Do I believe them? Or do I believe the people I've been talking to, the troops in the field, the troops in the hospitals, and the generals who said we can't win it militarily? What is the point? We've got 130,000 people on the ground for two years. It's getting worse every day.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR MIKE DEWINE, R-OHIO: We cannot leave Iraq with the job undone. And we cannot set an artificial timetable. It would bring disaster. Just to set a date that we will be out, it will embolden the insurgents. It will tell them when we will be gone. They just sit back and wait. That would be a mistake.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) U.S. SENATOR JOE BIDEN, D-DELAWARE: Within the administration, Bob, and all your sources -- ask them -- they are completely at odds with one another. They have no idea what to do next. As I said, there's 600,000-plus trained forces by us, counting our forces. Things are getting worse and worse. It's spiraling out of hand.

There's a political solution needed. And the president is doing nothing, nothing, nothing about it. He is the one should cut the old program and run on a new program.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here on "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk. We'll be right back.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Rice, Others Dispute Claim She Ignored CIA Warning Of Al Qaeda Attack. As the White House continued its effort to rebut claims made by Bob Woodward in his new book, "State of Denial," the author sought to bolster his case by sharing "once secret" documents with NBC News – the only network to cover the story last night. The network, and much of the TV coverage, continued to portray a White House put on the defensive by the book. However, stories in this morning's Washington Post and New York Times cast doubt on Woodward's characterization of a meeting between Condoleezza Rice and then-CIA director George Tenet. NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 4, 2:35, Mitchell, 9.87M) said, "All of the President's men in a state of denial over 'State of Denial.'" White House spokesman Tony Snow: "Flat wrong. Absolutely wrong." The White House, added NBC, "issued a press release titled, 'Five Key Myths In Bob Woodward's Book.' For instance, denying Condoleezza Rice was told of a possible terror threat on July 10, 2001, two months before 9/11. Today, Rice, en route to Saudi Arabia, said it was incomprehensible that she would ignore such a warning. But Woodward has documents proving that a CIA briefer told Rice of an impending attack." Bob Woodward, author, 'State of Denial': "He said specifically after the meeting, 'We did everything but pull the trigger of the gun we were holding to her head.' Mitchell: "Is there clear evidence that they did anything?" Woodward: "The presidential order to get bin Laden or kill him was sitting on the President's desk September 10, 2001. The day before 9/11." Mitchell: "Officials tell NBC News the former CIA Director George Tenet did testify in secret to the 9/11 Commission about that meeting."

The Washington Post (10/3, A3, Eggen, Wright, 748K) reports Tenet's "statements to the [9/11] commission in January 2004 confirm the outlines of an event in a new book by Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward that has been disputed by some Bush administration officials. But the testimony also is at odds with Woodward's depiction of Tenet and former CIA counterterrorism chief J. Cofer Black as being frustrated that 'they were not getting through to Rice' after the July 10, 2001, meeting." The New York Times (10/3, Shenon, Mazzetti, 1.21M) says "both current and former officials, including allies of Mr. Tenet, took issue with Mr. Woodward's account that he and his aides had left the meeting feeling that Ms. Rice had ignored them." Democratic 9/11 Commissioner Richard Ben-Veniste said, "Tenet never told us that he was brushed off. We certainly would have followed that up."

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Richter, 918K) reports Rice's "reaction to the description of the meeting underscores administration attempts to counter claims, in Woodward's book and elsewhere, that question whether officials heeded internal warnings and reports on terrorism and the Iraq war." Rice did not "deny that any meeting took place, noting she met frequently with Tenet and other intelligence officials and counterterrorism experts during 2001, when she said the administration was developing a comprehensive strategy. But she said the idea of an emergency meeting designed to 'shock' her did not make sense."

USA Today (10/3, Slavin, 2.27M) reports Rice "said she recalled 'a steady stream of quite alarmist reports of potential attacks' during that period, but they involved targets abroad in Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Israel and possibly Jordan. 'There was nothing that related to an attack in the United States,' she said." The AP (10/3, Gearan) reports Rice "said she cannot recall then-CIA chief George Tenet warning her of an impending al-Qaida attack in the United States" as claimed by Woodward. Rice said, "What I am quite certain of is that I would remember if I was told, as this account apparently says, that there was about to be an attack in the United States, and the idea that I would somehow have ignored that I find incomprehensible." The AP adds, "Speaking to reporters en route to Saudi Arabia and other stops in the Middle East, Rice said she met with Tenet daily at that point, and has no memory of the wake-up call from Tenet described in the book."

White House Described As At "War Over Woodward." NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 5, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "All of this news out of Washington tonight leaves us with much to discuss with our Washington bureau chief and moderate of Meet the Press Tim Russert. … Tim, this so-called war over Woodward, same question. [A damage assessment so far?]" NBC (Russert) added, "The White House is ferocious in their response, and why? One of the best known reporters in America is in effect laying out a case questioning the competence and credibility of the White House on Iraq. It is the last thing they want to debate five weeks before an election."

Snow Calls Allegation Bush Is In Denial About Iraq "Outrageous." CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported, "An angry new response today from the White House to journalist Bob Woodward's new book State of Denial. Among other things, Woodward contains the declarations that terrorists in Iraq are in retreat don't match the secret intelligence assessment the President is being given. Press Secretary Tony Snow says the notion the president is in denial about Iraq war losses or that he is trying to cover up things is, quote, 'an outrage.'"

NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 4, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Woodward's documents include these talking points the President used at a national security meeting just before the war. They recommended he keep the Iraqi army intact to prevent an insurgency. Instead, the army was disbanded. And the book offers several examples of the President making optimistic statements about Iraq, contrary to far more pessimistic secret assessments. Is this a case where they are not telling him the truth or he is putting a gloss on things?" Woodward: "He knows how bad it is." Mitchell: "A sign of how damaging Woodward's claims are is how hard the White House is fighting back."

Bob Woodward said on CNN's Larry King Live (10/2) that "there's a secret report from the intelligence division of the Joint Chief of Staff saying things are going to get worse. And, the terrorists in Iraq maintain this capability and in the year 2007, that's next year, it's going to get worse. [President Bush is] saying, as you heard, that they're in retreat." Asked what he makes of Bush's claims, Woodward said, "He's an optimist. He's a leader in a time of a really difficult war, a war of choice, a war he decided on, and it's Bush's war, no question about it and it's gone south and it's become more and more violent and more and more difficult."

Woodward Denies He Reached Conclusions Before Writing Book. Bob Woodward responded on CNN's Larry King Live (10/2) to White House counselor Dan Bartlett's claim that he reached some conclusions, saying, "I'd reached no conclusions. I had lots of secret memos and notes of what they had done and how they had done it and that his response to the man he put in charge of post war Iraq was when the man said, and your producer comes to you and says 'I can't do the things you've assigned me to do,' you don't go say 'kick ass.'"

White House Reportedly "Miffed" At Colin Powell. The White House Bulletin/US News (10/2) reports White House insiders "are more than a bit miffed at former Secretary of State Colin Powell. They consider him one of the prime sources" for Woodward's "State of Denial." Powell "lost many internal debates over the war and now he is getting even, White House officials say. But they don't want to take Powell on directly because he remains a highly-respected figure for most Americans and because, White House insiders say, they fear he might try to do more damage to Bush's image if he feels under sustained attack by his former colleagues."

More Commentary. In his Washington Post column (10/3, A17), George Will says, "'State of Denial' will take a toll on government collegiality and the candor of its deliberations. It is based on astonishing indiscretions -- current and past officials making private memos and conversations public for motives that cannot be pure. The book is hardly a revelation about supposed hidden chaos in Washington that produced the obvious chaos in Iraq. It does demonstrate that President Bush and others were shockingly slow to recognize Iraq's complexities and downward spiral. But we already knew that." The book "does not demonstrate that the president is in a state of denial."

In his Washington Post column (10/3, A17), Richard Cohen says it is "time for yet another" constitutional amendment: "This one would ensure that no child of a president could become president. This would avert another George W. Bush. The reasons for this amendment can be amply found in Bob Woodward's new book, 'State of Denial.' If ever a title was apt, this is the one. As if to prove that Woodward had it right, Bush reacted to the book's revelations about Don Rumsfeld -- intransigent, incompetent and intellectually intolerant -- by reaffirming his confidence in him. To Bush, and indeed to the rest of us as well, Rumsfeld has come to personify the conduct of the Iraq war. His leaving, especially his firing, would be an admission of the obvious: failure."

Homeless Iranian Woman Charged With Supporting Iraqi Terrorist Group. The New York Times (10/3, Rashbaum, 1.21M) reports, "A frail 51-year-old Iranian woman was indicted last week in Brooklyn on a charge of supporting a terrorist group based in Iraq that seeks the violent overthrow of the Iranian government, federal authorities said yesterday." Zeinab Taleb-Jedi "is free on a $500,000 bond and living in an East Side women's shelter. A law enforcement official said she did not pose a direct threat to the United States." The Times notes, "The People's Mujahedeen was first designated as a foreign terrorist organization in 1997, according to an affidavit filed in the case by F.B.I. Special Agent Mark Broihier, who said he had been investigating the group for five years. … When American forces invaded Iraq…they disarmed the military arm of the group and ordered its members to assemble at a base about 40 miles north of Baghdad," and "F.B.I. agents went to the base and interviewed about 200 people associated with the group, including Ms. Taleb-Jedi, the affidavit said. They found firing ranges and bomb shelters and shrines to the group's 'martyrs,' along with bunkers that had been used to store a range of ordnance, including 420,000 pounds of plastic explosives."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/3, Hays) adds that according to court documents, "two confidential informants in Iraq" said Taleb-Jedi was "a leader of the Mujahedeen Khalq. … One of the informants told the FBI that Taleb-Jedi was on a council 'responsible for making leadership decisions for the organization, including approving specific acts of terrorism' against Iran, the papers said." When the FBI questioned her in Iraq, "Taleb-Jedi told agents her husband joined the Mujahedeen and went to Iraq in 1986. In 1999, after learning her husband was killed in a bombing, she 'left her job, sold all her belongings and traveled' the group's Ashraf Base in Iraq."

Defense Begins Closing Arguments At Albany Terror Trial. Capital News 9 Albany (10/2, Ference) reported, "It's been more than three weeks and soon both defendants Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref will find out if the jury believes them to be innocent or guilty of supporting terrorism through money laundering when they got caught up in a 2004 FBI-sting operation. Defense attorneys for Yassin Aref continued to try to dispel the prosecution's accusation that Aref knew what an FBI informant was talking about when he mentioned the word 'missile.' … But prosecutors again showed the jury a page written by Aref where he translated English words to better understand them. He wrote 'rocket equals missile.'" Aref lawyers "also argued the codeword used by the FBI informant for missile -- Chaudhry -- wasn't clear. At one point, the informant referred to it by saying, 'one of my family members is married in Dr. Chaudhry's, uh family, my niece is married to one of the family members.'"

Hayat Relatives Return To US From Pakistan. As reported in yesterday's New York Times, the AP (10/3) reports in a widely-distributed story, "Two American citizens related to a California man who was convicted of supporting terrorists flew home from Pakistan, five months after they were barred from returning to the United States for refusing an FBI interrogation, their attorney said." Muhammad and Jaber Ismail "arrived at Kennedy Airport on Sunday afternoon, according to Julia Harumi Mass, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California. … 'I never imagined that the country I was born in would stop me from coming home for five months and separate me from my family, especially when I was not even charged with a crime,' Jaber Ismail said."

Afghan Prisoners' Attorneys Challenge Bush Detainee Plan. The Washington Post/AP (10/3, A6, Apuzzo) reports attorneys "for 25 men being held in Afghanistan launched a pre-emptive strike Monday against President Bush's plan to prosecute and interrogate terror suspects." Court documents "demand that the men be released or charged and allowed to meet with attorneys. Such a filing, known as a habeas corpus petition, is prohibited under the legislation approved by Congress last week." That bill "says the military may detain enemy combatants indefinitely and, if officials choose to bring charges, the cases would be heard before a military commission, not a civilian judge. Bush has not signed the bill but expects to soon." Monday's filing "initiates what is likely to be a drawn-out legal fight similar to the one over detainees at a military prison in Guantanamo Bay. Detainees there have dozens of petitions pending."

Canadian Judge Releases Tamil Tigers Suspect On Bail. The Toronto Star (10/3, Grewal) reports, "A 29-year-old Mississauga man facing extradition to the United States on charges that he provided support to a Tamil terrorist group was released on $680,000 bail yesterday in a Brampton courtroom. Ramanan Mylvaganam will be reunited with his mother and five siblings after spending more than a month in custody, but under the terms of his release will not be allowed to live with them. Mylvaganam was arrested Aug. 22 after a joint RCMP-FBI investigation." The Star notes that Mylvaganam "must live with one of the named sureties, must be in the presence of one of them or his mother at all times, and may not communicate with the co-accused. In addition, he will be required to surrender his passport and report in every Monday. He is banned from using the Internet, a cellphone or any other electronic communication device."

Alliance Of Algerian Terror Group, Al Qaeda Analyzed. The Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Lund, 58K) reports many Algerians "are anxious; the Islamist radicals of the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, better known by the French acronym GSPC, have threatened attacks in the capital" of Algiers "during Ramadan." Already, "officials blame the group for violence outside of Algiers. Overnight Friday, in separate incidents, two security officers were killed near a mosque and a bomb derailed a train, according to the Associated Press." Authorities have "amassed some 3,000 police around the city. While the radical Salafist group has been active for years, officials have new cause to take greater precaution to its threats." In a videotape "released by Al Qaeda Sept. 11, 2006, Osama bin Laden's second-in-command Ayman al-Zawahiri announced that 'the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat has joined the Al Qaeda organization ... may this be a bone in the throat of American and French crusaders, and their allies, and sow fear in the hearts of French traitors and sons of apostates.'" The Monitor adds the GSPC "has long expressed a willingness to join Mr. bin Laden. But not until now has Al Qaeda officially acknowledged a merger. Indeed, this alliance underlines the regional, rather than Algerian, focus of GSPC."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Federal Report Makes No Recommendation On Terror Insurance Program. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, A4, 2.03M) reports a report released this week by an interagency group headed by Treasury Security Henry Paulson "makes no recommendation on whether Congress should make a temporary post-9/11 insurance program permanent. The findings were consistent with a study by the Government Accountability Office, a congressional watchdog agency, that private insurance and reinsurance markets are reluctant to provide coverage for chemical, nuclear, biological and radiological weapon strikes." The Journal notes, "Congress has until the end of next year to study the issue before having to decide whether to extend the current backstop insurance program."

Chertoff, Peters To Meet With UK Transport Chief On Passenger Data Sharing. The Financial Times (10/3, Cameron) reports UK Transport Secretary Douglas Alexander is scheduled to meet with DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff and Transportation Secretary Mary Peters in Washington Wednesday "in a move that could help break impasses over the sharing of airline passenger information and efforts to liberalise the transatlantic aviation market." The "visit comes amid continuing efforts by the US and the European Union to forge a new deal on the provision and sharing of sensitive passenger information." The Times adds that the meeting "reflects widespread industry concern about the need to reach a new deal on the sharing of passenger information."

Judge Allows Greatly-Curtailed Jewell Libel Suit To Proceed To Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/3, White, 399K) reports, "Olympic park security guard Richard Jewell's libel suit against The Atlanta Journal-Constitution can go to trial on one of 22 claims, a Fulton County judge ruled Monday." Judge John R. Mather " said the newspaper reported truthfully that Jewell was the focus of a federal investigation, that he fit the profile of a lone bomber and most other points surrounding the investigation. But Mather said a jury would need to decide whether the newspaper was wrong to report that investigators believed Jewell placed a 9-1-1 call warning law enforcement that a bomb would go off in the park." The AP (10/3) notes, "Jewell was praised as a hero for finding the backpack that contained the bomb and helping to clear park visitors from the scene. But he soon fell under a cloud of suspicion after it was reported that the FBI was investigating him for possible involvement. Jewell was later cleared, and some news organizations settled legal claims that he had been defamed."

Nagin Signs Order Requiring Businesses To Use Local, Minority-Owned Firms. USA Today/AP (10/3, 17A) reports, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin signed an order Monday requiring that large businesses use as many local and minority-owned firms as possible when they seek millions of dollars in tax incentives and grants for Hurricane Katrina recovery. Nagin's executive order requires applicants for the incentives to involve at least 50% local businesses and 35% women- or minority-controlled businesses whenever possible." The rule expands on a requirement already in place for government contracts by involving "businesses applying for assistance promised by federally funded recovery programs that are administered by the city and the state."

WAR NEWS:

Maliki's Security Plan Would Empower Local Committees To Fight Violence. The Washington Post (10/3, A12, Keath, 748K) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "announced a new plan Monday aimed at ending the deepening crisis between Shiite and Sunni parties in his government and uniting them behind the drive to stop sectarian killings that have bloodied the country for months. The four-point plan, which emerged after talks between both sides, aims to resolve disputes by giving every party a voice in how security forces operate against violence on a neighborhood-by-neighborhood basis." Maliki would form multiethnic "local committees" to offer input on security activities. The Post says he "is under increasing pressure to stop the violence, which has killed thousands since February." His "administration has been plagued by growing mistrust between its Shiite and Sunni members, who each accuse the other of fueling the bloodshed."

The New York Times (10/3, Oppel, Mizher, 1.21M) adds, "Faced with unrelenting sectarian killings and growing anger from Sunni Arab leaders, [Maliki] announced a new security plan on Monday that calls for committees of neighborhood leaders to try to defuse sectarian crises in their own areas and also for new supervision of the news media." The "details of the plan were vague, and it was not clear how effective it would be in the face of recent unsuccessful attempts" to stop the violence. The AP (10/3, Keath) and the Los Angeles Times (10/3, Moore, 918K) runs similar stories.

Foreign Fighters Said To Form "Relatively Small Slice" Of Insurgency. The Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Grier, 58K) reports, "It may be true that Iraq is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders, and that the US presence there is a 'cause célèbre' for jihadists, as a recently declassified US intelligence assessment holds." But "that doesn't mean the Iraqi insurgency is a wholly owned Al Qaeda subsidiary. Foreign fighters make up a relatively small slice of the forces targeting the US military in Iraq. Most insurgents are native Iraqi Sunni Islamists or former members of the old Baath party regime." Thus, "to Osama bin Laden, Iraq might be more important as a symbol than a physical battlefield or training ground."

Iraqi Torture Site Could Be Linked To Security Forces. USA Today (10/3, Jervis, 2.27M) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi troops conducting a raid in Baghdad found a blood-soaked torture chamber that may have been operated by a Shiite Muslim militia with ties to the government. Soldiers found Interior Ministry badges in the compound, and U.S. forces saw an Iraqi policeman on the roof of the compound before Sunday's raid." Troops also found "posters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his white-bearded father, the late Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr." USA Today adds, "There have been signs that some of the militias may have ties to the Shiite-dominated government security forces, particularly paramilitary forces in the Interior Ministry. ... U.S. and Iraqi officers have expressed concerns, however, that the Shiite-dominated government may prevent the military from aggressively going after Shiite militias."

Iraq Veteran Pleads For More Troops In Iraq. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (10/3, 2.03M), Iraq veteran and 101st Airborne platoon leader Pete Hegseth argues, "America is fighting with a hand tied behind its back. Soldiers have all the equipment we need -- armored humvees, body armor for every body part, superior technology, etc. -- but we simply do not have enough troops in Iraq, and we need them now."

Author Urges Reverence For Fallen Troops. In USA Today (10/3, 2.27M), writer Kathy Roth-Douquet discusses the phrase "died in vain," which she traces to Abraham Lincoln. She states that deaths in Iraq are not "for naught," even if the war "is a mistake, or we pull out too early," because "despite any partisan's passion for the rightness of a position, none of us will know how right or wrong we really are until long after the last shot is fired. So we make decisions the way one does in a self-governing society of 300 million cantankerous souls: imperfectly, inelegantly, with unnecessary suffering."

Frist Says Taliban Should Be Part Of Afghan Government. The AP (10/3, Krane) reports, "US Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said Monday that the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and urged support for efforts to bring 'people who call themselves Taliban' and their allies into the government." The senator "said he learned from briefings that Taliban fighters were too numerous and had too much popular support to be defeated on the battlefield." Frist, "during a brief visit to a U.S. and Romanian military base in the southern Taliban stronghold of Qalat," said, "You need to bring them into a more transparent type of government. … And if that's accomplished, we'll be successful."

NATO Troops Fight To Win Afghan People's Support. The New York Times (10/3, Gall, 1.21M) reports from Pashmul, "NATO forces scored one of their biggest victories here in ferocious fighting in September, flushing out an area of southern Afghanistan that had been swarming with Taliban insurgents. But almost immediately a new and more difficult battle began — for support of the local people." The Times quotes Col. R. Stephen Williams's account of the battle and reports that in the aftermath "military commanders and the governor of Kandahar Province have started handing out half a million dollars in humanitarian aid and have promised families more help with repairing the war's damage."

The Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Peterson, 58K) also reports on such efforts to court support, writing, "Mr. Hamidullah's village is one of more than a dozen in the poor Kamdesh district of Nuristan along Afghanistan's porous border with Pakistan. US Army units of the 3rd Squadron, 71st Cavalry moved in over the summer to pay attention, with projects and money, to a region that ranks near the bottom of Afghanistan's development index." Troops and villagers both face obstacles: "pressure grows from the Taliban and other insurgents. In the past month, one prominent elder was tortured and killed, and a senior border policeman assassinated." Officers with short tours of duty rarely have the necessary "local know-how," a "requirement to successfully balance the needs of the villages while navigating among the local contractors and spreading wealth."

DOJ:

Morford Named Interim US Attorney In Nashville. The Nashville Tennessean (10/3, De La Cruz) reports, "A federal prosecutor from Ohio will serve as interim U.S. Attorney in Nashville, the U.S. Justice Department said in a statement today." The Tennessean continues, "Craig S. Morford will serve as interim as Jim Vines leaves the job as the top federal prosecutor for the Middle District of Tennessee. Vines' last day was Oct. 1, the statement said. He is returning to private practice with the King and Spalding firm." The Tennessean adds, "Morford has served as the first assistant in the U.S. Attorney's office in the Northern District of Ohio since November, 2003. He has a law degree from Valparaiso University School of Law and a bachelor's degree from Hope College, the statement said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Employees Angered By Fastow's Reduced Sentence. The Washington Post (10/3, D1, Johnson) reports, "When a federal judge took four years off the prison sentence of former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow last week, he surprised legal analysts, angered onetime employees and sparked anew a debate about just punishment for white-collar criminals." The Post continues, "In a much-heralded 2004 plea deal, Fastow admitted to a pair of conspiracy charges that carried a maximum penalty of 10 years. He also agreed not to seek a reduction in his prison term. But one week ago, U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt granted some mercy to the architect of the era's biggest accounting fraud and sent him to prison for just six years. … That means Fastow, who improperly took more than $45 million from the coffers of the Houston energy-trading company, could spend closer to 3 1/2 years in prison if he gets credit for completing a drug-treatment program and for good behavior. … The reduction, former Enron worker Rod Jordan said yesterday, 'was a slap in the face to employees.'" The Post adds, "No former employees appeared at last week's sentencing, with most preferring to wait until former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling is sentenced on fraud charges Oct. 23. 'A lot of them decided to skip Fastow because they thought it was a done deal,' Jordan said, referring to the 10-year term. … Fastow served as one of the government's most important witnesses in the trial of Skilling and Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay, who were convicted in May. Prosecutors in that case told the jury that Fastow had 'locked in' a 10-year prison sentence as part of a plea bargain with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force. … But Fastow's lawyer, John W. Keker, implored the judge last week to send Fastow away for five years because of his repentance, his cooperation with prosecutors and shareholders, and the toll on his family. Keker pointed out that Fastow's wife, Lea, spent nearly a year in prison after pleading guilty to underreporting the couple's income. … At the hearing, prosecutors did not object to the proposed reduced sentence. But they had previously filed a document agreeing with a probation department report that would have exposed Fastow to a sentence longer than 10 years."

Memo Suggests Hurd Knew Of H-P Leak Probe In July 2005. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Waldman, Clark) reports that Hewlett-Packard Co. "still hasn't answered a key question about its leak-investigation scandal: When did Mark Hurd, H-P's chief executive officer, learn that private phone records were being examined as part of the probe? A memo from H-P's outside law firm suggests that Mr. Hurd may have learned about the use of phone records as early as July 2005 -- a few months after the leak probe began -- though it doesn't indicate he knew that they were obtained through means that may have been illegal."

Cingular Wireless Sues Over Hewlett-Packard Pretexting. The Legal Times (10/3, Crea) reports, "Cingular Wireless filed a lawsuit Friday against Charles Kelly, one of five private investigators who allegedly impersonated Hewlett-Packard Co. board members in an effort to obtain customer calling information." The Times continues, "The case, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, is seeking to get Kelly and his firm, Georgia-based CAS Agency Inc., along with any of its agents, to return confidential caller information and any profits made from the obtained data. The suit asks for an injunction from the court to prevent Kelly and his firm from obtaining any further customer information. It also claims punitive damages." The Times adds, "Kelly, along with other private investigators, was subcontracted through Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., the company HP hired to determine who on the computer giant's board was leaking sensitive information to the press. Last Thursday, Kelly was subpoenaed to appear before a subcommittee of the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee investigating the HP scandal. Kelly and the others took the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination and were immediately dismissed."

Sonsini's Novell Options Grants Raise Red Flags. The California Recorder (10/3, Scheck) reports, "As a director and lawyer for several companies suspected of illegally backdating stock options, Larry Sonsini has been under scrutiny the last six months for any role he may have played in option deals for employees. … But a Recorder review of SEC documents suggests Sonsini's involvement with suspiciously dated options wasn't limited to those he approved for other people." The Recorder continues, "Indeed, records filed by software maker Novell Inc. -- which recently announced it has hired outside counsel to review past option grant practices -- show that in 1999, Sonsini and the rest of the company's board deviated from their normal compensation plan by awarding themselves 50,000 options apiece. … That grant came on Oct. 26, when the stock was priced at a 17-month low. Over the next two months the share price would more than double, making the award worth more than $1 million on paper." The Recorder adds, "The timing of the Novell grant raises the question of whether the options were actually doled out the day the company said they were, according to corporate governance experts. … But that's not the only issue raised by these options. Less than a month after the grant, Novell announced exceedingly rosy financial figures from the previous fiscal year. From a nadir of $16.69 on the grant date, the stock eventually hit $39.94 by the end of December." The Recorder notes, "Ultimately, the options would become worthless before vesting due to the tech market crash. … Nevertheless, the series of events makes experts wonder whether the grants were also 'spring-loaded' -- that is, intentionally issued just before positive disclosures that the board knew would impact share prices. The SEC does not seem to view spring-loading with nearly the same severity as it does backdating, but the practice still troubles many experts, especially in this case."

Siegel Retires As Mills Chief Executive. The Washington Post (10/3, D1, O'Hara) reports that Laurence C. Siegel "retired as Mills Corp. chief executive Friday and is being asked to repay more than $360,000 in personal travel on a company-chartered jet." Mills will pay Siegel "$2.5 million in severance pay and $10.5 million if the company is sold by the end of next year, a likely event because Mills is actively trying to find a buyer for a 42-mall portfolio that includes Potomac Mills in Virginia and Arundel Mills in Maryland." The company described Siegel's departure "as a retirement and said its timing was not related to the personal travel expenses he is being asked to repay or to a soon-to-be completed investigation by the company's independent directors into Mills management and accounting failures."

Alexander Bail Hearing Arguments Begin. The New York Times (10/3, Grobler, 1.21M) reports former Comverse CEO Jacob "Kobi" Alexander "transferred about $16 million to Namibia from Israel, bought a house and put his children into a local school, a Windhoek court was told on Monday." At the bail hearing, Alexander "showed every sign that he would fight efforts to extradite him to the United States to face charges of conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering involving a suspected scheme to backdate stock options at Comverse." Defense lawyer Herman Oosthuizen said Alexander "would be willing to hand over his Israeli passport and post bail of about $1.36 million." The Times adds, "An F.B.I. agent, Marilyn Williams, who works out of the United States Embassy in Pretoria, South Africa, urged the court to reject the bail application. She said Mr. Alexander failed to return to New York on July 20 from a vacation in Israel to face questions from federal prosecutors. Mr. Alexander, she said, had also offered as much as $5 million — and then 'a name-your-price offer' — to a colleague at Comverse to take the blame in the stock options case."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/3, Jacobson) notes that the bail hearing "will continue Tuesday. The Namibian government said it opposed bail pending a formal extradition request from the United States, said Justice Ministry official Dennis Khama. Marlene Williams, an FBI agent based in South Africa, also opposed bail."

Professor Says Hedge Funds Do Not Need More Regulation. Dale Oesterle, a law professor at Ohio State University, writes in USA Today (10/3), "Two high profile hedge fund calamities in the past week will no doubt result in renewed calls for more 'hedge fund regulation,' whatever that is. Amaranth Advisors lost a whopping $6 billion in trades of natural gas futures, and Pirate Capital is being investigated of failing to publicly disclose its stock sales. Pirate Capital has been one of the nation's most visible (and colorful) 'activist' hedge funds, funds that purchase stock in a company to force through major changes." Oesterle adds that "the current system of penalties has plenty of bite for funds that misbehave. The plight of Amaranth and Pirate hardly supports a claim for more regulation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Foley Enters Rehab As His Attorney Denies "Inappropriate Sexual Contact." The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Levey, Neubauer, 918K) reports that "disgraced" former Rep. Mark Foley "has begun seeking treatment at a rehabilitation facility for alcoholism, his lawyer said today. 'I strongly believe that I am an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems,' Foley said in a statement released through his attorney, David Roth. The lawyer did not reveal where Foley was receiving treatment." The New York Times (10/3, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports Roth "denied that Mr. Foley had ever had inappropriate physical contact with minors. 'Mark Foley has never, ever had inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life,' Mr. Roth said. 'He is absolutely, positively not a pedophile.'" USA Today (10/3, 8A, Page, 2.27M) reports recounts details of Foley's political career, noting, "Rumors about Foley's sexual orientation didn't cause much of a stir in Washington and didn't imperil his re-election to the House."

USA Today (10/3, Heath, 2.27M) reports Ben Cavataro, "a 17-year-old high school senior…said" Foley "nominated him to be a page last summer. … The allegations against Foley surprised Cavataro, who only briefly met Foley during his three-week stint as a page last summer. 'There was no indication of anything improper with Foley or anybody else,' Cavataro said." USA Today (10/3, Bazar, 2.27M) notes Foley's "statement that he's an alcoholic, coming after reports that he sent sexually explicit e-mails to congressional pages, makes him the latest public figure to enter rehab in the face of scandal." The Washington Times (10/3, Pfeiffer, 88K), meanwhile, notes other sex scandals involving members of Congress.

The Palm Beach (FL) Post (10/3, Crowley) reports, "Mark Foley is not a pedophile and 'never ever' had sexual contact with minors, his attorney said Monday. … Instead, David Roth, a prominent criminal defense attorney with offices in West Palm Beach, portrayed Foley as a troubled alcoholic who has suffered from mental illness much of his adult life. … 'Mark is an alcoholic. He drank in secret. He did not drink in public,' Roth said. 'He had two lives with regard to his alcohol consumption. In public, and in public service, he was sober. When he was alone, he was not sober. He is an acknowledged alcoholic.'" The Post adds, "Foley is now in treatment for alcoholism and mental illness at an undisclosed center, where he is expected to remain for at least 30 days, Roth said. … Roth said he was contacted by Foley on Friday, minutes after the Fort Pierce Republican resigned from Congress after being confronted with sexually explicit Internet messages he exchanged with a teenage boy. … Asked if Foley, 52, had physical contact with any of the boys with whom he was communicating, Roth said, 'Based on all the information that I have, Mark Foley has never ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life.' … Asked if Foley is a pedophile, Roth said, 'He is absolutely, positively not a pedophile.' … He described Foley as 'contrite, remorseful and devastated by the harm that his actions have caused.... He blames no one but himself.'"

Foley's Predilection For Young Males Was Reportedly Widely Known. The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Levey, Reynolds, Schmitt, 918K), in an article titled, "Foley Saga No Shock to Some: The Florida Republican was known to have an interest in younger men," reports, "some on Capitol Hill say" Foley "was known to have a special interest in younger men. In interviews with the Los Angeles Times, several current and former congressional employees and others said they recalled Foley approaching young male pages, aides and interns at parties and other venues. 'Almost the first day I got there I was warned,' said Mark Beck-Heyman…who served as a page. … 'It was no secret that Foley had a special interest in male pages,' said Beck-Heyman, adding that Foley…on several occasions asked him out for ice cream. Another former congressional staff member said he too had been the object of Foley's advances." The Times goes on to report, "The current and former congressional staffers interviewed by The Times, who are from both parties, said it was well known within the Capitol's gay community that Foley was interested in young men. 'Among the gay political community, there was a pretty wide understanding that he had an eye for the interns and the younger staff,' said one former congressional staffer."

Roll Call's "Heard on the Hill" (10/3, Akers) reports, "the Foley 'victims' crawling out of the woodwork! One of them, a boyish looking former reporter turned big-shot lawyer living in California, had until Friday tried to suppress the memory of repeatedly being 'asked out' by Foley in the mid- to late '90s when the former scribe was in his 20s but looked about 18. … After Foley resigned over the Pagegate scandal Friday, our source, whom we hesitate to call Deep Throat on the Left Coast, recalled something that happened about 10 years ago — he thinks it was early 1997 — one night at Café Deluxe. He was out to dinner with a gal pal when he suddenly heard someone yelling his name from across the restaurant. DT on the LC was mortified when he saw Foley, who he said 'was drunk,' approaching their table and quickly asked his friend to say she was his girlfriend. Foley…came over, exchanged pleasantries with the reporter and his friend and asked if the two were dating. 'Yes,' our source recalled his pal saying. Foley, according to our source replied, 'Well, I've been asking [name redacted] out for years, and he always says no. What's your secret?'"

CBS Evening News (10/2, story 5, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The FBI may not have seen it but some 16-year-olds sensed Foley was crossing a line other Congressmen didn't." Unidentified female: "I had a friend Matt and a friend Tim and he would see them first and he would be like 'Hi, Mattie, hi Timmy.' And we used to be like 'that's funny of them to say that. That's kind of weird.'"

Potential Prosecution Of Foley Examined. The AP (10/3, Jordan) reports, "The FBI…'is conducting an assessment to see if there's been a violation of federal law,'' according to FBI spokesman Richard Kolko." The AP continues, "The Florida Department of Law Enforcement said Monday it was also investigating whether the e-mail communications violated state law. Spokesman Tom Berlinger called the state probe 'a precursor to a possible criminal investigation.'" The AP adds, "FBI cyber sleuths are looking into the text of some of the Foley messages, checking to see how many e-mails and instant electronic messages were sent and how many computers were used, according to a law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. … The FBI also was trying to determine if any of the teenagers who received messages are willing to cooperate with the investigation, the official said." The AP notes, "Ironically, Foley, who is 52 and single, could be found to have violated a law that he helped to write as co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus."

McClatchy (10/3, Talev, Taylor) reports, "Yet in an ironic twist, federal laws championed by Foley himself make it a crime in some circumstances to use the Internet to persuade, induce or entice someone under 18 to engage in sexual activity." McClatchy adds, "Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), a liberal watchdog group, said it asked the FBI to investigate non-explicit e-mails between Foley and a former page back in July, after a 'third party' made the e-mails available to the group. CREW asked Monday for the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why the FBI didn't act. An FBI spokesman wouldn't comment, except to confirm that an investigation had been launched." McClatchy adds, "John Pierce, a former federal prosecutor of 14 years now in private practice, said if a crime was committed, the Justice Department could investigate members of Congress for knowing about a 'commission of a felony' and failing to report it. However, Pierce expressed doubts that Hastert would have called for such a probe if he believed there was a cover-up within his party's ranks."

Bloomberg (10/3, Roberts) reports, "Hastert yesterday sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking for a criminal investigation of Foley. … In his letter to the attorney general, Hastert defended his handling of the matter, noting that after learning of Foley's 2005 e-mails to a male former page, Shimkus and the House clerk confronted Foley, demanded he stop contacting the page and believed the issue had been resolved privately as the parents had requested." Bloomberg notes, "Democrats said any Justice Department investigation of Foley should include how House Republican leaders responded after the first indications that Foley had sent inappropriate e-mails to teenage pages in 2005. House Democrats demanded that the chamber's ethics committee produce a preliminary report on the matter within 10 days. … 'Central to the investigation is immediately questioning, under oath, the House Republican leadership,' Pelosi wrote in a letter to lawmakers on the committee yesterday."

Liberal Watchdog Group Forwarded Messages To FBI In July. CBS Evening News (10/2, story 5, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Melanie Sloan, who heads the Center for Responsibility in Politics, said there were warning signs" about Foley's "conduct. Last July, her group said some of the overly friendly e-mails were sent to the FBI but no action followed." Melanie Sloan: "I would have grabbed Foley's computer right away and starting examining." The Washington Post (10/3, A11, Babington, Weisman, 748K) reports the FBI "acknowledged yesterday that it did not begin an investigation in late July after receiving copies of e-mails sent in 2005" by Foley.

The AP (10/3, Taylor) notes Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director and a former prosecutor "specializing in sex crimes," said, "they (the e-mails) should have raised a red flag over at the FBI," and "asked the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why Foley's e-mails were not pursued." Roll Call (10/3, Bresnahan) characterizes CREW as a "liberal watchdog group" and reports that Sloan is a former House Democratic staffer. The Washington Post (10/3, A11, Babington, Weisman, 748K) describes CREW as a "liberal-leaning group."

The New York Times (10/3, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports, "The group would not say where it had obtained the messages; it made them public after the ABC report."

Two Florida Papers Were Previously In Possession Of Foley Emails. The New York Times (10/3, Kornblut, Seelye, 1.21M) reports, "At least two news organizations were tipped off to e-mail messages sent by…Foley long before the story…broke last week and forced him to resign. The St. Petersburg Times and The Miami Herald received copies of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, and a teenager, but neither paper gathered enough solid material to publish a story, according to statements by the papers' editors." The Times notes "the papers' decisions not to report the accusations are being cited by Republican leaders as justification for why they themselves did not step forward earlier to try to stop Mr. Foley." Speaker Hastert is quoted as saying, "He deceived his in-state newspaper when they each questioned him. … He deceived me, too."

Value Of Page Program Questioned. ABC World News (10/2, story 5, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Congressional page program has…seen scandal before, most notably the House censored two Representatives in 1983." The New York Times' John Tierney (10/3) writes, "Congress sees nothing strange about dragging teenagers from their families and schools to become pages, one step below a squire in the feudal food chain. … The justification for the page program is that it gives teenagers an insider's glimpse of how Congress works. But why disillusion them at such a tender age?" The Hill (10/3, Kucinich) reports Hastert "announced several changes to the page program yesterday at a joint press conference with Shimkus including the establishment of a hotline for 'parents, grandparents, pages, former pages."

Man Kills Four, Wounds Seven At Amish School In Pennsylvania. A dairy truck driver walked into a one room Amish schoolhouse in Nickel Mines, Pennsylvania yesterday and tried to execute the girls there. The New York Times (10/3, Kocieniewski, Gately) reports that police say Charles Roberts succeeded in killing four of the girls and wounding seven others before killing himself. The Times adds, "The heavily armed gunman first ordered the 15 boys in the room to leave, along with several adults, and demanded that the 11 girls line up facing the blackboard. As the gunman lashed the students' legs together with wire and plastic ties, the teacher dashed from the room and called the police around 10:35 a.m." Roberts "killed himself as the police stormed" the school.

A front page story in the Washington Post (10/3, A1, McCaffrey, Duggan) reports, "Of the seven other girls who were shot, as many as six were critically wounded. Their conditions were 'very, very dire,' said Col. Jeffery B. Miller, commissioner of the state police. Miller called it 'a horrendous crime scene' and said the victims, at least one as young as 6, were shot at close range in the back of the head. The condition of one girl, a 13-year- old, was upgraded last night to serious, a hospital official said."

NBC Nightly News (10/2, lead story, 2:50, Ellis) reported, "Hours after the shooting police walked the nearby field in a line searching for children that might have escaped the violence to hide in the familiar fields. According to police no children were found in the police. As for a motive police say this is a grudge that Roberts held for some 20 years but not against the Amish. Police are calling this a crime of convenience saying it was close to his home and at a school that had no security. Police are saying there is a lot of evidence that Roberts were planning this for a long time and that he was planning along siege."

The Washington Times/AP (10/3, Scolforo) reports, "The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts IV, a 32-year-old truck driver from the nearby town of Bart, was bent on killing young girls as a way of 'acting out in revenge for something that happened 20 years ago,' Col. Miller said, though he gave no details on what the grudge was." The AP adds, " Roberts was not Amish and apparently had nothing against the religious community, Col. Miller said. Instead, Col. Miller said, he apparently picked the school because it was close by, there were girls there and it had little or no security."

ABC World News (10/2, lead story, 3:10, Muir) reported, "We're getting late word about the gunman who backed his pickup truck to the schoolhouse about a half mile down the road here, investigators tell us late tonight he had three guns, two stun guns, two knives and 600 rounds of ammunition. He was prepared for a long siege here and why this schoolhouse? Because he knew it wouldn't be secure, surrounded by only white fencing and acres and acres of farmland."

CBS Evening News (10/2, lead story, 3:20, Pitts) reported, "Authorities found what they described as a suicide note at Roberts' home in the neighboring town. He had apparently worked his shift last night at the local milk plant. This morning he took his own children to the bus stop. Minutes before the fatal shooting, he called his wife from inside the school on his cell phone." Miller: "He did make a statement to his wife on the phone that he was acting out in a way to achieve revenge for something that happened 20 years ago."

USA Today (10/3, Frank, Levin) reports that "the rural seclusion the Amish have here in central Pennsylvania's rolling hills was shattered Monday by the execution-style shooting of three Amish girls in a one-room schoolhouse. … The killings — the girls were bound together and had to be cut apart by rescue workers according to the Pennsylvania State Police — devastated the ordinarily composed Amish. Many were 'crying and weeping and hugging, and the Amish people don't usually show too much emotion,' said Annie Beiler, 66, whose farm abuts the school property."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/3, Barnes, Mauriello) reports, "Mr. Roberts, apparently seeking revenge for a mysterious incident 20 years ago when he was a boy, had planned the slaughter for days, based on the weapons, tools and other equipment police recovered inside the school. … 'It's clear to us he did a great deal of planning in this,' said state police Commissioner Jeffrey Miller. 'It was clear he intended to be prepared for a lengthy siege. It was not a spur of the moment thing. He intended to harm these kids and himself.'" The Post-Gazette adds, "The incident did not appear to be related to the Amish. Mr. Roberts is not Amish. … Col. Miller would say little else about a motive except that something might have happened 20 years ago, when Mr. Roberts was 12. Col Miller refused to elaborate. … He also said the death of Mr. Roberts' infant daughter in 1997 may have played a part in yesterday's tragedy."

Bloomberg (10/3, Zeranski, Dolmetsch) reports, "Roberts was armed with a semi-automatic handgun, a shotgun, a stun gun and several knives, in addition to tools such as a hammer, hacksaw and wooden boards he used to barricade the classroom after letting some of the people go, said Miller, who added that Roberts had no previous criminal record." Bloomberg adds, "The killings were the third attack at an American school in six days. A gunman took six students hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colorado, before killing one girl and himself on Sept. 27. A principal in Wisconsin was shot to death by a former student on Sept. 29."

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Barry, Simon) reports, "Employed by Land O'Lakes and assigned to deliver milk for a subsidiary called Northwest Food Products, Roberts was known around the community as outgoing and personable. Co-workers told authorities that Roberts had seemed tense of late, not his usual, quick-to-joke self, but had been more relaxed in the past few days." The Times adds, "But Roberts' brutality evoked very little anger among the community

Monday. Men in broad-brimmed hats and suspenders and women in bonnets and long dark dresses expressed grief and shock, but in hushed, muted tones. … Rather than dwell on the victims -- though this is a close-knit community, where few are strangers -- Amish residents spoke of their concern for Roberts' family; their sorrow that a man could become so unhinged, so alienated from the Lord."

Local Television. More that 1,200 local television newscasts reported that a gunman attacked a one-room Amish school in rural Pennsylvania, shooting dead three girls before killing himself. In general, the incident was seen as part of series of ongoing violence that has recently hit US schools.

WPTY-TV Memphis, (9/2, 10:36 p.m.) reported, "What happened today in the West Nickel Mines Amish School in rural county Pennsylvania has horrified the country. Three girls, one teacher's aid murdered in cold blood and now word that a fourth may have died. All shot in the head by a gunman wreaking a terrible vengeance for a still unknown wrong he suffered long ago."

KKCO-TV Grand Junction, (9/2, 9:59 p.m.) reported, "A 32-year-old truck driver took more than a dozen girls hostage in a one room Amish school in Pennsylvania, killing at least three children and injuring 8 others. Then the gunman killed himself during a running gun battle with police. It was the nation's third deadly school shooting in the past week."

KOLN-TV Lincoln, (9/2, 4:59 p.m.) reported, "Authorities say the shooter wrote in a note he wanted revenge for something that happened 20 years ago."

WHYY-TV Philadelphia, (9/2, 5:32 p.m.) reported, "Today's school violence comes in the wake of last week's shooting of a principal in Wisconsin and shooting of a teenaged girl in Colorado."

KABC-TV Los Angeles, (9/2, 5:02 p.m.) reported, "Today's Amish school massacre is one of…school shootings and disturbances stretching from Colorado to Wisconsin, to Nevada, to nickel mines, Pennsylvania. In two of the incidents, gunmen targeted girls as victims."

WRC-TV Washington, DC, (9/2, 1:02 p.m.) reported, "Just today, a massacre in a one-room Amish school in Pennsylvania. The victims, again, all girls. With the American Association of School Administrators, saying security is a great concern. It's very difficult to prevent against all of these things because if you are dealing with people who are off the scale in terms of normalcy and they are willing to do almost anything to themselves, it's very difficult to protect a school or any other place. A therapist says the feeling of being afraid in school is something many children in her community live with every day."

WVIT-TV Hartford, (9/2, 5:30 p.m.) reported, "Psychologists say there are definitely things parents should keep in mind when deciding whether to talk to kids about school violence. Their age is a good indication of just how much, if anything, you should say."

KTVX-TV Salt Lake City, (9/2, 10:03 p.m.) reported, "The rash of school violence across the country has many parents wondering what's being done to keep our children safe 'close to home."

WISN-TV Milwaukee, (9/2, 6:36 p.m.) reported, "Federal funding is on the decline for programs aimed at stopping school violence. Records show funding was nearly $440 million in 2001. It has fallen to $346 million this year and even less is being set aside for next year."

WJLA-TV Washington, DC, (9/2, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "This is the nation's third school shooting in less than one week."

KDVR-TV Denver, (9/2, 9:28 p.m.) reported, "Some are wondering if this is a case of copycat shooters. There are some similarities between today's shooting and what happened in Bailey."

Expelled Student Shows Up At Las Vegas School With Gun, Flees. The AP (10/3, Ritter) reports, "Four public school campuses were locked down Monday while police searched for a teenager who was spotted at a high school with a gun, authorities said." The AP continues, "No shots were fired, and police said they had no indication the teen -- a former student who had been banned from Mojave High School -- had threatened anyone." The AP adds, "Police gave up their search of a residential area in suburban North Las Vegas after more than three hours. … 'We know who he is,' North Las Vegas police spokesman Tim Bedwell said. 'He will be found eventually.'" The AP notes, "Bedwell would not disclose the teen's name or age, but said he believed the youth had been expelled or transferred from the high school for academic or disciplinary reasons."

The New York Times (10/3, Scott) reports, "The youth was expelled from the school, Mojave High, in the last academic year, though it is not clear why. The authorities were waiting for him there Monday morning, having received a tip from a student, said Sgt. Phil Gervasi of the Clark County school district police." The Times adds, "When the youth recognized the officers, Sergeant Gervasi said, he dropped the loaded .25-caliber pistol and fled. After three hours, the search in the neighborhood was called off, he said. … 'They're still looking for an AK-47 he stole from his parents' house,' Sergeant Gervasi said."

Judge Sets $750,000 Bail In Wisconsin School Shooting Case. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel/AP (10/3, Staff, Press) reports, "A Sauk County prosecutor told a judge Monday that 15-year-old Eric Hainstock may have had other targets in mind when he entered his high school and killed his principal Friday." The Sentinel continues, "District Attorney Patricia Barrett disclosed the potential of other targets in successfully arguing for a bail amount of $750,000 for the teen, who remains in the Sauk County Law Enforcement Center." The Sentinel adds, "Hainstock appeared in court with his attorneys through a video feed from jail. When Circuit Judge Patrick Taggart asked him if he understood he could face life in prison, Hainstock replied calmly and firmly, 'I do.' … In following Barrett's bail recommendation, the judge said, 'It goes without saying the public does need protection in this matter.'" The Sentinel notes, "Barrett told the judge there were other 'persons of interest' for Hainstock when he went to Weston Schools Friday morning and shot Principal John Klang."

The AP (10/3, Richmond) reports, "Hainstock's attorneys asked for $10,000 bail, saying the teen has lived in the Sauk County area his whole life and has no convictions. … But Circuit Judge Patrick Taggart agreed with Barrett. … If Hainstock were to post the $750,000 cash bond, he would have to submit to electronic monitoring, the judge said. He also would be barred from leaving Sauk County or having contact with anyone at the schools or the Klang family." The AP notes, "He has been charged with first-degree intentional homicide. Wisconsin does not have the death penalty. … Taggart set a pretrial conference for Hainstock for Oct. 13."

Bush Directs Gonzales, Spellings To Convene School Violence Conference. The AP (10/3, Pickler) reports, "The Bush administration will host a conference next week to discuss the recent string of school violence across the country, the White House said Monday." The AP continues, "Presidential spokeswoman Dana Perino said the conference will bring together education and law enforcement officials to talk about the nature of the problem and federal action that can help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath." The AP adds, "Three schools have been hit by deadly attacks in the past week. A gunman killed himself and three others Monday at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania; on Friday a 15-year-old Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal; and last Wednesday a man took six girls hostage in Colorado, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself. … 'The president is deeply saddened and troubled by the recent school violence and shootings that have taken place in different communities across America,' Perino said. 'It breaks America's collective heart when innocent children who are at school to learn are violently taken hostage and cut down in their own schools.'" The AP notes, "Perino said the conference was still in the planning stages, so a specific date, location and other details were not ready to be announced. It was not clear whether President Bush would attend."

Bloomberg (10/3, Zeranski, Dolmetsch) reports, "President George W. Bush instructed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting in Washington next week among educators and law enforcement officials to come up with ways to deal with school violence."

AFP (10/3) reports, "Gonzales and Spellings met Monday with Bush's domestic policy adviser, Zinsmeister, to discuss the issue, Perino said."

USA Today (10/3, Levin, Parker) reports, " "It was the third fatal school shooting in the USA in six days. … In Washington, meanwhile, the White House said President Bush will convene a conference on school violence next week."

ABC's Nightline (9/2, 11:59 p.m.) reported, "The white House is stepping in. President Bush, next week, brings together law enforcement and educational officials to figure out what the government can do to stem this innocence of killings."

The Bush administration announcement that it will hold a conference on school violence received moderate and straightforward coverage by local television newscasts. All newscasts agreed that the latest incidents that hit U.S. schools may be behind the decision. Some examples: WATE-TV Knoxville, (9/2, 10:59 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is planning a conference next week to address the string of school violence. The plan is to bring together education and law enforcement to figure out which federal resources can be brought in to prevent school violence and respond to it. President Bush says he is troubled by the shootings."

DOJ_NMG_0073226

WSVN-TV Miami, (9/2, 10:01 p.m.) reported, "Today's violence makes it the third U.S. school shooting in less than a week. Tonight, The White House is announcing President Bush plan to hold a special conference on school violence next week in Washington."

WPXI-TV Pittsburgh, (9/2, 11:05 p.m.) reported, "President Bush says he is saddened by the recent school violence and will address the issue at a news conference next week."

Schools Urged To Watch For Signs Of Emotional Distress In Children. USA Today (10/3, Davis) reports, "School safety experts say that the first order of business in classrooms across the nation today should be to take the psychological pulse of children. The slayings at a Pennsylvania schoolhouse Monday most likely sent shivers of fear through students, teachers and parents everywhere, they say." Experts "say children can be upset even if they're not directly involved with a tragedy. They say disturbing events can stir up the memory of trauma from a child's past. Signs of emotional distress include lethargy or withdrawal and changes in personality, appetite or sleep."

NYTimes, WPost See Gun Laws As Tool To Curb Rash Of School Shootings. The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) editorializes, "No one will rise up to defend a man who walks into an Amish school, lines young girls up against a blackboard, ties up their feet, and then kills them before killing himself. But a surprising number of people will inevitably rise up to defend his guns, to call the man guilty but his weapons innocent. … This is the third school shooting in a week. What will stick in almost everyone's minds is the gross disparity between Mr. Roberts's murderous intentions and the bucolic peacefulness of an Amish school in early October. But this killing is no different from the ones that took place in Wisconsin and Colorado recently. The weapons were the same, and so was the conflict between the hideous assault of a damaged mind and the atmosphere of openness and trust that makes education possible. … Most gun owners are respectable, law-abiding citizens. But that is no reason to acquit the guns."

The Washington Post (10/3, A16, 748K), in an editorial, notes that "there are those who will argue that nothing -- least of all laws controlling guns -- can stop a madman. That doesn't mean, though, that we shouldn't try. Sadly, rather than making it harder for the wrong people to get guns, some in Congress are seeking to make it easier. … We hope that the singular calamity that befell this community will wake up the nation to do something about the madness it can control."

Online Gambling Exec Predicts Industry Consolidation. The Financial Times (10/3, Blitz, Correspondent) reports, "Internet gambling companies face a wave of consolidation in the wake of the US clampdown on online gaming, which could see American casinos and gambling businesses swooping for bargains in the sector, the heads of two of the biggest online gambling sites said on Monday. Mitch Garber, chief executive of PartyGaming, and Gigi Levy, who takes over as chief of 888 Holdings this year, made their predictions as the sector felt the impact of the bill passed in the Senate on Friday making it illegal for banks and credit card companies to process online gaming payments from the US." Garber "told the Financial Times that he expected the pace of consolidation to quicken, with MGM and Harrah's, which built their gaming empires around the fully regulated Las Vegas casino industry, likely to step in."

UK Online Gambling Companies May Stop Doing Business In US. The Wall Street Journal/AP (10/3) reports, "Several British online gambling companies may cease doing business in the US as a result of Congress passing legislation prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for online gaming. PartyGaming PLC, the world's biggest online gambling company, said it would pull out of the US if President Bush signs the legislation into law. Meanwhile, 888 Holdings PLC said it's suspending online betting operations in the US and Sportingbet PLC said it called off takeover talks with World Gaming PLC." The legislation passed the house and Senate as part of a port securities bill over the weekend.

The Washington Post/AP (10/3, D5, Barr) reports, "Shares in British online gambling companies dived Monday after Congress passed legislation prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for online gaming. … Shares in PartyGaming plunged 58 percent yesterday to end at 84 cents, shares in 888 sank 26.1 percent to finish at $2.03, while Sportingbet shares dropped 64.5 percent to close at $1.24."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/3, Emling) reports, "Top online gambling companies said Monday they were preparing to suspend their U.S. operations after Congress approved a bill aimed at cutting off cash flowing to their Internet sites." The AJC continues, "The Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, abruptly passed Saturday as part of a port securities bill, bans banks and credit card companies from accepting checks and electronic payments from customers using Internet gaming sites. President Bush is expected to sign the measure." The AJC adds, "The congressional action sent gaming companies' stocks into a tailspin. … Shares of PartyGaming PLC, which operates the world's most popular poker site, PartyPoker, fell 58 percent on Monday, and those of Sportingbet, which owns ParadisePoker.com, fell 64 percent. Overall, the plunge wiped up to $7.5 billion in market capitalization off the books. .. . Another major operator, 888 Holdings, said it had suspended its online betting U.S. operations, and PartyGaming said it would do so once the act is signed."

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Hiltzik) reports, "Online gambling companies were grappling with a new crisis Monday after the Senate quietly passed a bill forbidding American banks and credit card companies from processing payments to them." The Times continues, "Shares of publicly traded Internet gaming operators plummeted on the London Stock Exchange after the measure was attached as a rider to a bill designed to enhance U.S. port security and passed late Friday. .. .The House passed a similar bill this year, and the legislation is expected to be signed by President Bush. It prohibits banks and credit card companies from making payments to online gaming websites that appear on a list to be drafted within nine months by the Justice Department and the Federal Reserve." The Times adds, "Online websites also would be prohibited from accepting U.S. payments, but because most are based overseas, the ability of U.S. authorities to prosecute them is uncertain. … Also unclear is what sort of gambling falls under the prohibition. Although Internet sports betting is plainly outlawed by the federal Wire Act, there is some doubt whether online poker or other games fall under the same prohibition."

USA Today (10/3, McCarthy, Swartz) reports, "Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee tacked the bill on to the popular Safe Port Act bill on Saturday, before Congress went into recess for November's elections. … The surprise passage of the law threw the online gambling industry into a tailspin Monday." USA adds, "The federal government has been cracking down on Internet betting on sports, poker and other casino games that it considers illegal under the 1961 Wire Act. Considering that American bettors generate 50%-60% of industrywide revenue, many operators will be forced to either cash in their chips and go out of business or sell or merge with another provider, experts say. … Roughly half the estimated 500 companies operating 2,300 gambling websites across the Caribbean, Central America and Europe could be wiped out, predicts Sue Schneider, publisher of Interactive Gaming News. The survivors will have to make do on sharply reduced revenue, while seeking ways around the U.S. ban and building up their business in Asia. … After the bill is signed, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will have 270 days to determine how the law will be enforced."

DOJ Grant Will Fund Mississippi Domestic Violence Unit. The AP (10/3) reports, "A new domestic violence unit is being established by the Mississippi attorney general's office and funded by a $1.5 million grant." The AP continues, "The unit will act as a resource for law enforcement, prosecutors, judges and all other individuals or entities having legal duties related to domestic violence victims or providing services to victims. … 'What this division does is bring a cohesiveness to the state's efforts to fight domestic violence,' said Attorney General Jim Hood. 'Our state ranks second highest in the nation for domestic violence. That dubious distinction alone is enough to say we have to improve our efforts and that's what we are dedicated to doing.'" The AP adds, "Hood's office said the unit will partner with the Administrative Office of Courts, the Judicial College, the Mississippi Department of Public Safety Planning and the Mississippi Coalition Against Domestic Violence. … The two-year grant was awarded by the U.S. Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women."

Philadelphia Police Dispatchers Charged With Extortion. The AP (10/3) reports two Philadelphia police civilian "radio dispatchers are facing federal extortion charges after investigators said they provided names and addresses connected to auto license tags to someone they thought was going to rob the homes." Patricia Bradley and Tamara Mitchell "have been charged with extortion and aiding and abetting, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said Monday. The women ran license tags on the police department's computer system and gave the names and addresses connected to those tags to a man they believed was going to rob the residences, according to investigators with the FBI and the city police department's internal affairs division. Investigators said Bradley and Mitchell believed that the vehicles, two registered in Pennsylvania and two in New Jersey, belonged to drug dealers."

The Philadelphia Daily News (10/3, Hinkelman, 109K) reports that "the man to whom they peddled the names and addresses turned out to be a government informant," and US Attorney Patrick Meehan said, "These defendants deliberately undermined the work of the very officers they were supposed to be supporting." The Daily News adds, "The feds said the informant had given money to the defendants in exchange for names and addresses related to the tags. The amount of money handed over by the informant typically ranged from $50 to $100 per name and address, said a person familiar with the investigation." The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/3, Arnold, 399K) also reports on the charges, but does not mention the FBI role in the investigation.

Former FBI Informant Sentenced To 90 Years In Prison For NJ Heists. The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) reports, "A man who once served as an F.B.I. informant was sentenced in Federal District Court yesterday to 90 years in prison for a series of bank robberies" in New Jersey. US Attorney Christopher J. Christie said that Michael Giubilo "was arrested by federal agents as he was about to enter the Bank of New York in Millburn, Mr. Christie said. At trial, he said, Mr. Giubilo claimed that he had been set up by the F.B.I. In 1997, a federal judge ordered that Mr. Giubilo stop working as an informant because of his continued criminal activity, including weapons possession and eluding the police, Mr. Christie said."

Lorusso To Testify In Jemal Trial Today. The Washington Post (10/3, B6, Leonnig) reports, "No witness is more crucial or more awaited in the bribery trial of downtown developer Douglas Jemal than the D.C. government refugee expected to testify today: Jemal's former drinking buddy and disgraced former city official Michael A. Lorusso. … Lorusso, 40, pleaded guilty in 2004 to taking cash bribes and gifts from Jemal and his development company's officers in exchange for crafting sweetheart deals that would give Jemal's company millions of city taxpayer dollars it didn't earn. But in newly filed court papers, Jemal's defense attorneys say jurors should not believe Lorusso and that the former deputy director of the D.C. Office of Property Management got a sweet deal himself by tantalizing prosecutors with tales of bribes from a big local fish. Jemal has maintained that anything he gave Lorusso was a gift to a friend, without any strings attached -- just as when the developer picks up the Friday night tab for his pals at the Capitol Grille."

Mississippi Man Sentenced To Two Years In Prison For FEMA Fraud. The AP (10/3) reports Bryan Michael Beets of Vicksburg "has been sentenced to two years in prison. … U.S. District Judge David C. Bramlette ordered Beets to pay $3,854 in restitution, which is payable to FEMA and the American Red Cross. Beets was accused of falsely claiming to live in a Long Beach dwelling that was damaged by Katrina, when he actually was living and working in Vicksburg. Beets was convicted in federal court in June." In a statement yesterday announcing the sentence, US Attorney Dunn Lampton said, "The prosecution and sentence today show the continuing commitment of the Katrina Fraud Task Force to uphold the U.S. Attorney General's mandate of zero tolerance of Katrina fraud."

Louisiana Woman Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison For Katrina Fraud. The AP (10/3) reports Tarsha Johnson of Baton Rouge "was sentenced to 18 months in prison on Monday for making a false claim to get disaster aid after Hurricane Katrina, a U.S. attorney said." She "pleaded guilty May 8 to making a false claim." U.S. District Judge Frank J. Polozola "also ordered her to perform 50 hours of community service and to pay $2,000 in restitution."

the Tampa-Hillsborough Expressway Authority, an agency board member confirmed Monday." Hillsborough County Commissioner Tom Scott "said he spoke with investigators from the two federal agencies last week for more than 90 minutes. 'I was invited to meet with them and they are looking at the (Expressway Authority),' Scott said. 'But I can't disclose the content of their questions in order not to hinder their investigation.'" The Times notes, "The criminal inquiry is the third investigation into the agency since late August, when details emerged about possible conflicts of interest, violations of ethics and public record laws, and questionable billings by lobbyists."

FBI, Connecticut Authorities Investigating Interstate Construction Defects. The AP (10/3) reports, "Gov. M. Jodi Rell ordered an independent audit Monday into contracts, work performance and the Department of Transportation in connection with construction defects plaguing a $52 million improvement project of Interstate 84. Also Monday, state Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said his office is investigating the project, which involves a 31/2-mile stretch of the highway between Waterbury and Cheshire." The AP adds, "Authorities with the FBI and other federal agencies are investigating the problems, which could also add months to a project that was supposed to be completed a year ago. Many of the drains lead nowhere, some are clogged with debris and others were apparently connected with substandard, cracked and leaking pipes, the newspaper reported."

Investigation Finds Inappropriate Expenditures At Getty. After a yearlong investigation, the California attorney general's office has concluded that the J. Paul Getty Trusts's former chief executive Barry Munitz and the Trust's board made a number of inappropriate expenditures, but will not be the subject of legal action because the money was returned. The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Felch, Frammolino) reports, "The misuse of the Getty's tax-exempt money included excessive travel expenses by Munitz and his wife, Munitz's extensive use of his staff for personal errands, his payment of consulting fees to a former Getty intern, and gifts of artwork to retiring trustees, according to the report released today by the attorney general's office." Attorney General Bill Lockyer "will take no legal action against the trust, Munitz or board members, the report said." Lockyer "has appointed an independent monitor, former state Atty. Gen. John K. Van de Kamp, to ensure the Getty carries through with its promised reforms over the next two years."

The New York Times (10/3, Wyatt, Kennedy) reports, "The report stated that the misuse of funds did not result from fraud and that the value of a settlement between the former president, Barry Munitz, and the trust exceeded the value of the losses from any improper payments. The Getty, which has adopted several reforms since Mr. Munitz resigned under pressure in February, expressed satisfaction with the results of the inquiry."

DNA Test May Win New Trials For Two Convicted Murderers. The Washington Post (10/3, B4, Londoano) reports, "Two of Colleen Williar's neighbors were convicted of murder after the 24-year-old woman was raped, strangled with a sock and repeatedly stabbed in her Baltimore home nearly two decades ago. Now, a vaginal swab from the autopsy that was recently compared with DNA samples from the men might win new trials for James L. Owens, 41, and James Thompson, 47. The men were convicted in 1988 during separate trials in which relatively weak physical evidence was supported by a last-minute confession by Thompson. He later recanted, and both men now say they were innocent bystanders who came under suspicion after telling a series of lies that began as an attempt to cash in on police reward money. Defense lawyers said the case could mark the first time in Maryland history that a post-conviction DNA test clears co-defendants convicted of murder."

Judge Rejects Motion To Unseal Karr Child Porn Investigation Documents. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/3, Wohlsen) reports, "A judge refused to unseal police documents in the child pornography case against former JonBenet Ramsey slaying suspect John Mark Karr, whose attorneys are fighting to have the misdemeanor charges tossed out. The Press Democrat of Santa Rosa had sought to view the documents…but Sonoma County Judge Cerena Wong agreed with prosecutors who argued it could harm the investigation and prejudice potential jurors." The AP adds that the trial "was postponed for further hearings Tuesday on defense motions to dismiss the case or throw out newly revealed computer data. … Sonoma County Deputy County Counsel Anne Keck told the judge the FBI was comparing images of teenagers found on Karr's computer equipment with a national database of child porn victims," but

"FBI spokesman Joe Schadler later said the bureau's role in the Karr investigation had ended, and was limited to providing expert testimony and forensic analysis of five pictures discovered on Karr's computer in 2001. 'We're not doing any further forensic work,' he said."

Former Nevada Controller's First Husband To Be Exhumed In Murder Probe. The New York Times (10/3, Friess, 1.21M) reports that the investigation into the death of former Nevada Controller Kathy Augustine "has prompted the authorities to look into another death three years ago, that of her first husband, Charles Augustine, 63, who died in a Las Vegas hospital where he was being cared for by" Chaz Higgs – Kathy Augustine's second husband and the lead suspect in her murder. "David Roger, the district attorney for Clark County, announced Monday that investigators would exhume Mr. Augustine's body to check for traces of the same drug that officials say killed Ms. Augustine." The Times notes, "With no visible explanation for the death, Ms. Augustine's blood samples were sent to the F.B.I. laboratory in Quantico, Va. Last week, the lab reported the presence of succinylcholine, and Ms. Augustine's death was ruled a homicide."

Higgs Waives Extradition Hearing. The Washington Times (10/3, Seper, 88K) reports Higgs yesterday "waived extradition to face first-degree murder charges in Nevada. Arrested Friday by FBI agents in Hampton, where he had been staying with relatives, Mr. Higgs is suspected of killing Mrs. Augustine with an injection of a powerful muscle relaxant. Handcuffed and wearing an orange jail jumpsuit, Mr. Higgs said nothing during the brief hearing."

Baltimore Man Arrested For Shooting Neighbor. The Baltimore Sun (10/3, Linskey) reports, "A 40-year-old man was arrested by police Monday afternoon, ending a seven-hour standoff in a Northeast Baltimore neighborhood that police said began when he allegedly used a shotgun to kill a neighbor who was cleaning his truck. Police declined to speculate on a motive for the slaying that occurred about 6 a.m. in the Belair-Edison neighborhood, but they said the suspect spoke briefly with the victim before the shooting." A police spokesman "identified the suspect as Marvin Ferguson of the 3800 block of Lyndale Ave. Police said Monday night that he was being questioned by homicide detectives but had not yet been charged. Immediately after the shooting, Ferguson stood outside until he heard police sirens, and then retreated into his home and refused to speak with negotiators, said Agent Donny Moses, a police spokesman."

Child Molester's Manuscript Used To Convict Him. Dean Schwartzmiller of San Jose, California has been convicted of child molestation based on testimony from eight of his victims and a manuscript he was writing about his 35 years as a pedophile. The Washington Times (10/3, Wetzstein) reports that Schwartzmiller "faces up to 153 years in prison when he is sentenced Oct. 16 on 12 charges of child molestation, taking obscene pictures of a minor and possession of child pornography. Law-enforcement officials said the case is unique because of the memoir manuscript and seven spiral notebooks, written in code, that contained more than 36,000 entries about Schwartzmiller's sexual activities with children."

Critical Care Nurse Charged With Killing His Wife. The New York Times (10/3, Friess) reports, "One day before his apparently healthy wife stopped breathing and collapsed, Chaz Higgs, a critical care nurse, is said to have engaged in what seemed at the time to be idle chatter with a co-worker about the best way to kill a spouse, according to an indictment returned last week charging Mr. Higgs with his wife's murder. The way to do it and get away with it, Mr. Higgs is said to have told another nurse, is with an injection of the paralytic drug succinylcholine because it frequently goes undetected in autopsies." The Times adds, "Now, the investigation into the death of Ms. Augustine has prompted the authorities to look into another death three years ago, that of her first husband, Charles Augustine, 63, who died in a Las Vegas hospital where he was being cared for by Mr. Higgs. David Roger, the district attorney for Clark County, announced Monday that investigators would exhume Mr. Augustine's body to check for traces of the same drug that officials say killed Ms. Augustine."

The Washington Times (10/3, Seper) reports that Higgs "told authorities he found his wife unconscious in bed at their home in Reno and called police, saying she had suffered a heart attack. He told police she was suffering from extreme stress from an ongoing campaign for state treasurer, where she faced fundraising problems and opposition from her own party. But Reno Police Deputy Chief Jim Johns later confirmed that a preliminary autopsy found no evidence of heart disease that would trigger an attack and a complete autopsy was ordered. … According to a police report, medical examiners found a needle mark on Mrs. Augustine's buttocks that could not be explained."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Kentucky Jail Officer Says He Is FBI Informant In Civil Rights Probe. The Lexington Herald-Leader (10/3, Musgrave, Ku, Blackford, 118K) reports, "An officer at the Fayette County jail who is running for jailer in Jessamine County says he alerted the FBI to allegations of excessive force at Lexington's jail. John Vest, a corporal who has worked at the Fayette jail since 2003, said at a press conference yesterday that he has been working with the FBI in its investigation of alleged unnecessary force and civil rights violations against prisoners for 'an undisclosed period of time.' … David Beyer, an FBI spokesman, said he could neither confirm or deny that Vest has been working with federal officials on the case." The Leader adds, "After Vest's announcement, jail officials questioned Vest's credibility, saying he has been involved in three use-of-force incidents during the three years he's been at the jail." Fayette County Detention Center director Ron Bishop said, "It makes a lot more sense now, when you look at the timing and his running for office."

The AP (10/3) notes, "Vest declined to comment on the disciplinary actions against him, saying it was part of the FBI investigation. 'I really wish that I could, but it violates the integrity of the case,' Vest said. … Vest's spokesman, David Adams, said neither he nor Vest could comment on whether Vest's work with the FBI came before or after he decided to run for office." WTVQ-TV Lexington (10/2, Stotelmyer) reported, "Bishop says the FBI search bothers him. He claims the jail has handled the use of force and allegations of excessive force properly. He says Vest never approached him about problems," and he "questions Vest's motives because Vest is the Republican candidate for jailer in next month's election." However, "Vest says before the FBI used him they 'checked me out, my credibility, my integrity.' Vest says he's done a good job as an inside informant. 'I did a lot and what I did, I did good,' said Vest."

EEOC Rules For Dismissed Chesapeake, VA, Deputies. The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot (10/3, Clayton) reports, "The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has ruled in favor of two sheriff's deputies who said they were fired in retaliation for a discrimination lawsuit that alleged a hostile, racist work environment." The V-P continues, "The agency sent a letter to Tony Ellis notifying him of the ruling and suggesting an agreement that would require Sheriff John R. Newhart's office to reinstate Ellis, who was fired Dec. 30. The suggested agreement also requires Newhart to give Ellis back pay and benefits, punitive and compensatory damages, and attorneys' fees and to conduct on-site EEOC training for all supervisors and expunge all references to Ellis' dismissal in his personnel file." The V-P adds, "David Cahoon, who was set to testify in Ellis' case last year, also was fired and received the same ruling last week from the EEOC. … Ellis said EEOC officials told him that if the Sheriff's Department doesn't respond within 10 days, the case will be sent to the U.S. Justice Department. … Ellis was demoted from the rank of lieutenant in May 2004 because he didn't file a report about the use of force on a jail inmate on time. He filed a discrimination complaint with the EEOC and was given a right-to-sue letter, he said. .. .Ellis filed suit in U.S. District Court against the sheriff and the department in November 2004 alleging he was demoted because he is black and that racial disparities in the department led to inmate mistreatment, violence among employees and other incidents. .. .A federal judge dismissed the suit in November 2005. A month later, on Dec. 30, Cahoon and Ellis were fired. Ellis had worked for the department for 20 years; Cahoon for 21 years."

Lawsuit Seeks Declaration That Student May Read Bible During Free Time At School. The Washington Post (10/3, B4, Rich) reports Maryann Mangum filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt alleging that Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School Vice Principal Jeanetta Rainey "ordered" her daughter Amber, "then 12, to stop reading the Bible or face punishment." The girl was a "frequent reader during lunch breaks" and "in the spare minutes before afternoon classes. The habit was never viewed as a problem…until the book she was reading was the Bible." The lawsuit alleges that Rainey said "reading the Bible violated school policy and that she would face discipline if she continued to do so." Mangum is being advised by the Rutherford Institute. Institute President John W. Whitehead said that the suit "does not specifically seek monetary damages but rather that a judge declare that students cannot be barred from reading the Bible during free time at school."

Euclid, OH, Approves Remap Plan Aimed At Settling DOJ Suit. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (10/3, Atassi) reports that the Euclid, OH, City Council "unanimously approved a redistricting plan to help settle a federal lawsuit that contends the city's election system prevents black candidates from winning council seats." The Plain Dealer continues, "Under the new system, which will take effect in time for the 2007 election, Ward 4's black population would decrease from 54 percent to about 51 percent, and the percentage of black residents in Ward 3 would increase from about 39 percent to 45 percent. … About 13 percent of residents would be assigned a new ward, and the city's five at-large seats would remain." The Plain Dealer adds, "City officials hope the plan will satisfy the Justice Department, which filed suit in July after a three-year investigation concluded that broadly drawn districts and a system for electing at-large council members have diluted minority voting strength. … Leading into council's vote Monday night, city officials did their best to ease the worries of residents who stepped to the lectern and said that although they believe the Justice Department's accusations are out of line, adopting the proposal seems to be an admission of guilt. … In June, the Justice Department proposed that the city shore up minority voting power by breaking four wards into eight -- two of which would be predominantly black -- and eliminating all at-large seats but the council president's."

Workplace Discrimination Against Arabs, Muslims Said To Be Rising Again. The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Semuels, 918K) reports, "Reports of workplace discrimination against people perceived to be Muslim or Arab soared after the Sept. 11 attacks and then declined, government statistics indicate. But some advocates say they've seen a resurgence in the last year that corresponds to global political events. … 'We only see the tip of the iceberg,' said Joan Ehrlich, district director of the EEOC office in San Francisco. 'It's probably not even reflective of the amount of discrimination going on because people are afraid to come to the government for help.'" The Times notes, "In a case filed recently by EEOC attorney [Anna] Park, seven Yemeni sailors working for Norwegian Cruise Line were fired in rapid succession 'because they looked Muslim,' Park said. The firings occurred after the FBI began investigating a report that a crew member had asked about the location of a cruise ship's engine room, arousing suspicions. The men were fired before the investigation was completed, the suit alleged."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Settles Dairy Antitrust Dispute With Kentucky. The AP (10/3) reports, "A Kentucky dairy company will be sold to a competitor under a settlement between the U.S. Department of Justice, the state of Kentucky and the Dairy Farmers of America." The AP continues, "Prairie Farms Dairy Inc., of Carlinville, Ill., will buy Southern Belle Dairy Co., of Somerset, from the Dairy Farmers of America to settle an antitrust suit filed by the federal government." The AP adds, "The Allen Family Limited Partnership will also have to sell its interest in Southern Belle as part of the deal. The settlement was filed Monday in U.S. District Court in London. .. .Thomas O. Barnett, assistant U.S. Attorney General over the department's Antitrust Division, said the deal will mean better prices and quality of service in Kentucky and Tennessee. .. .The Justice Department and Kentucky filed suit in 2003 challenging the Dairy Farmers' Association's purchase of the Southern Belle dairy."

The Kansas City Star (10/3) reports, "The Department of Justice said Monday that its settlement with the Kansas City-based cooperative would restore competition in the bidding for school-milk contracts in eastern Kentucky and Tennessee." The Star adds, "The dispute began in 2003 when the federal government sued Dairy Farmers of America over its 2002 acquisition of a 50 percent interest in Southern Belle in Somerset, Ky. That purchase followed Dairy Farmers of America's earlier acquisition of a 50 percent interest in National Dairy Holdings, which owns Flav-O-Rich Dairy of London, Ky. … The government alleged that Dairy Farmers of America's acquisitions gave the cooperative ownership interest in the two dairies that competed against each other to supply milk to 45 school districts in eastern Kentucky. The purchases also reduced the number of bidders from three to two for 55 other school districts in eastern Kentucky and Tennessee, according to the federal government's suit."

The News continues, "The Santa Clara company ran a full-page advertisement in the Financial Times saying that Microsoft, which started selling its own security products this summer, was trying to 'hamstring' competitors. … 'Microsoft seems to envision a world in which one giant company not only controls the systems that drive most computers around the world but also the security that protects those computers from viruses and other online threats,' the advertisement states. '... when it fails, it fails for 97 percent of the world's desktops.'" The News adds, "Microsoft's Vista, which is expected to be released to business customers next month, was designed in cooperation with the security firms and with the goal of providing customers as many security options as possible, said Stephen Toulouse, senior product manager in the security technology unit of Microsoft. .. . In a joint phone interview Monday afternoon, McAfee chairman and chief executive George Samenuk along with the company's chief security architect John Viega said that if Microsoft's intention was truly to protect customers, than it 'would allow legitimate security.' … McAfee's sentiment echoes San Jose-based Symantec, which announced its opposition to Vista limitations two weeks ago."

High Court Denies Northwest Airlines' Antitrust Appeal. The AP (10/3) reports, "The Supreme Court Monday refused to consider a significant antitrust case involving Northwest Airlines and a low-cost competitor that could have set some rules for competition between large airlines and smaller, no-frills rivals." The AP continues, "The case, Northwest Airlines Corp. v. Spirit Airlines Inc., stems from a six-year-old Spirit Airlines suit in which Spirit charged that Northwest engaged in predatory pricing to force Spirit to drop two flights from Detroit, one to Boston, the other to Philadelphia. The case raises key antitrust issues, such as the type of evidence needed to prove that a company engaged in below-cost pricing to drive a competitor out of business." The AP adds, "A district court sided with Northwest, but the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the ruling and found for Spirit Airlines. But the Supreme Court Monday refused to hear the case due to procedural issues related to the timing of an appeal filed by Northwest. The airline filed a petition July 17 but the petition was removed from the court's docket because it was filed five days late. … Northwest asked the court to consider the case despite the late filing, but the court refused, issuing an order denying the 'out-of-time' petition."

SCOTUS Rejects UnitedHealth Ohio Doctor Rate Appeal. Market Watch (10/3) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court Monday rejected an appeal from UnitedHealth Group Inc.'s Ohio unit on whether doctors can go to court with antitrust challenges on reimbursement rates despite existing arbitration pacts." Market Watch continues, "UnitedHealth contends the Cincinnati area doctors are bound by arbitration clauses in the insurance agreements. Ohio state courts, however, have ruled the doctors can pursue their claims in court." Market Watch adds, "The doctors and two medical societies allege UnitedHealth and other insurance companies violated antitrust laws by conspiring to set unreasonably low insurance reimbursements to health-care providers. At issue in the case is whether the antitrust claims fall outside the contract requiring that disputes be handled through arbitration."

Supreme Court Will Not Hear California Competition Case Against AT&T. Market Watch (10/3, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday said it won't decide whether a California company can use state laws to sue AT&T Inc. for alleged anticompetitive conduct in other states." Market Watch continues, "RLH Industries Inc., a surge-protection technology company in Orange, Calif., sued the telecommunications giant in a California court over restrictions in several states that prevented it from selling high voltage protection equipment to local phone companies in markets served by subsidiaries of AT&T." Market Watch adds, "The lawsuit remains pending in a California state trial court after a state appeals court allowed the case to continue. AT&T has argued constitutional limits on state interference with interstate commerce bar the lawsuit from proceeding. …

'A state is and should be flatly forbidden from attempting to govern commerce occurring wholly outside that state,' AT&T said in a court petition. 'Under the decision below, California's antitrust and unfair competition laws would control markets throughout the country.' … RLH Industries maintains that California state courts have jurisdiction to review anticompetitive practices by companies that impact it, even if those practices are taking place in other states. According to the RLH brief, lower courts are still considering some of the issues raised in the AT&T petition to the Supreme Court, making high court review premature."

Broadcom-Qualcomm Global Patent Dispute Heads To ITC. Bloomberg (10/3, Brennan, Decker) reports, "The global patent battle between Qualcomm Inc. and Broadcom Corp. for supremacy in a fast-growing segment of the wireless-telephone industry may be decided in an obscure corner of the Washington bureaucracy." Bloomberg continues, "Broadcom, of Irvine, California, is asking an International Trade Commission official to decide next week to bar imports of handsets that use technology from San Diego-based Qualcomm. Broadcom says the Qualcomm technology, which provides high-speed Internet access and lets users view high-quality videos, violates patents on its chips." Bloomberg adds, "The outcome of the fight may determine control of the U.S. market for so-called 3G, or third-generation, wireless phones, a market that topped $1 billion last year. The stakes are so high for both companies that some experts say they would be foolish not to reach a settlement, rather than risk an adverse decision. … Charles Bullock, an administrative law judge at the commission, is due to decide on Oct. 10 whether the government should bar the Qualcomm-powered phones. Bullock's decision will be reviewed by the six-member commission, which is made up of three Republicans and three Democrats. After that, it may be challenged in a federal appeals court in Washington."

Harrah's Considering $15 Billion Takeover Bid. USA Today (10/3, Yu, Krantz) reports, "Harrah's Entertainment, the world's largest casino operator, was considering Monday an unsolicited $15 billion joint takeover bid from private equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group. … If completed, it would be the third-largest private buyout this year of a U.S. company, says deal tracker Dealogic. … In a statement, Las Vegas-based Harrah's said it has formed a committee of board members to review the proposal to buy the company for $81 a share in cash, a 22% premium over Harrah's Friday close."

The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Sanders) reports, "While Harrah's Entertainment Inc. considers a roughly $15.1 billion offer from private-equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group, the biggest hurdle to a deal may be the long and arduous process of obtaining casino licenses in the many jurisdictions where Harrah's operates." The "biggest wrinkle could involve licensing for any new owners and the time it could take. Neither Apollo nor Texas Pacific executives hold gambling licenses. Individual states issue licenses to casino owners and operators, subjecting applicants to detailed investigations. Officials from Nevada, New Jersey and Missouri -- all states where Harrah's operates casinos -- estimate the licensing process could take as long as two years. Such licensing investigations usually delve deeply into financial and criminal backgrounds of the applicants. But Apollo and Texas Pacific have already begun exploring the options with various state regulators."

Coach Accuses Target Of Selling Fake Bag. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, O'Connell, Hudson) reports that handbag maker Coach Inc. is accusing Target Corp. of marketing a fake Coach bag. In a lawsuit filed in federal court in Manhattan Friday, "Coach alleged that Target was a counterfeiter by selling a Coach-style purse, complete with a hang tag that says 'Coach,' according to Coach Chief Financial Officer Mike Devine. The allegedly fake bag has Coach's signature C-pattern and a touch of snakeskin-like fabric in the center of the bag, according to a photo of it included in the lawsuit. The bag, purchased from a Target store in Largo, Fla., is an 'exact replica of a genuine Coach handbag' bearing at least one Coach trademark, the suit says. … Target, which isn't a licensed distributor of Coach products, said the bag in question is an authentic version and therefore the suit is without merit."

Gilead To Acquire Myogen For $2.5 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Moore, Sechler) reports, "Biopharmaceuticals company Gilead Sciences Inc. agreed to acquire Myogen Inc. for about $2.5 billion, a move aimed at gaining ownership of the biotechnology company's lead product candidate, a potential treatment for pulmonary arterial hypertension. … With the transaction, the Foster City, Calif., company would acquire Myogen's main drug candidate, Ambrisentan, a treatment for pulmonary arterial hypertension that is in late-stage clinical trials."

USA Today/AP (10/3) reports, "Gilead agreed to pay Myogen shareholders $52.50 per share, a premium of 50% over the stock's closing price Friday of $35.08 a share. Myogen's stock hit a 52-week high, while Gilead's shares closed down 6.5% Monday." The AP adds, "The news caught many off guard, not only for the acquisition price but because it represented a shift for Gilead out of its area of expertise in infectious diseases."

Executive Says AMD Is Leading Consumer Choice And Value. Thomas M. McCoy, Executive Vice President, Legal Affairs, and Chief Administrative Officer for AMD, writes in a letter to the Wall Street Journal (10/3), "In his Sept. 23 Rule of Law column 'Tigers by the Tail,' Ron Cass asserts that Advanced Micro Devices is attempting to 'restrain a dominant competitor through the courts than beat it in the market.' This brief for Intel is wrong. AMD is an innovation leader working as hard as it can to win in the market; the only thing missing is a competitive market free from monopoly abuse. AMD is the company leading consumer choice and value, not vice versa." McCoy adds, "The Japan Fair Trade Commission has already found that Intel violated its antitrust laws by imposing illegal, exclusive contracts on computer manufacturers. … Despite its technology leadership, AMD has reached only 18% revenue share of the microprocessor market and, not surprisingly, most of its recent gain came after the ruling in Japan, AMD's lawsuit in the U.S. and the European Commission's dawn raids."

Competition, Antitrust Laws Seen As Best Way To Regulate Internet. Robert Hahn and Robert Litan, directors of the AEI-Brookings Joint Center for Regulatory Studies, write in The Hill (10/3), "If you doubt the effectiveness of simple slogans, the current debate over net neutrality should change your mind. As the heat of the rhetoric rises, the quality of the information has declined. … On examination…one truth is clear -- while both sides are prone to hyperbole and exaggeration, net neutrality enthusiasts are also just plain wrong. And the error is dangerous. If the net neutrality proponents prevail, it is less likely that phone and cable companies that operate most of the Internet pipes will have sufficient economic incentives to build needed new capacity." Hahn and Litan add, "Rather than heavy-handed government mandates that presume to know the best way for the Internet to evolve, we should continue to keep the 'hands-off' policy that has enabled the Internet to become the powerful engine of innovation we enjoy today. The genius of competition, backed by long-standing and proven laws that block the abuse of corporate power, has worked in the past. It should be allowed to work in the future."

ENVIRONMENT:

SCOTUS To Consider Con Edison Cleanup Case. The AP (10/3) reports, "The Supreme Court indicated Monday that it is likely to consider a case involving New York City-based utility Consolidated Edison Inc. and its efforts to require UGI Utilities, a subsidiary of UGI Corp., to help pay for the environmental cleanup of several gas power plants." The AP continues, "The court requested an opinion on the matter from the Justice Department's Solicitor General, which usually indicates that the court will consider the matter during its current term." The AP adds, "The case addresses the issue of whether Con Ed can sue UGI Utilities in order to recover a share of the cleanup costs related to several gas power plants currently owned by Con Ed. The company argued that UGI formerly owned and operated the plants. UGI has countered that under the federal 'Superfund' law, Con Ed cannot seek to recover costs from UGI, because Con Ed has not resolved its liability for the cleanup with the state."

DOE To Delay Buying Oil To Fill Strategic Reserve. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, A5, 2.03M) reports, "The Department of Energy will delay purchasing oil to fill the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve until after the winter-heating season, a spokesman said yesterday. President Bush had ordered the department to halt filling the emergency crude stockpile ahead of the summer-driving season, when gasoline prices edged up to nominal highs." The Journal says, "Spokesman Craig Stevens said the department had agreed to hold off collecting 1.7 million barrels owed to it from oil companies until the second quarter of 2007. Given that the department is 'satisfied with the [reserve's] current level,' and that it was wary of affecting the market ahead of the high-demand winter-heating season, 'we have no plans currently to use the $600 million [from last year's oil sale] to fill the reserve.'" Stevens "said if the department decides to start buying crude, it would be done during a period of months to minimize the impact on the market."

Judge Upholds FBI, Secret Service Applicant Polygraph Exams. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/3, Apuzzo) reports, "The FBI and Secret Service may keep using lie-detector tests to screen potential employees, a federal judge ruled Monday. U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan's ruling ends a six-year lawsuit brought by six applicants who failed polygraph tests and were denied jobs. They said the policy violated their rights to privacy and due process." Although the "questions are personal, Sullivan said, they're not an unconstitutional invasion of privacy. Because the applicants sought positions of public trust, the agencies have the right to inquire about the backgrounds of their agents, he said."

Former FBI Agent Sentenced To Six Years In Prison For Stock Scam. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, C3, 2.03M) reports, "Former Federal Bureau of Investigation special agent Jeffrey Royer was sentenced to a six-year imprisonment for his role in a stock-manipulation case involving a handful of penny-stock companies. Mr. Royer also was sentenced to three years of supervised release. He was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy and securities fraud in 2005 along with short-seller Anthony Elgindy. The government accused the two men of using confidential FBI information to depress the shares of companies that Mr. Elgindy and members of his online investment group sold short -- or bet against using borrowed shares." The New York Times/Bloomberg (10/3) adds, "In June, Mr. Elgindy was sentenced to 11 years and 3 months in prison and ordered to forfeit $1.5 million for using inside information to make short sales and extort money from companies he criticized in an online newsletter. … Prosecutors say Mr. Royer also supplied Mr. Elgindy with information about investigations of companies by the F.B.I. and the Securities and Exchange Commission."

Newsday (10/3, DeStefano) reports Judge Raymond Dearie called "it a tragic case of a public official gone wrong." The judge "noted that, without Royer's involvement, the stock schemes and extortion wouldn't have happened, although he said Royer shouldn't be held responsible for Elgindy's shakedown attempts." The New York Daily News (10/3, Marzulli, 729K) reports the sentencing in "City briefs," under the headline "G-Man Gets 6 For Scam."

US Attorney Says Steroid Story Contained Inaccuracies. ESPN.com (10/3) reports, "The federal prosecutor overseeing an investigation of steroids in baseball said Monday that a newspaper report indicating that five players, including Roger Clemens, had used illegal performance-enhancing drugs contained 'significant inaccuracies.'" ESPN continues, "The inaccuracies have to do with the names as they appear in the report, a spokesman for San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said. The spokesman did not elaborate. … Citing sealed court filings, the Los Angeles Times reported that former pitcher Jason Grimsley had named Clemens, his Houston Astros teammate Andy Pettitte, and Baltimore Orioles Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons. The story first appeared on the Times' Web site on Saturday and was quickly seized on by print and broadcast media outlets. … Ryan issued a statement Monday, saying: 'In view of the recent news reports purporting to identify certain athletes whose names had been redacted from the government's search warrant filings in the Grimsley matter, and in the interests of justice, please be advised that these reports contain significant inaccuracies.'"

The New York Times (10/3, Curry) reports, "Grimsley's agent, Joe Bick, said Grimsley, who was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks after he acknowledged using steroids and other drugs and who subsequently retired, is not responsible for the naming of any players in the affidavit. … 'In terms of how those names got in the document, Jason disputes the fact that he put them there,' Bick said. 'Jason's attorney made that statement a while ago, and he still feels that way.'" The Times notes, "Edward F. Novak, Grimsley's lawyer, did not return a telephone message yesterday. But Novak told The Arizona Republic in June that Grimsley did not volunteer any names of current or former players and merely answered questions when the investigators quizzed him about specific players."

The AP (10/3, Kravets) reports a spokesman for the Los Angeles Times "had no immediate comment. The newspaper reported that an unidentified source with access to the document allowed the newspaper to view it, and a second source provided additional details about the document"

Report: Baseball's Pete Rose Used "Greenies." The AP (10/3) reports Pete Rose "says he took 'greenies' in his playing days, if only to lose a few pounds. … In an appearance on the 'Late Show' taped Monday, Rose was asked by host David Letterman whether he ever used any performance-enhancing drugs as a player. Rose said he never did, but when prodded about 'greenies,' explained that he used them -- though they were nothing more than 'diet pills.'" According to the AP, neither Letterman nor Rose "used the word 'amphetamines,' which were commonly nicknamed 'greenies' at the height of their supposed popularity in baseball. The sport added amphetamines to its list of banned substances last year."

Drug Ring Investigation Leads To New Jersey Man's Guilty Plea. The Easton (PA) Express-Times (10/3, Quigley) reports a Phillipsburg man "has pleaded guilty in connection with Operation Stateline, a sweeping undercover drug sting that shut down a network operating in the Phillipsburg-Easton area. Ray Edward Carter…faces a federal prison sentence of between 10 years to life under the terms of the agreement reached Thursday with the U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie's office. … The six-month investigation conducted by the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and local authorities ended last month. The sting resulted in state narcotics charges against 23 area residents."

Supreme Court Declines To Hear Pennsylvania Doctor's Appeal In Painkiller Case. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (10/2) reports the U.S. Supreme Court yesterday "declined to hear an appeal filed by a doctor convicted of trading prescription painkillers for sex at his Oakmont office. Dr. Bernard Rottschaefer, 63, of Plum, was convicted in 2003 of 153 counts of illegally prescribing powerful painkillers, such as OxyContin, to drug-addicted female patients. He denies trading drugs for sex and has remained out of prison pending the outcome of his appeal." U.S. District Judge Gary Lancaster "dismissed the second appeal, because the first was still pending."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/3, Ward) reports Rottschaefer's lawyers "have filed a third motion for a new trial in U.S. District Court -- the last was rejected back in January 2005 -- claiming that they again have newly discovered evidence that could have changed the outcome of his trial. This time, the evidence is testimony in a civil malpractice case against Dr. Rottschaefer in which the women he allegedly victimized all said they had various ailments that the OxyContin helped to treat. That contradicts the prosecution's theory in the criminal case, in which it claimed that Dr. Rottschaefer prescribed the powerful pain medication to those women with 'no legitimate medical purpose,' said defense attorney Eli Stutsman."

Survey Indicates Parents Underestimate Children's Drug Use. In its Health section, The New York Times (10/3, Bakalar) reports a new study has found parents "consistently and substantially underestimate their children's use of alcohol and other drugs. Researchers interviewed 591 adolescents ages 12 to 17 about their drug and alcohol use and then questioned at least one parent of each about what he or she thought the children were using. The analysis appears in the October issue of Alcoholism: Clinical and Experimental Research." Parents "consistently said they believed that their children were using substances less frequently than the children reported." For example, the Times reports that almost 23 percent of the adolescents admitted using marijuana, but only 13.2 percent of their parents knew it.

New Evidence Surfaces In Texas Bombing Case. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (10/3, Baker) reports, "Six years ago, Texas Death Row inmate Michael Toney made headlines when he tried to sell seats to his execution over the Internet. … But now Toney, convicted of blowing up three people in Lake Worth on Thanksgiving Day in 1985, may create another stir as he tries to avoid the death chamber for one of North Texas' most notorious crimes." The Star-Telegram continues, "The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals recently ruled that new evidence — including reports from the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives discrediting the prosecution's key witnesses — is sufficient to support Toney's innocence claim and warrants another review by state District Judge Everett Young. .. .The Tarrant County district attorney's office says that some of the claims have been made in previous appeals. But a defense attorney representing Toney says he is convinced that Toney is innocent. … 'It's one of the most egregious cases I've seen,' said Jared Tyler, an attorney with the Texas Innocence Network. 'For me, there is not a shred of evidence that he did it.'" The Star-Telegram adds, "Toney, 40, was sentenced to death in 1999 for the briefcase bombing that killed Angela Blount, 15; her father, Joe Blount, 44; and her cousin Michael Columbus, 18. … The case had gone unsolved for a decade until Toney, who was in jail for another offense, told another inmate that he was hired to put the briefcase bomb at the mobile home. Investigators later presented evidence showing that Toney — who they said was to be paid $5,000 for the bombing — put it at the wrong trailer. … Toney always proclaimed his innocence and his efforts in 2000 to sell seats to his future execution to the highest bidder was part of a publicity stunt to attract attention to his case. The state forbade him to sell the seats."

Man Wanted For Ohio Shooting Arrested In Washington. The AP (10/3) reports, "Authorities on Monday arrested a man accused of killing a man during a youth football game in Youngstown, Ohio, standing over the wounded victim on the field and shooting him several more times." The AP continues, "Anthony M. Caulton, 25, also known as Anthony Pfeifer, was arrested at a home in Bremerton, across Puget Sound from Seattle, after investigators developed leads that he might be hiding in Washington state, the U.S. Marshals Service said." The AP adds, "Caulton was wanted for investigation of a shooting at a Volney Rogers Youth Football League game on Aug. 19 at the former South High School stadium. … As many as 800 people were at the game when Caulton shot Larry D. Jones, 31, in the grandstand, police said. Jones then fled onto the field, and when he collapsed the shooter shot him several more times."

IMMIGRATION:

SCOTUS Rejects Appeal By Nazi Concentration Camp Guard. The AP (10/3, Yost) reports, "A former Nazi concentration camp guard lost a Supreme Court appeal on Monday over the government's decision to revoke his U.S. citizenship." The AP continues, "Justices declined to review the case of John Hansl, a member of the SS Death's Head battalion that guarded concentration camps at Sachsenhausen near Berlin in 1943 and Natzweiler in France in 1944." The AP adds, "Hansl, who lives in Des Moines, Iowa, sought to distinguish his case from other former Nazi camp guards by arguing he did not hide his wartime past when he asked for a visa to enter the United States in the mid-1950s or personally assist in persecution. … An appeals court, however, agreed with a lower court ruling that Hansl's work as an armed guard with orders to shoot escaping prisoners was sufficient evidence that he 'personally assisted in persecution.' … In one instance, Hansl helped search for an escaped prisoner who was later shot to death, although Hansl did not pull the trigger, court records show." The AP notes, "The Justice Department has said that more than 70 people who assisted in Nazi persecution have been stripped of U.S. citizenship since the Office of Special Investigations began operations in 1979. The office pursues war criminals."

Border Fence Seen As Ineffective Strategy. The Washington Post (10/3, A3, 748K) reports, "Building a fence in an attempt to secure the US border with Mexico is impractical and would simply lead illegal immigrants to cross elsewhere, according to former US Customs and Border Protection agents and other experts." Also, "the Mexican government agreed in a diplomatic note sent yesterday to the US government, warning that the fence would damage relations between the two countries." The Post adds, "Former US customs agents who have hunted drug traffickers in the mountains and deserts near the Arizona border said the new barrier would be defeated by the rugged terrain. 'You can't build a wall across the mountains of southern Arizona, as much of the terrain is inaccessible even on foot,' veteran agent Lee Morgan said as he stood along the proposed route of the fence, east of Douglas."

Crackdown On Illegal Immigrants Creates Mixed Reaction. The Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Jonsson, 58K) reports that as "federal, state, and local officials crack down on illegal immigrants across the country, attitudes continue to harden among those who want them to stay and those who want them to go. In places like Stillmore, Ga., Arkadelphia, Ark., and Charlotte, N.C., raids and crackdowns have uncorked a phenomenon for those left behind: a sense of moral confusion about mass roundups and midnight raids." Allan Burns, an anthropologist at the University of Florida in Gainesville, said, "There's a tension between working alongside these people, understanding their impact on the economy, and then some of the issues of a community being able or not able to sustain this kind of immigration." Proponents "of immigration law enforcement say the government has a right to get tough on illegal immigrants and those who employ them. Led by Gov. Sonny Perdue, Georgia lawmakers say they will go after people who have broken immigration laws. Georgia has the fastest growing population of illegal immigrants, estimated at 470,000."

County Ordinance Would Bar Agencies From Denying Services To Illegals. The Chicago Tribune (10/3, Noel, 623K) reports, "Despite a dissenting vote from Tony Peraica, the Republican candidate for Cook County Board president, a resolution passed a subcommittee Monday that could make the county a sanctuary for undocumented immigrants." Modeled on legislation "adopted by several large cities, including Chicago, the resolution will go before the full board after passing 3-2. It would forbid county agencies from asking about immigration status when providing services." The "co-sponsor of the resolution, Commissioner Roberto Maldonado (D-Chicago), said the measure offers symbolic support for undocumented immigrants as well as protection from real abuses."

Southern Pastors Try To Overcome Division Between Blacks, Hispanics. The New York Times (10/3, Swarns, 1.21M) reports that in Willacoochee, Georgia, an "immigrant boomtown in Atkinson County, about 45 miles north of the Florida border," the Rev. Harvey Williams, who is black, and the Rev. Atanacio Gaona, a Mexican immigrant, "have forged a rare friendship that transcends the deep divide between blacks and Hispanics here." For centuries, "the South has been defined by the color line and the struggle for accommodation between blacks and whites. But the arrival of hundreds of thousands of Hispanic immigrants over the past decade is quietly changing the dynamics of race relations in many Southern towns." The two pastors "find that the fault lines that separate their communities sometimes test their friendship and challenge their efforts to bring blacks and Hispanics closer together." Blacks "here, who had settled into a familiar, if sometimes uneasy, relationship with whites, are now outnumbered by Hispanics. The two groups, who often live and work side by side, compete fiercely for working-class jobs and government resources. By several measures, blacks are already losing ground." The "two Pentecostal ministers who pray together are men of faith who say they believe that blacks and Hispanics should be allies in the struggle to overcome discrimination and economic adversity, even though they acknowledge that interethnic unity is often hard to come by."

TAX:

New York Man Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison For Tax Evasion. Business First of Buffalo (10/2) reported, "Amherst resident John Fortune has been sentenced to 27 months incarceration, following a guilty plea for structuring financial transactions to avoid IRS reporting requirements, according to the U.S. Attorney's office." Assistant U.S. Attorney Gretchen Wylegala said on Monday that over a "6 month period, Fortune took nearly $150,000 in cash in 40 separate transactions." Business First noted, "The conviction in June was the culmination of an investigation on the part of the FBI."

WSJournal Praises Rangel For Honesty On Plans To Raise Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, 2.03M) says in an editorial that Rep. Charlie Rangel, "the 36-year House veteran from New York City who will chair the Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win a majority" has been "happy to explain his own agenda on taxes and the war in Iraq." Rangel "was asked by Congress Daily whether he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum. 'No question about it,' he said. 'Everything has to be on the table.'" Republicans have "jumped all over Mr. Rangel's tax comments in particular, but at least in one sense the New Yorker should be congratulated: Unlike his fellow Democrats, he isn't hiding what he believes. He's merely being candid about what he'd like to do at Ways and Means, and as a long-time Member he may feel he'll have a better chance of achieving his tax-hike goals if he talks about them more openly during the campaign. Voters won't be able to say they weren't warned."

WSJournal Touts Indexing Capital Gains For Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, 2.03M) says in an editorial, "Republicans haven't had any luck making the Bush tax cuts of 2003 permanent, and next year's prospects don't look promising. So now is a good time to consider some alternative tax-cutting strategies that might be more achievable." One "useful idea comes courtesy of House Republicans Mike Pence and Eric Cantor, who recently introduced a bill to index capital gains for inflation. Income tax brackets have been adjusted for the cost of living ever since the Reagan tax cuts of 1981 -- a historic pro-growth victory. But capital gains continue to suffer from an inflation tax, which yields a windfall profit for the government but reduces the value of holding long-term capital assets."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Leaders Allegedly Ignored Repeated Warnings Concerning Foley. Media reports last night and this morning indicate House Speaker Dennis Hastert, and the GOP in general, are under intense political pressure over the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley. NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 5, 1:10, Russert, 9.87M) summed up the tenor of the coverage, saying, "Republicans are panicked, in a simple word. … They are afraid of the consequences. And they are afraid conservative Christians will stay home at the elections and not support Republican candidates."

The Financial Times (10/3, Daniel, Dinmore) quotes Charlie Cook, publisher of the Cook Political Report, as saying, "Initially I just thought that this would cost them a seat and the public would just chalk it up to yet another sleazebag politician," but "as articles turned toward cover-up/inaction, it's just one more nail in the coffin for this majority." The Wall Street Journal (10/3, A4, Calmes, 2.03M) reports the GOP "has new reason to worry about two key constituencies: Christian conservatives and suburban soccer moms. … The Foley fallout has united both Republican voter groups in anger." Newsweek's Howard Fineman, on MSNBC's Hardball (10/2), said, "I think this is a missile aimed straight at the heart of the Republican base, which is why Republicans in the White House and on the Hill are scrambling so quickly to try to get ahead of this fast moving story. The Republican party has been built in the last 15 or 20 years on the notion that they are the party of family values."

Roll Call (10/3, Davis) says House Republican leaders "held a tense Members-only conference call Monday evening to attempt to assuage lawmakers' anger about a controversy that some Republicans fear has put the majority increasingly in peril. Sources familiar with the call described Members as 'angry' and 'furious,' and said many lawmakers raised safety concerns about the teenagers currently enrolled in the page program." The Washington Post (10/3, A11, Sheridan, 748K) reports Hastert "has asked the Justice Department to cast a wide net in its investigation of lewd e-mails sent by a Republican legislator to young pages, even looking into whether other lawmakers learned of them and failed to notify authorities. But legal experts said yesterday that it was unlikely any such third parties would face prosecution."

All three networks aired extensive reports on the scandal. The report on ABC World News (10/2, story 3, 2:55, Ross, 8.78M) was particularly negative toward the GOP. ABC said, "Despite repeat warning signs going back at least five years, almost nothing was done in Congress to stop Foley's suspect behavior with pages. Today, the Republican leaders said they had no idea how bad it was until ABC News revealed some of Foley's X-rated messages to the underage boys. … But there were lots of warning signs. In 2001, pages were warned to be careful with Foley. In 2005, one page complained to his Congressman about' 'sick' e- mails from Foley -- a complaint passed to the Speaker's staff. Then, this past spring, the complaint was again raised with three Republican leaders, including Hastert himself." ABC added, "A former senior Republican official in Congress says Foley was one of a handful of members and staff whose behavior with pages was being closely watched but so far, Foley is the only member whose overt sexual approaches have been documented."

CBS Evening News (10/2, story 4, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Hastert is feeling the heat from the scandal involving" Foley. Hastert "and other top Republicans knew for a year that Foley had sent questionable e-mails to a former Congressional page. The Speaker says he only found out last Friday, though, about other sexually explicit messages sent by Foley. But…it could be too late for damage control." CBS added, "There is no getting around it, the unraveling of the page scandal could be the undoing of some house Republican leaders, if not their hold on Congress. … Some religious conservatives may not want to wait for the FBI's report and they have House Speaker Dennis Hastert in their sights."

NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 3, 2:45 , Williams, 9.87M) reported Hastert "was front and center but a lot of critics on both sides of the political aisle said they were not satisfied. … Democrats [are] accusing Republicans of a cover up." NBC noted that at a news conference, "Hastert refused to take questions." The Hill (10/3, O'Connor) reports Hastert, "who seldom grants interviews to news outlets, held several yesterday with print and television reporters to answer questions about why Republican leaders failed to fully investigate improper e-mail sent by Foley. … Hastert publicly maintained yesterday that his staff did everything it could have." USA Today (10/3, Kiely, 2.27M), meanwhile, says,

"Speaking to reporters for the first time since the scandal broke, Hastert said House officials had no reason to press further when Foley explained a chatty e-mail to a 16-year-old boy in which the representative requested the former House page's photograph. That e-mail caused the boy's parents to complain, but it contained nothing sexually explicit. 'Would have, could have, should have,' Hastert said. 'We did what we thought … was prudent at the time.'"

Most media analysis portray the scandal as having a detrimental effect on GOP chances this November. The New York Times (10/32, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.21M), in an article titled, "Pressure Grows for GOP Over Foley Scandal," reports Hastert "faced intensifying questions on Monday about why Republicans had not reacted more assertively…as members of his party, fearing a political debacle, demanded a strong response. Straining to hold the party together five weeks from Election Day…Hastert and his leadership team held a conference call with House Republicans on Monday night and heard blunt advice and criticism from participants who pressed for further action to reassure voters." The AP (10/3, Taylor) says Hastert's "media offensive came as the burgeoning scandal entered its fourth day, souring the outlook for Republicans in the November elections and raising questions about the judgment of senior House officials who handled the controversy."

WTimes, Some Social Conservatives Want Hastert To Resign As Speaker. The Washington Times (10/3, 88K), in an editorial titled "Resign, Mr. Speaker" that is currently featured atop the Drudge Report, alleges that Hastert "dissembled, to put it charitably, before conceding that he, too, learned about the e-mail messages sometime earlier this year. Late yesterday afternoon, Mr. Hastert insisted that he learned of the most flagrant instant-message exchange from 2003 only last Friday, when it was reported by ABC News. This is irrelevant. The original e-mail messages were warning enough that a predator -- and, incredibly, the co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children -- could be prowling the halls of Congress. The matter wasn't pursued aggressively. It was barely pursued at all. Moreover, all available evidence suggests that the Republican leadership did not share anything related to this matter with any Democrat." The Times adds, "Hastert must do the only right thing, and resign his speakership at once."

The Washington Post (10/3, Balz, VandeHei, 748K), in a front-page story titled, "After Foley, New Fears For The GOP: Some Say Party Could Lose House and Senate," reports, "There was intense anger among social conservative activists in Washington yesterday, and some called for…Hastert to resign. … Leaders from about six dozen socially conservative groups held a conference call late yesterday afternoon, and participants were described as livid with House GOP leaders. 'They are outraged by how Hastert handled this,' said Paul M. Weyrich, a conservative activist who participated in the call."

The Washington Times (10/3, Hurt, 88K) reports, "several well-known conservatives called for Republican resignations because, they said, Mr. Hastert and other leaders did not act aggressively enough when they first learned last year of a separate set of 'overly friendly' e-mails that Mr. Foley had sent to another teenage former page. 'Speaker Hastert had knowledge of Congressman Foley's inappropriate behavior and chose to protect a potential pedophile and powerful colleague over a congressional page,' David Bossie, president of the conservative group Citizens United, said yesterday." The Times adds, "Such rebukes by conservative supporters yesterday erased any hopes by Republican leaders that they might curtail the political fallout from the scandal."

Jones "Disgusted" With Leaders' Response. The Washington Post (10/3, A11, Babington, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Some House Republicans said yesterday that the FBI and House leaders erred in not considering the e-mails -- and the concern they raised among the recipient's parents -- as justification for an inquiry. 'This thing should have been looked into months ago,' said Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), who said he is 'disgusted' by his leaders' response."

Pelosi Wants Hastert, GOP Leaders Questioned Under Oath. CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "issued this response: 'Speaker Hastert again failed to answer the question that every mother and father in America is asking: how could Republican leaders choose partisan politics over protecting children? Republican leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust. Republican leaders must be investigated by the ethics committee and immediately questioned under oath.'"

Roll Call (10/3, Bresnahan) reports Pelosi "has asked for…Hastert and other top Republicans to be questioned under oath by the ethics committee regarding their handling of the Foley scandal, including what they knew, and when…and how they responded to the incident." Roll Call notes Pelosi "has not called for a special or independent counsel to oversee the investigation, although some Democrats privately are suggesting their leadership should back that proposal."

DNC Calling Attention To Foley's Ties To Reynolds, NRCC. The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Levey, Neubauer, 918K) reports Republicans' efforts "to distance the party from Foley may be complicated by his close ties with the party's campaign operation." Kirk Fordham, Foley's chief of staff from 1995 to 2004 is now chief of staff for NRCC Chairman Rep. Tom Reynolds and Foley's PAC donated $100,000 to the NRCC this summer. The Times notes the DNC is "seizing on the campaign donation, which put Foley among the GOP committee's bigger donors" and "stepped up its accusations that Reynolds and other Republican leaders were more interested in protecting Foley than investigating potential misconduct." The AP (10/3, Sidoti) reports Reynolds' "race against Jack Davis, a millionaire maverick Democrat, has been close for months, and Reynolds' disclosure that he had been told months ago of Foley's inappropriate e-mails plays into one of Davis' central arguments — that Reynolds, as a GOP leadership member, cares more about political dealmaking than his district." The Hill (10/3, Allen, Blake) reports Democrats "are drawing a bead on" Reynolds. A Survey USA poll from last week "found that Reynolds is only leading his opponent by two points."

Democrats Blast Snow Over "Naughty E-Mails" Comment. The New York Times (10/3, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "initially characterized the scandal as 'naughty e-mails,' drawing a blistering response from Democrats who said his words suggested that Republicans did not understand the gravity of the situation."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported, "House leaders aren't the only senior Republicans whose statements on the Foley matter are raising eyebrows." Snow "now says the Administration is horrified by the allegations against Foley, but he says it's up to the House and criminal investigators to decide just how to respond. In his afternoon White House briefing, Snow took a much tougher line than he did in an interview this morning with CNN." Snow: "It's not always pretty up there on Capitol Hill and there have been other scandals, as you know, that have been more than simply naughty e-mails. … I want to find out what happened, but before we prosecute, let's figure out what all the facts are. That's probably the most important thing to do, is to be fair to all parties."

The Des Moines Register (10/3, 163K) reports Sen. John Kerry "denounced" Foley, saying, "I'm really angry those in a position of responsibility care more about power and politics than protection of children." Kerry said the scandal "adds to the 'Republican culture of corruption.'"

The Washington Post (10/3, C1, Farhi, 748K) reports, "In recent years, for the most part, Democrats have been able to survive their sordid escapades while Republicans have paid with their political lives."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, 2.03M), in an editorial, contends that "in today's politically correct culture, it's easy to understand how senior Republicans might well have decided they had no grounds to doubt Mr. Foley merely because he was gay and a little too friendly in emails. Some of those liberals now shouting the loudest for Mr. Hastert's head are the same voices who tell us that the larger society must be tolerant of private lifestyle choices, and certainly must never leap to conclusions about gay men and young boys. Are these Democratic critics of Mr. Hastert saying that they now have more sympathy for the Boy Scouts' decision to ban gay scoutmasters?"

The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) editorializes, "That House leaders knew Representative Mark Foley had been sending inappropriate e-mail to Capitol pages and did little about it is terrible. It is also the latest in a long, depressing pattern: When there is a choice between the right thing to do and the easiest route to perpetuation of power, top Republicans always pick wrong."

Roll Call (10/3), in an editorial, writes, "The last time a Speaker of the House was under investigation, a deadlocked ethics panel named an outside counsel in 1995 to probe the use of charities and fundraising groups by then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). That is the controlling precedent as the ethics panel tries to move forward on the Foley case, and we encourage the committee to name an outside investigator as soon as possible."

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, 918K) editorializes, "What should not be missed amid the partisan sniping is the failure of those involved to see the red flags. The episode should serve as a cautionary tale for all employers, particularly ones who bring youths into the workplace."

In her column for Roll Call (10/3) Democratic strategist Donna Brazile writes, "I don't know about the rest of America, but I have had enough of lies, deceit and distortions of the truth by a majority party seeking to retain political advantage and hold on to power."

DOJ_NMG_0073243

The Washington Post's Eugene Robinson (10/3, A17) writes, "About all the party leadership can do is hope the whole affair is so unsavory that some voters will be too grossed out to pay much attention."

Card Confirms He Proposed Rumsfeld Replacement. NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 4, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The White House is…denying former Chief of Staff Andrew Card tried to get the President to replace Defense Secretary Rumsfeld. But today, Card confirmed he proposed replacing Rumsfeld with former Secretary of State James Baker. And you hearing that Republican on the Hill had concerns about Don Rumsfeld?" Andrew Card: "I would not be bashful about repeating that." Mitchell: "And Card didn't deny he talked to Laura Bush about firing Rumsfeld." Andrew Card: "I would always solicit her council and would ask her to be candid, and she would frequently repeat to me some of the concerns she heard from other people."

MSNBC's Hardball (10/2, Mitchell) reported, "Andy Card sat down with me today and confirmed what he did and didn't do. He said it wasn't a conspiracy so get rid of Rumsfeld, but he certainly did recommended the President that Republicans on the Hill were calling for it." Card: "I did speak to him frequently about Defense, as these opportunities for change were presented. I also reflected to the President what I had heard when I would go meet with members of Congress, Democrats, Republicans, and Senators, the House members. And it was always a candid conversation." MSNBC: "And you were hearing that Republicans on the Hill had concerns about Don Rumsfeld?" Card: "I was. I was. And I would not be bashful about repeating that. And I would counsel the President appropriately as the chief of staff. But I would never lobby the President, and I would never go out and solicit others to lobby the President. So to claim there's a campaign that I orchestrated or was trying to mount would be inaccurate."

Fox News' Special Report (10/2, Angle) reported, "Card and others don't deny there was some discussion of replacing Rumsfeld but insist it was in the context of getting fresh blood in several key posts. … Card even recommended the President replace him as chief of staff which he did. In fact, several officials talked with the President about bringing in a whole new team but Mr. President Bush wanted some continuity in the middle of a difficult war."

Non-Appeal Of DHS Ruling Said To Give Unions Negotiating Advantage. The Federal Times (10/3, Kauffman) reports, "The Bush administration's decision not to appeal a June court decision striking down key parts of the Homeland Security Department's new personnel system gives unions a clear advantage in negotiating new changes, observers say." The Times continues, "Collective bargaining had been severely curtailed under proposed reforms, which were struck down by federal judges. Managers, for instance, no longer would need to bargain with unions before changing an employee's work assignment, detailing an employee to another location or introducing new technologies." The Times adds, "Now those matters are back on the table, along with changes to the pay and performance appraisal system for union employees that have been on hold pending the court case. Unions now appear likely to have significant say in what reforms are made and how they're carried out. … 'It certainly appears that the unions have a whole lot more leverage in the final outcome of this than you would have thought three years ago,' said Washington attorney William Bransford, who represents senior executives and other employees and previously handled labor disputes for the IRS. … Meanwhile, the department has proceeded with changes to the pay and performance management systems for nonbargaining unit employees. About 4,000 supervisors and nonbargaining unit employees currently are covered under the new personnel system, and another 6,700 managers and supervisors were scheduled to convert on Oct. 1, department spokesman Larry Orluskie said."

Supreme Court Opens New Term By Rejecting 1900 Appeals. ABC World News (10/2, story 7, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Supreme Court's new term opened today. The justices right away refused an appeal by Northwest Airlines in an antitrust case brought by low cost competitor Spirit Airlines. And they rejected an appeal by newspaper companies. They sided with Detroit union workers who won reinstatement after an 18-month strike. During the year ahead the court will take up issues including global warning, racial diversity and late term abortion."

The Washington Post (10/3, A2, 748K) reports the court "rejected about 1,900 appeals that piled up during the summer recess. Among the cases the justices declined to hear were a challenge to a Texas law that bans the sale of sex toys, objections by parents in California to a mandatory class on Islam, and an appeal of lower-court rulings that the managers of Detroit newspapers acted improperly when they fired striking workers." During its new term, the Supreme Court "has agreed to rule on potential landmark cases on abortion rights, the environment and racial diversity in schools -- some of the country's most contentious social issues."

The Wall Street Journal (10/3, A2, Anderson, 2.03M) reports the Supreme Court "declined to take up a U.S.-China trade issue, rejecting an appeal on whether courts can review presidential decisions on import-restriction recommendations by the U.S. International Trade Commission." The "legal challenge to President Bush was brought by Motion Systems Corp., an Eatontown, N.J., maker of pedestal parts for motorized wheelchairs. The company filed a complaint with the ITC in 2002 arguing Chinese imports of similar products threatened its business."

Kennedy Emerges As Key Swing Vote. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Bravin, 2.03M) reports that since Justice Sandra Day O'Connor "retired in January, the High Court has been dubbed the Kennedy Court. Between a bloc of four conservatives facing off against four liberal-leaning members, Justice Anthony Kennedy, with his own occasionally idiosyncratic jurisprudence, may tip the balance on hot-button cases." Seeing Justice Kennedy 'as the new swing vote, attorneys readying for the Supreme Court's annual term that begins this week have been plumbing nearly two decades of Kennedy opinions, searching for arguments that could persuade the justice that they have the law right. The trick for advocates is finding how to do that."

High Court Urged To Take Narrow View Of "Illicit Trafficking." The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "The Supreme Court starts off its term today with arguments in a pair of immigration cases that turn on a technical issue but could have a considerable impact on the real world. If the court gives the words 'illicit trafficking' the wrong interpretation, as some lower courts have, a significant number of legal immigrants could be unjustly uprooted and deported, or given unduly harsh criminal sentences." Federal immigration law, "quite reasonably, imposes special conditions on legal immigrants who are convicted of 'aggravated felonies.' The law says that 'illicit trafficking' in drugs is an aggravated felony, and today's cases pose the question of what that means. The plain meaning of 'trafficking' in drugs is engaging in commercial activity. But some courts have ignored this plain meaning and held that simple possession of drugs can count, and therefore can be an aggravated felony."

Senate Confirms Bomar. The New York Times/AP (10/3, Press) reports, "A British native and career Interior Department employee has been confirmed by the Senate as director of the National Park Service. The new director, Mary A. Bomar, left, was one of four Interior Department officials confirmed by the Senate at 2 a.m. on Saturday as lawmakers rushed to finish work before recessing. Ms. Bomar succeeds Fran P. Mainella, who announced her resignation in July."

10th Assistant Defense Secretary Position Created. The Hill (10/3, Tiron) reports, "After weeks of intense discussions, congressional defense authorizers approved the Pentagon's request for a 10th assistant secretary of defense — a pivotal position in a big reorganization planned to take place over the next year. But the nod for an assistant secretary for global security affairs comes with strings attached." Congressional leaders like Speaker Dennis Hastert and Sen. Richard Lugar have raised concerns: "Hastert has cast doubt on the reorganization because he fears it will hurt congressional oversight and the military's counter-drug mission." Meanwhile, Lugar has "called the merger of counter-narcotics and counter-proliferation missions 'a mistake,' adding, 'these jobs are too big and too important for any one person.'" By reorganizing, the DOD hopes "to bring a key Pentagon office into line with the U.S. military's need to respond to a widening array of transnational threats, to manage international military coalitions, and to equip partner nations to fight terrorists."

Report Shows Abramoff Team's Effort To Influence Lawmakers. The Hill (10/3, Schor) reports the House Government Reform Committee report "released late last week on the 400-plus communications between Bush administration officials and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his colleagues also provides new evidence of the extensive reach 'Team Abramoff' maintained among lawmakers and aides from both parties." Abramoff and lobbyists "formerly working under him at Greenberg Traurig claimed meeting with 24 senators, 19 House members and more than 100 aides — at least 20 of them Democratic — on behalf of the Saginaw Chippewa tribe of Michigan, according to a summary released as part of supplementary evidence to the Government Reform report. Lawmakers' names were all redacted by committee staff, but aides' names were released and represent Democratic as well as Republican members." The bulk of the report "focuses on attempts by Abramoff and his lobbying team to leverage their White House contacts, including Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and now-GOP national chairman Ken Mehlman, for a variety of favors. But in the Saginaw Chippewa work summary, provided to the committee by the lobbying firm, Abramoff and his colleagues touted their skills at securing federal appropriations for roads, a school and a crime-prevention center for the Chippewas, who took in a significant income from their Soaring Eagle casino." Among the "victories Abramoff's team claimed was securing an objection by now-Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to a bill by Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) that would have allowed another Michigan tribe to open a casino potentially harmful to the Chippewas' gambling operation."

Congress Approves Military Pay Hike, Delays Civil Service Raise. The Washington Post (10/3, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Hours before wrapping up for its campaign break, Congress nailed down a 2.2 percent pay raise for the armed forces but left resolution of the federal employee raise to a lame-duck session next month. The pay raise was approved late last week by the House and Senate as part of the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill, which sets out policy and personnel goals for the Defense Department. The across-the-board raise will take effect in January, and additional raises for senior enlisted personnel and warrant officers will begin in April. The House version of the bill had called for a 2.7 percent across-the-board military raise, but House and Senate negotiators chose to go with the Senate's proposed 2.2 percent increase, which matched the adjustment approved by Congress in an appropriations bill." The House "approved a 2.7 percent raise for federal employees, and a Senate bill, which did not reach the floor, also has proposed a 2.7 percent civil service raise." The Washington Times (10/3, Causey, 88K) also reports the story.

Top Civil Servants Honored. The Washington Post (10/3, A15, 748K) reports that the fifth annual Sammies, or Service to America Medals, were presented at a gala last Wednesday. The awards "were created by the Partnership for Public Service and the Atlantic Media Company. A committee selected nine winners from more than 500 nominees and 30 finalists. Nancy Cox, a scientist at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, won the top award, Federal Employee of the Year, for 'leading the world's efforts to prepare for a catastrophic flu pandemic.'"

California Man Accused Of Sending Letters Threatening Bush, Cheney, Others. The AP (10/2) reports an engineer at a nuclear power plant near Sacramento "has been charged with sending threatening letters containing a powdery substance to the same Sierra foothills country club where President Bush will appear Tuesday for a Republican campaign event. Michael Lee Braun, 51, appeared Monday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento on two federal charges of sending threats through the mail. The FBI said he also is a suspect in mailing dozens of similar threats since shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks." According to the AP, an affidavit indicates Braun "was a suspect since the first letters were mailed from Sacramento to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and a Sacramento dental office." The AP reports the letters are said to have contained threats directed at President Bush, first lady Laura Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, and others.

President Will Attend Christening Of Father's Namesake Carrier. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (10/3) reports, "President Bush will join his parents at Saturday's christening of the nation's newest aircraft carrier, named for his father, at shipbuilder Northrop Grumman Newport News. The carrier, CVN-77, is called the George H.W. Bush, after the country's 41st president." The Bush "is the last of 10 Nimitz-class carriers" and cost "approximately $6 billion."

OTHER NEWS:

Reports Offer Mixed Picture Of US Economy. USA Today (10/3, Read, 2.27M) reports, "A pair of economic reports offered a mixed picture of the economy Monday as growth slowed among US manufacturers while commercial construction showed surprising resilience." The manufacturing sector "grew in September at the slowest pace in more than a year, a trade group said. A big gain in commercial construction spending, however, was enough to offset a decline in home building in August, the Commerce Department said." Construction spending "edged up 0.3% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.2 trillion, the best showing in five months." The Institute for Supply Management "said its manufacturing index registered 52.9 in September, below August's reading of 54.5 and the lowest reading since May 2005, when the index hit 51.4. Analysts had predicted a reading of 53.5. A reading of 50 or more indicates expansion, while below 50 shows contraction."

The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Conkey, 2.03M) also says "the nation's factories appear to be losing some steam as economic growth moderates." Other data "offered signs that the residential real-estate market may be stabilizing after a slowdown in sales over the past year. The National Association of Realtors said its index of pending home sales rose 4.3% in August from July but remains 14% below the year-earlier pace."

Gas Prices Drop Again. ABC World News (10/2, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The government said that price of gasoline dropped again for the eighth straight week. Average price is 2.31 down 7 cents from last week and 73 cents overall since early August."

Stocks Mixed. NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 8, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Turning to Wall Street today The Dow was down almost 9 points [to close at 11,670.35]. The NASDAQ was off just over 20 points [to close at 2,237.60]." The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Browning, 2.03M) says, "Pushing several times past the January 2000 record close of 11722.98, the Dow industrials got as high as 11726.94 yesterday before sagging at midday. … It was the third consecutive session in which the Dow industrials briefly surpassed the record but couldn't hold on." The Washington Times (10/3, Hill, 88K) runs a similar report under the headline "Dow On Verge Of Closing At An All-time High."

USA Today (10/3, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Hurt by losses of stocks in the Internet retail, home entertainment software and oil and gas industries, the Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 4.53 points to 1331.32. That's leaves the S&P up 6.7% for the year."

Majority Of Black, Hispanic Families Own Homes In DC Region. The Washington Post (10/3, A1, Layton, Keating, 748K) reports, "A majority of black and Hispanic households in metropolitan Washington now own their houses instead of renting, according to new data released today by the U.S. Census Bureau. The new numbers, reflecting changes from 2000 to 2005, underscore the Washington region's affluence and strong economy. During the half-decade of soaring housing prices, whites, blacks, Asians and Hispanics were all more likely to own their homes in the region than nationally." The Post adds, "Some of the most dramatic shifts are taking place in the District, where African Americans are no longer a majority among homeowners. In 2000, 54 percent of D.C. homeowners were black, and 41 percent were white. But a decline of 6,000 black homeowners since then, and a surge of 7,000 additional white homeowners, brought the two groups to virtual parity in the 2005 survey. The decline in black homeowners in the District was offset by growth in the suburbs."

Housing Costs Sharply Up Between 2000, 2005. The New York Times (10/3, Scott, Archibold, 1.21M) reports, "The burden of housing costs in nearly every part of the country grew sharply from 2000 to 2005, according to new Census Bureau data being made public today. The numbers vividly illustrate the impact, often distributed unevenly, of the crushing combination of escalating real estate prices and largely stagnant incomes." While "many of the highest home values were on the coasts, in places like Southern California and Manhattan, many of the biggest jumps in the percentage of people paying a burdensome amount of their income for housing occurred in the Midwest and in suburbs nationwide, making it clear that the housing squeeze has reached deep into the middle class. …. Among suburban homeowners, there were big increases in the percentage of people with mortgages spending at least 30 percent in places like Loudon County, Va.; Morgan County, Ind.; Nassau County, on Long Island; and Bastrop County, Tex."

Dionne Says Voters Crediting Governors For "Relatively Good Economy." E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (10/3, A17, 748K), "Republicans have been scratching their heads in frustration. Why has a relatively good economy not been helping either President Bush's approval ratings or their party's electoral cause? One answer is that economic growth is helping people at the top far more than anyone else. Another explanation can be discovered here and in other well-functioning states around the country: To the extent that voters are expressing gratitude this year, they are saying thanks to their governors." That "does not stop them from yelling irately at Washington, D.C."

Bloggers Increasingly Targeted By Libel Suits. USA Today (10/3, Parker) reports that "blogs -- short for Web logs, the burgeoning, freewheeling Internet forums that give people the power to instantly disseminate messages worldwide -- increasingly are being targeted by those who feel harmed by blog attacks. In the past two years, more than 50 lawsuits stemming from postings on blogs and website message boards have been filed across the nation. The suits have spawned a debate over how the 'blogosphere' and its revolutionary impact on speech and publishing might change libel law. Legal analysts say the lawsuits are challenging a mind-set that has long surrounded blogging: that most bloggers essentially are 'judgment-proof' because they -- unlike traditional media such as newspapers, magazines and television outlets -- often are ordinary citizens who don't have a lot of money."

Seeking Unpaid Fees, Lobbying Firm Sues Former Client. Roll Call (10/3, Ackley) reports, "The lobbying firm PodestaMattoon has taken the unusual step of suing a former client for breach of contract and unpaid fees, including bonuses, totaling more than $300,000." In the case, which was "filed in D.C. Superior Court," "PodestaMattoon and its attorneys from Dickstein Shapiro allege Falex Corp. of Sugar Grove, Ill., and its nonprofit entity, the Center for Tribology and Coatings, owe the firm $307,460.83, plus interest, for unpaid fees and out-of-pocket expenses. PodestaMattoon, which is owned by Republican Daniel Mattoon and Democrat Tony Podesta, publicly reported income of $520,000 from Falex between January 2004 and March 10, 2006, when the client was terminated. In the court filings, PodestaMattoon claims that in January 2004, Falex agreed to pay 'a $150,000 performance fee if PodestaMattoon reached certain strategic and legislative goals.' While the lawsuit does not specify those legislative goals, lobbying disclosure reports filed with the Secretary of the Senate show that the firm was working for Falex on Defense appropriations matters. … PodestaMattoon's court filing states that 'during the remainder of 2004 PodestaMattoon performed its obligation under the 2004 Agreement' and, as a result, 'Falex became obligated to pay' the $150,000 performance fee. According to the filing, Falex paid only $50,000 of that sum and did not pay expenses worth more than $27,000."

Insurers Roll Out New Medicare Drug Plans. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, D1, Fuhrmans, Zhang, 2.03M) reports, "After spending months sorting through a multitude of Medicare drug-benefit options for 2006, seniors have the chance to undergo the dizzying experience all over again. That is because this week insurers begin marketing their 2007 drug plans before the six-week enrollment season kicks off Nov. 15." The "good news is that most seniors who are satisfied with the plan they are enrolled in don't have to do anything." Still, "the drug-benefit landscape is changing enough that even enrollees who are content may want to review how their plan stacks up against new offerings."

Florida GOP Chooses Negron As Foley's Replacement. The Hill (10/3, O'Connor) reports the Florida Republican Party named former state Rep. Joe Negron as Mark Foley's replacement. Negron's "name will not appear on the ballot. He will receive all the votes cast for Foley. Democrats are now favored to capture that seat." CQ Politics (10/3, Kapochunas) reports, "Any votes cast for Foley will be credited to Negron as the replacement candidate. But it will be Foley's name, not Negron's, that residents of the south-central Florida district will see when they cast their votes. And it is possible, if not likely, that many will be uncomfortable punching Foley's name, given the circumstances surrounding his hasty departure from the race and his House seat. … Local Democrats continue to portray the race as a matchup not between Negron and Mahoney, but between Foley and Mahoney."

The AP (10/3, Farrington) quotes Negron as saying, "My job beginning immediately is to get word out to all these absentee voters and to everyone else in this race that you are not voting for Mark Foley, you are voting for the Republican nominee, and I'm not Mark Foley. … I think it's something that can be done." However, according to the AP, "one prominent Florida Republican expressed pessimism about holding onto the seat. 'It's a death sentence ... mission impossible,' said former state Republican Party Chairman Tom Slade. 'The only way you win is they (voters) have got to vote for Mark Foley. That doesn't appear to me to be very attractive.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Jarvie, Bustillo, 918K) reports, "Foley's sexually charged Internet exchanges with minors prompted widespread reactions of disbelief and disgust in his home district, suggesting that the party may face an uphill challenge in convincing voters that the seat, once considered a Republican lock, should remain in the party's hands. … 'I don't know that it's going to be possible, but our job is to get voters to look beyond the name,' said Bill Lents, chairman of the St. Lucie County Republican Party. 'One idea being kicked around is "wrong name, right party." That's a message we have to get across, and it's not going to be easy, but that's our job.'"

Boehner Pessimistic Over GOP's Chances In Foley's District. The Washington Post (10/3, A1, Balz, VandeHei, 748K) reports House Majority Leader John Boehner "said in a radio interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity that the party's replacement candidate is all but doomed. Because of ballot procedures in Florida, 'to vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley,' Boehner said. 'How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?'"

Bush To Raise Funds For Republicans In Three States. The Washington Post (10/3, Baker, 748K) reports, "President Bush on Monday kicked off a three-day Western campaign fundraising trip that will take him to Nevada, California, Arizona and Colorado as he steps up his efforts to preserve Republican control of Congress five weeks before too-close-to-call midterm elections." Bush "plans to use the campaign swing to launch an aggressive attack on Democrats for voting last week against bills that limited the courtroom rights of terrorism suspects and authorized the president's warrantless wiretapping program." At his first stop, a fundraiser here for House candidate Dean Heller, Bush said, "It sounds like they think the best way to protect the American people is to wait until we're attacked again. … That's not the way it's going to be under my administration."

The Sacramento Bee (10/3, Bizjak, 298K) reports that President Bush will make a fast visit to El Dorado County, California today to attend a $2,000 per person fundraiser for Rep. John Doolittle. Bush "is expected to arrive via helicopter, 'helo-ing in' as the White House calls it, for lunch on a hilltop overlooking Folsom Lake, then 'helo-ing' out two-plus hours later."

The New York Times (10/3, Rutenberg, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports, "Bush's job approval ratings are sagging, nervous members of his own party are running advertisements highlighting their differences with him, and the White House is besieged with new questions about the war in Iraq." But Bush "is hardly going to be sitting out the final stage of this year's campaign. Even if many Republicans in tough races across the country do not want to be seen with him, Mr. Bush and his aides have developed a comprehensive plan to get him on the road for much of the next 40 days and put the power of the presidency into a midterm election that could shape his final two years in the White House." The Times adds, "To date, at a series of mostly private events, Mr. Bush has raised $180 million for his party and individual candidates, according to the Republican National Committee, outpacing the record Mr. Bush set in 2002, when it was easier to raise money because of less restrictive campaign finance laws. Together with Laura Bush, the first lady, and Vice President Dick Cheney, the White House has raised nearly $250 million for the election cycle."

The White House Bulletin/US News (10/2) reported that as the November 7 election approaches, Bush "is said to be eager to engage the Democrats, and increasingly he wants to do it himself." "He's his own best spokesman," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told US News and the Bulletin. Snow "expects to do fewer of his own on-the-record briefings during the next month -- maybe only two a week -- because the President wants to carry his case, personally, to the voters. Tops on Bush's message list: Defend the war on terrorism and the war in Iraq, talk up the economy, and call attention to his other initiatives such as his ideas for overhauling education and the health-care system. Republican advisers expect Bush to get tougher on the Democrats, whom he says are eager to re-take power in Congress and push through a left-wing agenda, including increasing taxes and limiting his power to conduct the war in Iraq and the overall war on terrorism."

Cheney Campaigns In His Old Wyoming District. USA Today (10/3, 2.27M) reports, "Vice President Cheney returned Monday to the Wyoming congressional district he once served, campaigning for the re-election of GOP Rep. Barbara Cubin." Cheney "said Republicans must keep their majority in Congress to maintain the fight against terrorism." Said Cheney, "What the Democrats are pushing now is the very kind of retreat that has been tried and failed in the past." He also "said he didn't have to remind the crowd what sort of legislation would come forward in Congress if Democrats gained the majority, invoking the idea of Sen. Edward Kennedy and Rep. Barney Frank, both Massachusetts Democrats, becoming committee chairs. Cubin faces what the Casper Star-Tribune called a "strong challenge" from businessman Gary Trauner."

Cheney Has Raised More Than $38 Million For Republicans This Cycle. Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (10/2, Baier) reported, "Vice President Cheney headlined 102 events this cycle, raising more than $38 million for Republicans."

Rasmussen Poll Shows Allen Ahead By Six. The Washington Times (10/3, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Virginia Sen. George Allen holds a six-point lead over his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr., a new statewide poll released yesterday shows. If the election were held today, Mr. Allen, a Republican, would capture 49 percent of the vote, while Mr. Webb would receive 43 percent, according to a telephone survey of 750 likely voters conducted by Rasmussen Reports from Thursday through Sunday." The data also show "5 percent are undecided and 3 percent would choose some other candidate in the contest."

Allen Campaign Airs Two-Minute Ad In Primetime. The AP (10/3) reports, "Desperate to rescue his re-election campaign from a six-week tailspin, Sen. George Allen aired a two-minute ad across Virginia just before prime time Monday -- a valedictory aimed at saving his political career." The "embattled Republican bought air time in every television market hoping to shift attention from a string of damaging developments beginning Aug. 11, when he called a man of Indian descent 'macaca,' a type of monkey, through claims last week that he used a common racial slur against black people." The AP adds, "Strategists for the former governor decided to take the dramatic step Saturday, a day after a statewide poll showed Allen and Democrat Jim Webb deadlocked at 43 percent each. As late as July, Webb trailed Allen by 16 percentage points." Allen "will pay about $43,000 to simulcast the ad once, from 7:58 p.m. to 8 p.m., on one television station each in the Norfolk, Richmond, Roanoke and Washington, D.C., markets. About $30,000 of that is for the time on WRC in Washington, which broadcasts to the populous northern Virginia suburbs both candidates are targeting."

Mason Dixon Poll Shows Whitehouse Leading Chafee 42-41. CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported, "In Rhode Island, moderate Republican Senator Lincoln Chafee is facing a stiff challenge from Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse. A new Mason-Dixon poll shows Whitehouse with 42 percent support among likely voters, to Chafee's 41 percent."

Talent, McCaskill Tied 43-43 In Mason Dixon Poll. CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported that in Missouri. "Republican Senator Jim Talent is tied with Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill in another new Mason-Dixon poll. Each gets 43 percent support among likely voters."

Mason Dixon Poll Shows Cardin Leading Steele By Six Points. CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported that in Maryland, "Democratic Congressman Ben Cardin now holds a six-point lead over Republican Lieutenant Governor Michael Steele. The Mason-Dixon poll of likely voters show Cardin with 47 percent and Steele with 41 percent."

Outside Groups Spending Heavily In Key Races. The Washington Post (10/3, A1, Birnbaum, Goldfarb, 748K) reports, "As the race for control of Congress turns toward its final sprint to Election Day, independent organizations with ideological or commercial stakes in the outcome are pouring record amounts of money into the closest contests -- in some cases eclipsing the spending of the candidates themselves." For example, in Ohio, "Rep. Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking Republican in the House, was attacked by nearly $1 million in negative commercials this summer. But her Democratic opponent, Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy, did not pay for any of them. They were bankrolled instead by trial lawyers, labor unions and the liberal group MoveOn.org. In fact, outside groups appear to have spent more in that period than Pryce and Kilroy combined, a pattern that is being duplicated in some of the most competitive campaigns across the country." Labor unions "are betting especially big. The AFL-CIO alone is helping Democratic candidates with a $40 million get-out-the-vote effort, its largest ever during an off-year election. Labor's nemesis, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, is devoting an equal sum to elections this autumn and is concentrating on efforts to bring voters to the polls. … On the right, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce plans to allocate $20 million to help federal candidates and another $20 million for state and local races. The American Medical Association is also a serious player. It recently reported $307,125 spent in support of GOP Rep. Johnson in Connecticut."

New Suburbs Seen As Key To Control Of Congress. USA Today (10/3, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "New suburbs spreading across once-rural counties are among the hottest battlegrounds in fall elections that will determine whether Democrats or Republicans control Congress for the rest of the Bush administration. The new 'it' counties, as sociologist Robert Lang calls them, are in play in top races for governor, Senate and House in at least a dozen states: Florida, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Washington." USA Today adds, "In recent elections, Democrats have dominated cities and close-in 'mature' suburbs, while Republicans sweep newer, outer suburbs and rural America. … Among the counties that could determine whether Republicans keep their House majority: Clark County, Indiana. Former representative Baron Hill, a Democrat, is in a rematch with Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel. Pasco County, Florida, north of Tampa. Republican state Rep. Gus Bilirakis and former Hillsborough County commissioner Phyllis Busansky, a Democrat, are vying to succeed his father, Rep. Michael Bilirakis, also a Republican. Sherburne and Wright counties, Minnesota, northwest of Minneapolis-St. Paul. Democrat Patty Wetterling is competing with state Sen. Michele Bachmann for the seat now held by Senate candidate Mark Kennedy, a Republican." Matthew Dowd, "who was President Bush's pollster, says some rapidly growing outer suburbs are heavily GOP. However, he says Republicans were wrong to assume after 2004 that they have a grip on them. "

Lieberman Says Party Leaders Told Him He'll Keep His Seniority If Reelected. The Hill (10/3, Bolton) reports, "Sen. Joe Lieberman, the longtime Democratic senator from Connecticut running for re-election as an independent, says the party leadership has assured him he would keep his seniority if he returns to Congress. Local Democrats are responding with irritation, political opponents voice disbelief, and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) denies making a decision." Reid "does not want to wrestle with these questions in public before the Nov. 7 election. 'The caucus won't make any decisions until after the elections in November,' said Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley."

DNC Unlikely To Change New Hampshire Role In 2008 Campaign. In his Roll Call column (10/3), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says, "Seeking to add states with large minority populations into the Democratic presidential primary mix, the Democratic National Committee has added Nevada and South Carolina to the party's early calendar. Does this mean the demise of the New Hampshire primary and the dilution of the state's influence in the nomination process — especially if the state defies the DNC and moves its primary to an earlier date? Don't bet on it." Democratic presidential candidates, 'as well as political operatives and journalists I've talked with, leave little doubt that New Hampshire once again will be a battleground for the party's nomination, whenever the primary is held." Rothenberg added, "I don't know if New Hampshire will challenge the DNC by moving its primary earlier than the DNC allows, but it might. A number of smart people I talked to firmly believe it will. Some even think the Granite State will have no choice but to move up to December or even November. And if that happens, the irony is that the DNC will have succeeded in forcing Democrats to choose a nominee earlier, rather than changing the states that have the most impact in selecting the party's standard-bearer."
